

START

Microfilmed By:

NORTHEAST DOCUMENT CONSERVATION CENTER

Andover, MA 01810

OCTOBER 1993

Camera Operator: Kathy Wilder

MICROFILMED
August 1993 - April 1994

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA
SCRAPBOOK MICROFILMING PROJECT

Funded in part by

THE NATIONAL ENDOWMENT FOR THE HUMANITIES

Grant No. PS-20709-93

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA MICROFILMING PROJECT

A COOPERATIVE PROJECT BETWEEN THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA ARCHIVES AND THE BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY
(AUGUST 1993 - APRIL 1994)

This microfilming project includes two collections of scrapbooks housed in two separate repositories. The first set of scrapbooks (80 volumes) resides within the Allen A. Brown Collection in the Music Department of the Boston Public Library (BPL). Their call number is M.125.5. The second set of scrapbooks (132 volumes) resides within the Boston Symphony Orchestra (BSO) Archives' Press Clippings collection. They have the designation Pres 56.

The BPL scrapbooks begin with the founding of the BSO in 1881 and continue, through 79 seasons, to 1960. Articles consist mainly of reviews and feature stories from Boston and New York newspapers. Occasionally, magazine articles and press releases are also included. The scrapbooks cover most aspects of the BSO.

The BSO scrapbooks run from 1889, the Orchestra's 9th season, to 1973. In addition to local reviews and features, the volumes contain articles culled from national and international publications. The scrapbooks document, in detail, all aspects of the BSO: The Symphony Orchestra (including subscription concerts, tours, and trips), the Boston Pops, the Tanglewood Festival, the Tanglewood Music Center, and Symphony Hall.

The two sets of scrapbooks have been filmed as two separate entities. Researchers wanting to look at specific seasons or subjects must examine both sets of films to ensure full coverage.

The scrapbooks do not represent the complete holdings of either location on the subject of the BSO.

Requests for positive microfilm copies of individual rolls, or of film sets, should be directed to the respective repositories.

Music Department
Boston Public Library
P. O. Box 286
Boston, MA 02117

Boston Symphony Orchestra Archives
Symphony Hall
Boston, MA 02115

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SCRAPBOOKS

1881-1882 TO 1959-1960

1181-18 to 1915-16 compiled by Allen A. Brown

1916-17 to 1937-38 compiled by Mary A. Brown

1938-39 to 1959-60 compiled by the Music Department

These scrapbooks contain reviews of concerts, articles concerning the Symphony, its players and conductors, interviews with soloists and composers, occasional letters and notes, an occasional autograph, ticket stubs, pictures of conductors, the Symphony, soloists and composers, and caricatures.

In the scrapbooks compiled by Mr. Brown, it is possible to find articles or reviews pasted on a program which does not have the same date. Mr. Brown used multiple copies of programs for his scrapbook "fillers;" the fillers have no relation to the articles pasted on them. The fillers may be partially to completely covered.

These scrapbooks do not contain the complete programs. For the complete program, the researcher must consult either the hard copies found in either the Boston Symphony Archives or the Boston Public Library's Music Department or the microfilm of programs published by KTO Microform (Millwood, New York) and dating from the 1881-82 season through the 1974-75 season.

Generally, one volume represents one Symphony season; the volume and season should therefore match. Depending upon the compiler and the clippings available, some reviews and articles may be found concerning the Promenade Concerts, Boston Pops, the Berkshire Music Festival and Tanglewood.

The Music Department of the Boston Public Library does maintain other materials concerning the Boston Symphony Orchestra in other scrapbooks and files. Please consult with the Music Librarian for these materials.

VOLUMES 1-4

1881-82 TO 1884-85

THIS VOLUME CONTAINS MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL.

MANUSCRIPTS MAY NOT

BE REPRODUCED

WITHOUT PERMISSION.

TECHNICAL DATA

IMAGE PLACEMENT: IA IB IIA IIB

REDUCTION RATIO: 1.2X

FILM STOCK:

2.5 mm

abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz 1234567890

2.0 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13"x18"
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC

150 mm

100 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

1.0 mm
1.5 mm
2.0 mm

2.5 mm

A5

A4

PRECISIONSM RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century

1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

3.5 mm

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

MULTIPLE EXPOSURES
DUE TO COLOR VARIATIONS
AND OVERLAPPING MATERIAL

VOLUME 1

1881-1882

THIS REEL CONTAINS MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL.

MANUSCRIPTS MAY NOT

BE REPRODUCED

WITHOUT PERMISSION.

☆☆ M 125-5

Vol. I

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON
THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION

The London World says of Mr. Henschel: "His voice, which always was strong and rough, has not lost all its coarseness. But he knows how to sing. He knows, in fact, too many things. He played the piano in concert, he led in Boston an orchestra, as on one occasion he did here, and he sings. This forms a kind of universal geniuses who rarely do good. That Mr. Henschel knows how to conduct, and that he does play the piano well, cannot be a reproach to him; but his anxiety to show all the silk linings of his sleeves reminds one of those country girls who, when they come to London, can never wear brooches and pins and bracelets enough, and are quite capable of putting on a jacket and a shawl, though the weather be very warm, only to exhibit all their property."

Biographies of American Musicians.

Number Seventy. Oct 1883

GEORGE HENSCHEL.

It is not often that men excel in several branches of the arts. Of Mr. Henschel it may be said, that he is a fine pianist, an excellent singer, a composer and conductor. He occupies a leading position as singer, and his fame as such spreads over this country, England, Holland and Germany. He was born on February 18th, 1850, at Breslau, the capital of Silesia, Germany.

His first teachers were L. Wandelt and Julius Schaeffer, and at twelve years of age he made a public appearance as pianist in Berlin. In 1867 he left the gymnasium at Breslau and devoted himself exclusively to the study of music in the conservatory at Leipzig, where Richter, Moscheles and Goetze were his teachers. When the latter died he went to Berlin and entered the High School for Music, becoming a pupil of Friedrich Kiel in composition, and Ad. Schulze in singing. Wherever he studied he attracted attention by his rare gifts as well as by the excellency of his voice. It is a rich baritone of great power, richness and compass. His style is pure, his repertoire is large and he is always loyal to the score. His high merit as a singer rests chiefly upon his splendid musical judgment, correct feeling, and intelligent declamation. Everything that he does tells of the educated, fine feeling musician. We have heard him sing on several occasions and know whereof we speak, when we say, that there is not in this country a singer who could have performed the recitatives in Bach's Passion as he did. These were rather wearying to the Cincinnati audience, as the great Passion was sung during the May festival, but Mr. Henschel's voice added such a charm to them, that they were listened to with a great deal more attention than they would otherwise have received.

Mr. Henschel appeared for the first time in England, February 19th, 1876. He remained there for a few years, singing in oratorio. As a recognition of his merits, he was made an honorary member of the London Philharmonic Society. In the winter of 1881 he came to this country, and has since remained in Boston, active as a teacher, singer and conductor. He has married Miss Lilian Bailey, one of our own fair daughters, and we hope that he will cast his lot permanently with us.

Mr. Henschel has composed much music. His numerous works vary in style, embracing vocal solos, choruses, part songs, orchestral compositions, also an opera and an oratorio. The addition of such men to the musical profession cannot fail to advance its interests. We want more such men, and the fact that they are willing to come and settle in our midst, proves beyond a doubt that art is progressing upon our shores.

A Boston musical amateur who asked through a mutual friend for the autograph of Georg Henschel for the title page of his collection of programmes and press notices of the Boston Symphony concerts, received instead a note to the effect that Mr. Henschel did not feel so much flattered by the criticisms as to care to set his signature upon them. And now that note, bound in the front of the book, is the most valuable leaf of the collection. He asked for a simple autograph, and got an opinion. 1883

Dear Mr. Lang :

Here is Mr. Allen
Brown's book.

I signed my name. As to the lines of music &
key of you to excuse me.
I really cannot see in what connection it
would be with the purpose of the book, especially since he asks me for some line from my own music.

I hope you will understand
me.

With kind regards

Yours sincerely,

Georg Henschel

Tuesday

Mar-13-83

Oct. 22	Oct. 29	Nov. 5	Nov. 12	Nov. 19	Nov. 26	Dec. 3	Dec. 10	Dec. 17	Dec. 24
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. ——— THE ——— BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. ——— Mr. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor. ——— SEASON 1881-82.
Jan. 7	Jan. 14	Jan. 21	Jan. 28	Feb. 4	Feb. 11	Feb. 18	Feb. 25	Mar. 4	Mar. 11
11	12	13	14	15	16	17	18	19	20

L 448
2d BALCONY.

MANUSCRIPT

A Boston musical amateur who asked through a mutual friend for the autograph of Georg Henschel for the title page of his collection of programmes and press notices of the Boston Symphony concerts, received instead a note to the effect that Mr. Henschel did not feel so much flattered by the criticisms as to care to set his signature upon them. And now that note, bound in the front of the book, is the most valuable leaf of the collection. He asked for a simple autograph, and got an opinion. 1883

Dear Mr. Lang

Here is Mr. Allen
Brown's book.

I signed my name. As to the lines of music I beg of you to excuse me.
I really cannot see in
what connection it
would be with the purpose of the book, especially since he asks me for some
line from my own music.

I hope you will understand
me.

With kind regards

Yours sincerely

Georg Henschel

Tues Jan

Mar-13-83

Oct. 22	Oct. 29	Nov. 5	Nov. 12	Nov. 19	Nov. 26	Dec. 3	Dec. 10	Dec. 17	Dec. 24
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. <hr/> THE <hr/> BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. <hr/> Mr. GEORG HENSHEL, Conductor. <hr/> SEASON 1881-82.
Mch. 11	Mch. 18	Mch. 25	Feb. 1	Feb. 8	Feb. 15	Feb. 22	Feb. 29	Jan. 5	Jan. 12
20	19	18	17	16	15	14	13	12	11

George Henschel.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

FIRST SEASON
1881-1882

PUBLIC LIBRARY
OF THE
CITY OF BOSTON

Programmes and Comments.

9093

* No. 125. 5. Vol 1

1881-1883

Alan A. Brown

Aug. 14. 1894

124.

YRABUJOLUBU
ENT TO NOT20870YTIO

Index

Composer	Name of Work	Concert Date	Soloists
Auber	Ouverture - "La Part du Diable"	XIII Jan 21.82
Bach C. Ph. Im.	Sinfonia in D	VI Nov. 26.81
Bach J. S.	Toccata in F orch. by H. Esser	XIII Jan 21.82
Bargiel W.	Udagio for Cello in G. op 38	VIII Dec 10.81	Carl Bayerhoffer
Beethoven	Symphonie No. 1. op 21	II Oct 22.81
"	" 2 " 36	IV Nov 12. "
"	" 3 " 55	V " 19 "
"	" 4 " 60	VII Dec 3 "
"	" 5 " 67	IX " 17 "
"	" 6 " 68	XI Jan 7.82
"	" 7 " 92	XV Feb 4 "
"	" 8 " 93	XVII " 18 "
"	" 9 " 125 choral	IX Nov 11 "	Mrs Allen Mary H. How Char R Adams T. Cirillo
Bizet	Op. 21 "Coriolanus" op 62	XVI Feb 11.82
"	" "Widwe des Hauses" " 124	I Oct 22.81
"	" "Egmont" " 84	IX Dec 7. "
"	" "Leonora" No. 1. " 138	XVII Feb 18.82
"	" " " 2 " 72	XVIII " 25 "
"	" " " 3 " 72	XIX Feb 4 "
Concerto No 4 in G. op 58	Piano solo	IX Dec 17.81	G. W. Sumner
" 5 " "Eflat" " 73	"	XIV Jan 28.82	C. Baermann
Concerto Piano, V ^o & cello solo. op 56		XIII " 21. "	Tessa Lieke Theo. Lieke Geo. Henschel
Song "Wonne der Wehmuth"		IX Dec 7.81	Mrs Henschel
" "Mignon"		" " "	"

Berlioz - Song "La Captive"	XVI	Feb 11. 82	Miss Mary H. How
Boccherini - Minuet in A No. 2	VI	Nov. 26. 81
Boieldieu - Ouv. "La Dame Blanche"	VII	Dec 3. 81
Brahms - Symphonie No. 1 in C min. op 68	VIII	Dec 10. 81
" " 2 " D " 73	XVIII	Feb 25. 82
" Tragic Overture op 81.	II	Oct 29. 81
" " " "	III	Nov 5. 81
" Rhapsody" for Contralto Solo, male, chorus & orch.	XVI	Feb 11. 82	Miss Mary H. How
	XVII	" 18 "	"
Bruch, Max - Scene - Odyssus - "Then far distant Sun"	I	Oct 22. 81	Annie Louise Cary
Cherubini - Ouv. "Faniska"	V	Nov. 19. 81
Chopin - "Ballad" in A flat op 47 - Piano	XVIII	Feb 25. 82	Mad. Schiller
" Scherzo" in C min. op 39 "	II	Oct 29. 81	W. H. Sherwood
Delibes L. "Intermezzo et Valse lente" from Ballet music to "Sylvia"	XVI	Feb 11. 82
Dvorak - "Two Slavonian Dances" op 46 nos 4. 1	III	Nov 5. 81
Gade H.W. Ouv. "In the Highlands"	XV	Feb 4. 82
Gluck - "Ballet Music" nos. of German Suite	VII	Dec 3. 81
Rec. 1 air "Ophelia" "Dearest Consort"	I	Oct 22. 81	Annie Louise Cary
" " " "Cerco il mio Ben"	XIX	Feb 4. 82	Matilde Phillipps
Granman L. Prelude to "Melusine" op 24.	XI	Jan 7. 82
Grieg Ed. Concerto Piano & orch. 4 min op 16.	II	Oct 29. 81	W. H. Sherwood

Handel Air "Giulio Cesare"	III	Nov 5. 81	Miss Henschel
Haydn Symphonie in B flat No. 12 Br. & Haatel	I	Oct 22. 81
Henschel G. "Andante" from Suite op 23 1 st & cello	XIII	Jan 21. 82	Therese Liebe } Theo. Liebe }
" Hymne au Createur" with orch.	III	Nov 5. 81	Miss Henschel
" Gipsy Serenade" Piano & V ^o obligato	V	" 19. 81	Theo J Toedt } Bern. Listemann }
" The Sunny Beam" op 29. nos. Trio from Psalm CXXX op 31. } for Sop. Tenor & alto	XV	Feb 4. 82	Fanny Kellogg
	XX	Feb 11. 82	Miss Allen } Miss M. H. How } Chas. R. Adams }
Henselt A. Concerto Piano & orch. in F min: op 16	XV	Feb 4. 82	John A. Preston
Herold Ouv. "Zampa"	XI	Jan 7. 82
Hiller F. Caprice "The Sentinel" op 146	I	Dec 31. 81
Joachim Jos. "Concerto" in D for Violin & orch op 11.	VI	Nov 26. 81	Bern. Listemann
Lachner Fr. March in B flat from Suite nos. op 113	II	Oct 29. 81
Leiszt F. "Les Preludes"	VIII	Dec 10. 81
" Hungarian Fantasy" Piano & orch.	XIX	Feb 4. 82	Miss Marie Heimlich
Etude "Waldesrauchen" Piano	XI	Jan 7. 82	Louis Maas
" Midsummer nightdream Fantasy "	"	" "	"
" Venezia e Napoli "	XIV	" 28. 82	Carl Baermann
Maas, Louis Concerto Piano & orch. in C min op 12.	XI	Jan 7. 82	Louis Maas
Massenet Ouv. "Phedre"	XVII	Feb 18. 82
Mehul Ouv. "Joseph"	V	Nov 19. 81
Rec. & air from "Joseph" Land of my Father	"	" " "	Theo J Toedt

16

Mendelssohn - "Symphonie" in D min. No 5. op 107 ~~XIII~~ Aug 21. 82
 Ovr. to "Camaros Wedding" op 10 ~~IV~~ Nov 12. 81
 " " "Athalia" " 74 ~~VIII~~ Dec 10. "
 "Concerto" in E min: op 64 for } Violin & orchestra ~~XVII~~ Feb 18. 82 Alfred de Sève
 "Wedding March" from op 61. ~~XX~~ Mch 11. 82

Mozart - Symphonie in G min. ~~III~~ Nov 5. 81
 " " D Köchel 504 ~~XIV~~ Jan 28. 82
 "Masonic Funeral Music" " " "
 "Nocturno Serenade in D" 4 small orch. " " "
 Overture to "Magic Flute" ~~VII~~ Dec 6. 81
 "Fantasy" in C min: for Piano ~~XIV~~ Jan 28. 82 Carl Baermann
 Rec. rai "non mi dir" Don Giovanni ~~XV~~ Feb 4. 82 Fanny Kellogg

Nicolai - Overture "Merry Wives of Windsor" ~~III~~ Nov 5. 81

Paine J. H. Prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus" ~~XX~~ Mch 11. 82
 - Conducted by the Composer -

Rheinberger - "Ballad" for Piano ~~XIV~~ Jan 28. 82 Carl Baermann

Rossi - Air from "Mithras" ~~VII~~ Dec 3. 81 Miss Emily Winant

Rubinstein - "The Dream" ~~V~~ Nov 19. 81 Theo. J. Poedt
 "The dew it shines" op 72 Nov 1. ~~XV~~ Feb 4. 82 Fanny Kellogg

Saint-Saens - "Romance" for Violin in C 448 ~~IV~~ Nov 12. 81 Leandro Campanari
 "Concerto" for Cello & Orch. op 58 ~~VIII~~ Dec 10. 81 Carl Beyerhoffen
 "Concerto" for Piano & Orch. No 4 }
 op. 144 ~~XVIII~~ Feb 25. 82 Mad. Schiller

Schubert - Symphonie in C ~~XII~~ Jan 14. 82
 " " B min: ~~XVI~~ Feb 11. 82
 "Ballet Music" Rosamunde ~~I~~ Oct 22. 81

17

Schumann - "Symphonie" No 1. in B flat op 38 ~~XIX~~ Mch 4. 82
 " " " " " 61 ~~I~~ Dec 31. 81
 "Overture Scherzo & Finale" " 52 ~~VI~~ Nov 26. "
 "Warum" op 12. No 3 for Piano ~~II~~ Oct 29. W. H. Sherwood

Spohr L. Concerto for Violin & Orch No 8 op 47 ~~IV~~ Nov 12. 81 Leandro Campanari

Wagner - Introduction to the "Meistersinger" ~~IV~~ Nov 12. 81
 "Kaiser march" ~~X~~ Dec 31. 81
 Introduction & 3rd Act "Lohengrin" ~~XVI~~ Feb 11. 82
 "Pogner's Address" Meistersinger ~~X~~ Dec 31. 81 J. Henschel
 "Legend & Lohengrin's farewell" from }
 3rd Act of Lohengrin ~~XII~~ Jan 14. 82 Chas. R. Adams

Weber - "Festival Overture" ~~I~~ Oct 22. 81
 Overture to "Oberon" ~~III~~ Jan 14. 82
 Air "Abu Hassan" O Fatima ~~VII~~ Dec 3. 81 Miss Emily Winant
 Scene from "Euryanthe" Wo beg ich nicht ~~I~~ " 31. 81 J. Henschel
 Air from "Oberon" From boyhood friend ~~XII~~ Jan 14. 82 Chas. R. Adams

Composers, with number of works given

Auber	1
Bach C. Ph. Em.	1
Bach J. S.	1
Bargiel W.	1
Beethoven	20
Berlioz	1
Boccherini	1
Boieldieu	1
Brahms	4
Brech M.	1
Cherubini	1
Chopin	2
Delibes	1
Dvorak	2
Gade H. W.	1
Gluck	3
Gramman C.	1
Grieg Ed.	1
Handel	1
Haydn	1
Henschel G.	5
Henselt A.	1
Herold	1
Hiller A.	1
Joachim Jos.	1
Lachner Franz	1
Liszt	5
Maas, Louis	1
Masenet	1
Mehul	2
Mendelssohn	5
Mozart	7
Nicolai	1

Paine J. K.	1
Rheinberger	1
Rossi	1
Rubinstein	2
Saint-Saens	3
Schubert	3
Schumann	4
Spohr L.	1
Wagner R.	5
Weber	5

Soloists: with dates of appearances -

Piano	Baermann, Carl	Jan 28. 82
	Heimliches, Miss Marie	Feb 4. 82
	Henschel, Georg	Jan 21. 82
	Maas, Louis	" 7. 82
	Preston, John A.	Feb 4. 82
	Schiller, Madeline	" 25. 82
	Shenwood W. H.	Oct 29. 81
Violin	Sumner Geo. W.	Dec 17. 81
	Campanari, Cleandro	Nov 12. 81
	Liebe, Terese	Jan 21. 82
	Listemann, Bernhard	Nov 19. 81
	Live, Alfred de	Feb 18. 82
Cello	Bayerhoffer, Carl	Dec 10. 81
	Liebe, Theodore	Jan 21. 82
Singers	Adams, Chas. R.	Jan 14. 82
	Allen, Mrs Humphrey	Feb 11. 82
	Cary, Annie Louise	Oct 22. 82
	Cirillo T.	Feb 11. 82
	Henschel, Georg Mrs	Nov 5. 81, Dec 17. 81, Jan 21. 82.
	" Mrs G.	Dec 17. 81

How, Miss Mary H.
Kellogg, Miss Fanny
Phillips, Miss Matilde
Toedt, Mrs. J.
Winant, Miss Emily

Feb'y 11. + 18, 82; March 11. 82

Feb'y 4. 82

March 4. 82

Nov 19. 81

Dec 3. 81

Also assisted by a chorus of male voices

Feb'y 11. + 18 1882

And a full Chorus for Beethoven's 9th Symphony

March 11. 1882

Conductor
Georg Henschel

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

1881

IN THE INTEREST OF GOOD MUSIC.

Notwithstanding the development of musical taste in Boston, we have never yet possessed a full and permanent orchestra, offering the best music at low prices, such as may be found in all the large European cities, or even in the smaller musical centres of Germany. The essential condition of such orchestras is their stability, whereas ours are necessarily shifting and uncertain, because we are dependent upon musicians whose work and time are largely pledged elsewhere.

To obviate this difficulty the following plan is offered. It is an effort made simply in the interest of good music, and though individual inasmuch as it is independent of societies or clubs, it is in no way antagonistic to any previously existing musical organization. Indeed, the first step as well as the natural impulse in announcing a new musical project, is to thank those who have brought us where we now stand. Whatever may be done in the future, to the Handel and Haydn Society and to the Harvard Musical Association we all owe the greater part of our home education in music of a high character. Can we forget either how admirably their work has been supplemented by the taste and critical judgment of Mr. John S. Dwight, and by the artists who have identified themselves with the same cause in Boston? These have been our teachers. We build on foundations they have laid. Such details of this scheme as concern the public are stated below.

The orchestra is to number sixty selected musicians; their time, so far as required for careful training and for a given number of concerts, to be engaged in advance.

Mr. Georg Henschel will be the conductor for the coming season.

The concerts will be twenty in number, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evenings, from the middle of October to the middle of March.

The price of season tickets, with reserved seats, for the whole series of evening concerts will be either $10 or $5, according to position.

Single tickets, with reserved seats, will be seventy-five cents or twenty-five cents, according to position.

Between the concerts, there will be a public rehearsal on one afternoon of every week, with single tickets at twenty-five cents, and no reserved seats.

The intention is that this orchestra shall be made permanent here, and shall be called "The Boston Symphony Orchestra."

Both as the condition and result of success the sympathy of the public is asked.

3/20/81 Best Transcribed. H. L. HIGGINSON.

Mr. H. L. HIGGINSON'S ANNOUNCEMENT of a series of twenty symphony concerts by an orchestra of sixty led by Mr. Henschel is the latest incident in the orchestral ebullition in Boston, which Dwight's Journal of Music, as organ of the Harvard Musical Association, last week stigmatized as a "curious fermentation of the petty politics and jealousies of music." Mr. Higginson's prospectus is to be understood, we suppose, as meaning whether or no the twenty concerts "pay," and is interpreted by rumor to signify that sixty thousand, or a hundred thousand, or a million dollars are ready to support the musicians, in addition to what they would receive for one concert and rehearsal a week, and from March to October, as well as from October to March. Every one will hope that State street stands ready to pour out its money lavishly for this public object as it has done for so many other good causes. Meanwhile it can do no harm to hold fast that which has been proved to be good, namely the concerts of the new Philharmonic Society, which Mr. Higginson omits to refer to, but which have evidently prepared the way for his public-spirited movement by proving that symphony concerts can be given to interested audiences of over 2400 people in Music Hall, and that the select audiences of 500 or 600 which have dozed through the moribund Harvard Association's concerts are no test of Boston's appreciation of the best music.

THE HIGGINSON CONCERT REHEARSALS.

To the Editor of the Transcript: In view of the fact that the season tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts have found so ready a sale, and that some people perhaps did not secure just the seats they would have chosen, would it not be well to remember that on each Friday afternoon preceding the concerts the same music will be given as on the following evening? There can be no doubt that Mr. Higginson in his thoughtful generosity meant that very many people—those who do not live within the city limits, and women and young people who may not care to go out in the evening without an escort—may have this equal chance to hear good music, and need only pay twenty-five cents for their ticket. Indeed, for those studying music it will be a delightful way of getting an insight into the immortal compositions, as we hear that the Friday afternoon performances will be true rehearsals, not merely finished concerts.

Sept 12. 81

20 22

THE HIGGINSON CONCERTS.
Transcript Sept. 1881

Belated subscribers who now present themselves at Mr. Peck's window draw pretty long faces when the well-marked plan of the Music Hall is shown them. Many a hopeful youth, his brain reeling under the weight of elaborate instructions as to "end-seats, near the middle of the hall, away from cross-passages, and out of the draught," has been driven to the verge of madness by doubts whether he had better put up with seats by no means answering to this description, or lose his last chance of getting any seats at all. People wise in such matters say that a "full" house has never been seen anywhere, that there are always a half a dozen seats or so unoccupied in even the most crowded houses. But, as Mr. Higginson's subscription list now looks, it seems very probable that the seating capacity of the Music Hall will be pretty well tested this winter. Some people, aghast at the rush for tickets, ask, in astonishment, where all this audience comes from. Where have all these symphony-concert goers been during the last ten years, that they have hidden themselves so completely from public view? Well, the "new broom" element in the Boston Orchestra has, no doubt, much to do with this sudden sweeping of musical snails out of their holes. Cheap prices have some effect, but not so much as many persons suppose. "Fashion" is an ugly word to use in connection with art matters, but all things have their nether side. Every one knows that musicians are harmless as doves, and in this case they will probably be wise as serpents also, and rejoice that symphony concerts are again "fashionable" this winter, a thing they have not been since the first few years of the Harvard concerts.

Everything in this world has a centre of gravity; there is always some one point upon which public interest or curiosity naturally concentrates itself. A few months ago this point was Mr. Higginson himself; his liberality in furnishing Boston with a permanent orchestra for a year, as Paddy would say, was the most interesting feature in the whole scheme. But now that the concerts have been assured for some time, people have got accustomed to the idea, so to speak, with that ready ease with which we all accustom our minds to pleasant things, and the general eye now turns from the scheme to the concerts themselves. Here the main point of interest is unquestionably Mr. Henschel. The position in which he stands is so unique and commanding that one cannot help looking at him with almost unmixed attention. With all his rare talents, with all his inexperience, he occupies the position of musical dictator; his power is virtually absolute. The choice of players and the choice of programmes both lie in his hands. He is answerable to no one, and to nothing save his own artistic sense. He can truly say, "Le concert, c'est moi!" Never was man in this city submitted to so exhaustive a test of his capacity. Whatever of good and of bad there may be in the concerts will be chargeable to him, and to him alone. There is something extremely valuable in this sort of musical one-man power.

Of whatever sort the concerts may be, one can look safely for an individual idea behind them; in this case for an interesting idea, for Mr. Henschel is unquestionably an interesting musical personality, a man of very strong musical convictions, and, what is more, able to give most excellent reasons for his convictions. One can look to him not only for performances of great compositions, but for performances of a character worthy to be called renderings; renderings which, whether praiseworthy or not, will be at least debatable, for one can be sure that there is a definite and well-thought-out idea behind everything he does. Moreover, such are the material resources placed at his command, that one can be pretty sure that the realization of his idea will lie in his power. His technical skill as a conductor may possibly be at fault, but in one's estimate of an artist, the consideration of his technical capacity, as such, is not a question which claims much thought, and one is not called upon to separate his musical intentions from the manner in which he carries them out. Artistically speaking, technical ability is an absolute sine qua non; its presence calls for no especial praise, because its absence condemns a man at once, and strikes him out of the list of artists straightway. We judge an artist by what he gives us, and, as far as the audience is concerned, his intentions are synonymous with his performance. If Mr. Henschel fails, it will be his own fault.

We have insisted at length upon the vast space Mr. Henschel's figure occupies in the picture of these concerts as we see it in our mind's eye. Whatever new and interesting music he may play to us, the most interesting point of all will still be the fact that every programme—nay, the whole series of programmes—and every rendering of pieces, both new and old, will embody a virtually new and individual musical idea. Mr. Henschel has not been long enough in this country to have sucked in any of our musical notions or prejudices; he is too much of a musician by gift and education to follow any tradition blindly. What he gives us will be his own.

1

24
AY, JUNE 15, 1881.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS NEXT WINTER.

The lookout for orchestral music next winter is such as Boston has never had before. Three distinct organizations promise as many series of symphony concerts, viz.: The Harvard Musical Association are to give five concerts in the Boston Museum, with an orchestra of sixty; the Philharmonic Society are to give not less than eight concerts and as many public rehearsals in the Music Hall with an orchestra of not less than fifty (and which probably will be increased to sixty); the Boston Symphony Orchestra, so royally endowed by Mr. Higginson, will give twenty concerts, each concert being preceded by a public rehearsal, in the Music Hall, with an orchestra of sixty. Sixty-one orchestral performances (counting rehearsals) in all! Some persons have talked, and still talk, foolishly about three orchestras. This is impossible; there will be but one orchestra in Boston, larger, better rehearsed, with its good elements made more of, and its weak points better strengthened than we ever have had before. Each society will have its own conductor, but the orchestra will be essentially the same.

In spite of the fact that this orchestra will play alternately under three different batons, the fact of its rehearsing so continually as it necessarily will is enough in itself to inspire one with hopes of musical results such as have very rarely been attained in our city. The orchestra will be an orchestra, not a heterogeneous mass of players thrown together at rare intervals to try their skill in great music.

In their relations to the public the older organizations will stand pretty much as they have heretofore. The Harvard Musical Association appeals to its members to fill up its subscription list, but the general public can get season tickets through members. The Philharmonic Society issues tickets to its members only, although the public can buy tickets to the rehearsals. Mr. Higginson's subscription list is thrown open to the public without reservation, and his scale of prices is unprecedentedly low. Of the three societies, one offers a decided and very important musical novelty; the Harvard concerts are to be given, not in the vast Music Hall, but in the Museum—a hall more nearly of the size of the most famous concert-rooms in Germany and France. The musical importance of this new step cannot be over-estimated.

It would be wholly premature to say much

25
concerning the characteristic musical tendency of each one of these three organizations, were it not for one or two points which will merit careful consideration. It must be admitted on all sides that the situation is new. Sixty-one orchestral concerts and rehearsals of a high musical character in one winter are something unprecedented in this city. Such an unusual supply must be treated very carefully if the corresponding demand is to be kept up, else the whole thing must end in sheer musical surfeit. If one can judge at all by a previous knowledge of the men who form the committees of the Harvard Musical Association and the Philharmonic Society, and of Mr. Georg Henschel, who is the sole musical head of the Higginson orchestra, it may confidently be expected that each series of concerts will strive after the very best things; yet it is to be feared that the programmes may too constantly keep on a very high level; that the music may be too steadily serious for the public digestion. We never have advocated and never will advocate what is called (and rightly, too,) a mixed programme. Such a thing is an artistic monstrosity. Every programme should be a work of art in itself; it should have singleness of purpose; incongruous musical elements should never be brought together. In past years we have had almost nothing but serious concerts; i. e., programmes composed wholly of music which had the very highest and most earnest artistic aim. This was unfortunate, but inevitable. Concerts were so few that all but the higher forms of composition had to be slighted. For it is worse than useless to put one or two pieces of light music into a programme mainly composed of music of a higher character. But next winter concerts will be so many that the concert-givers can well afford to recognize the demands of a large portion of the public (and a very musical portion, too,) who enjoy light music of a good sort. May we not have some concerts wholly devoted to light music? to Auber, Rossini, Herold and Nicolai overtures, Strauss and Gungl waltzes, operatic selections and music of that stamp? There is not a city of any size in Germany which is without such concerts. And, remember, this music is good, good just as the best light comedy and farce are good. It is only its light character that makes it unfit to go side by side with great symphonies, concertos and overtures. Such concerts would give the public a chance to unbend in a very natural and musical way; and the public needs to unbend now and then. The average concert-goer behaves himself at a concert very differently from the professional musician; in a certain sense his mind works much harder; he is bound to get his money's worth, and listen to everything. A musician rarely does this; he generally goes to a concert to hear some one particular thing, or two or three things, as the case may be; to these he listens with all his heart and soul, but he hears the rest of the programme with but half an ear, and comes out fresh at the end. The public at large stand in sore need of some concerts of music to which they, too, can listen with half an ear. Unless the musical powers in Boston see the wisdom of this, there is no small chance of there being many persons in our good city next spring who have listened to so many symphonies and overtures during the winter, that they wish never to hear a symphony again.

26

The marriage of Georg Henschel of London and Lillian Bailey of this city, took place Wednesday noon, at the Second Church, in the presence of a large throng of guests, among whom the musical circles were well represented. The guests were courteously seated by the following gentlemen as ushers: Messrs. Greenleaf, Burnett, Dodd, E. P. Hayden of New York, Howard Hayden and Mr. Munzig. The church was beautifully decorated, the altar being covered with a profusion of azalias, camelias, palms and other cut flowers. The music was one of the features of the event. Mr. Robert Thallon, jr., a classmate of the groom at Leipzig, presided at the organ, and upon the entrance of the bridal party played with fine effect the hymn, "Ein feste Burg." The bride, who wore a dainty costume of white satin brocade and Swiss embroidery, and was attended by six bridesmaids, Misses Covell, Hayden, Talbot, Brewer, Dodd and Roberts, and four little cousins, two boys and two girls. Mr. Charles R. Hayden acted as best man. The ceremony was performed by Rev. E. A. Horton, the bride being given away by her father, L. C. Bailey. During the ceremony Mr. Thallon played a charming improvisation, with Henschel's beautiful duet, "Oh, that we two were Maying," so many times sung here this season by the bridal couple, as a theme. At the conclusion of the ceremony the party passed up the aisle to the joyous peal of the Mendelssohn Wedding March, and repaired to the parlors of the church, where a reception was held. Among the musical people present were Charles R. Hayden (a relative of the bride), Prof. John K. Paine of Harvard University, John S. Dwight, Mrs. Haskell (formerly Miss Mary Beebe), Mrs. H. M. Rogers, Miss Louie Homer, A. Parker Browne, Dr. S. W. Langmaid. W. D. Howells was also present. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel will remain in this country until May, when they will go abroad for an extended tour of Europe. They expect to return here next October. Home Journal Nov. 12, 1881

27

HENSCHEL AS A CONDUCTOR.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE COURIER:—

We have always been impressed that Henschel had some great trait about him. As a singer he has been seen at his worst; as a pianist he must be regarded as possessing rare abilities; as a composer he is eminent; but as a conductor he rises pre-eminent. Let it be said to his great credit that since Anton Rubinstein conducted his Ocean Symphony at the Tremont Temple, no such masterly, magnetic conducting has been seen in Boston as was observed in Mr. Henschel while directing his Overture at the last Harvard Symphony concert. When we say this, we bear in mind every conductor, local and otherwise, who has wielded the baton before a Boston audience. No doubt many recollect the wonderful results that Rubinstein produced at once with an orchestra wholly unused to his conducting. From the moment Rubinstein took the baton the musicians became something else than what we had always known them. His magnetic presence and the power of his genius possessed them and awakened them to a new life. They saw and felt before them the man that controlled them. Their best efforts were at his command. It has remained for Mr. Henschel to repeat this revelation, and to show a Boston audience in what consists a great conductor. If we even regard the mere matter of his time-beating, mechanically, it is a lesson to all the conductors with whose efforts we are familiar. Let it be remarked that he has a down-beat, an almost unknown thing in the gyratory movements which have become through habitual usage to be regarded as conducting. We have often remarked upon this matter to the musicians themselves and been told that "they understood what the conductor meant after they became used to his movements," when we have complained of the unintelligible time-beating of a conductor and the total absence of a down-beat in his movements. The fact that they could finally understand him is of no credit to the conductor. All-important and absolutely necessary as is this mechanical perfection in a conductor, it is but a small part of the necessities in the case. Vital points in the composition of a conductor must be a broad and clear conception, a magnetic presence and a superiority of intelligence over every man under him. This alone can command and bring forth the best results to be obtained from the musicians under his direction. The Harvard Musical Association announce that during the season of 1881-2 it will give its seventeenth series of symphony concerts. Let them make no mistake now that accidentally, but fortunately, the man has been discovered whose powers are eminent enough to raise orchestral music from its languishing condition in Boston. Let them see to it that your concerts are not to furnish an opportunity for further exhibition of mediocrity in conducting, nor for the trial of a novice in the case of a change, or to furnish routine towards the cultivation of one whose ambition looks towards the goal, but whose abilities can never reach it, except in imagination. In our opinion, with Mr. Georg Henschel as conductor and with the old fogysm wiped out and more progressive ideas substituted in the counsels of the managers, the Harvard Musical Association will receive the support of the patrons of music in this city, and become, next season, an artistic and financial success. Courier Nov. 6, 1881 W. D. Howells

Is Henschel Qualified to Wield a Baton?

OUR esteemed contemporary, the Boston Home Journal, seems to take the same views as our own correspondent upon Mr. Georg Henschel's lack of ability or experience to conduct the symphony concerts: "Where is the foundation for the assertion that such an organization cannot fail to be a success under such a conductor as Mr. Henschel? When and where did that gentleman win his reputation as a conductor? He has, it is true, conducted one work of his own before the Boston public, but every musician knows, as well as many others, that a man may well and successfully conduct his own orchestral work and be but a dire failure in presenting and conducting the works of others. Mr. Henschel came to us first heralded as an oratorio singer par excellence, and the assertion was made that his reputation in England was so great that he could give the tempo to the greatest known conductors. What has time proved? The utter falseness of all this heraldry. He has an unpleasant voice of poor quality. He is an excellent musician and much more successful in other fields than oratorio. In England, Mr. Henschel sang once only, for the Sacred Harmonic Society of London, a society which makes the reputation of an artist. At the time of Mr. Henschel's début here he came as a singer, and especially an oratorio singer. No one has received more praise for so little real desert in that line than he. Combined with a voice which is in no wise pleasing, he did some inartistic things which have been a matter of surprise to many as being utterly ignored by critics. A habit of slurring the notes in a run, which would be severely reprimanded in an American singer, passed entirely unnoticed, either through the musical ignorance of those who listened, or from the bias of unwise friendship. As a pianist and composer Mr. Henschel shone far more brightly than as a singer, while as a conductor he has yet to make his reputation."

Boston Symphony Concerts. The sale of season tickets for the series of twenty symphony concerts under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction began at Music Hall this morning, and will continue until further notice. There were seventy-five people in line at six o'clock, some of them having been there all night. One person is credited with having appeared on the scene at 3 P. M. yesterday. Sept 5, 1881

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Concerts. Sept. 10, 1881.
An opportunity offering during the past week, a chat was had with Mr. Georg Henschel in regard to his plans for the series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra next winter under his direction. It was quite evident from Mr. Henschel's talk that he has the full confidence of Mr. H. L. Higginson, and that the views of both gentlemen were in entire harmony in regard to the conduct of the concerts already referred to at some length in these columns. The importance of such a joint agreement as to the details of such a great undertaking will be fully appreciated by all familiar with the danger attending all public enterprises where a difference of opinion exists at the outset, even in regard to minor matters, and it is quite evident that the scheme of the concerts is practically to be worked out according to Mr. Henschel's ideas, thus putting the personal responsibility for its success or failure upon his shoulders. It appears that the membership of the orchestra has been very nearly completed, and that every man will be bound by a personal contract, stipulating his exact duties, and providing equitable fines for non-compliance with its provisions. Without giving actual figures, it may be said that a generous sum (50 per cent. more than heretofore) is paid every member for his services, while, on the other hand, these services are described and set forth in a clear, business like manner, leaving no chance for misinterpretations, and fixing the hours and dates of the service so distinctly that all other engagements of the members may be made to harmonize with their duties in the employ of Mr. Higginson, instead of making the orchestral engagements a secondary matter, as has too frequently been the case heretofore. It will thus be seen that a permanent orchestra has at last been secured; that is, an orchestra of the same membership for the entire season which shall attend all the rehearsals and all the concerts directed by Mr. Henschel. One other gain will be made by Mr. Henschel's arrangements—the so-called public rehearsal will be a rehearsal in fact as in name, and no attempt be made to give it the character of a public performance, as is the case with the public orchestral rehearsals in New York and Brooklyn.

THE PROGRAMMES.

Much curiosity has been expressed as to the character of the programmes for these concerts, and upon this subject Mr. Henschel spoke very freely, his plans having been fully considered as regards the general character and special features of the season's work. The presentation in regular order of the nine great symphonies of Beethoven is the central idea of the winter's concerts, their production being so arranged as to allow of the introduction of novelties in alternation, and to have the ninth symphony given at the final concert for the season. The programmes will be restricted to two hours each, and introduce a soloist, vocal or instrumental, at each concert. The arrangement will be first and always an overture, second the soloist, third the symphony, then an intermission to afford ample rest for audience and performers alike, fourth the soloist and fifth some light or brilliant orchestral selection like ballet music from the standard composers' works, or some composition calculated to leave a happy impression and send the audience away in a happy mood, as after a season of enjoyment. Mr. Henschel will include a number of new works never produced in this country in the season's programmes, but these will not be selected merely as novelties, but as works worthy of giving the conscientious study needed for their proper presentation. Mr. Henschel maintains that the great public can be won to

Is Henschel Qualified to Wield a Baton?

OUR esteemed contemporary, the Boston Home Journal, seems to take the same views as our own correspondent upon Mr. Georg Henschel's lack of ability or experience to conduct the symphony concerts: "Where is the foundation for the assertion that such an organization cannot fail to be a success under such a conductor as Mr. Henschel? When and where did that gentleman win his reputation as a conductor? He has, it is true, conducted one work of his own before the Boston public, but every musician knows, as well as many others, that a man may well and successfully conduct his own orchestral work and be but a dire failure in presenting and conducting the works of others. Mr. Henschel came to us first heralded as an oratorio singer par excellence, and the assertion was made that his reputation in England was so great that he could give the tempo to the greatest known conductors. What has time proved? The utter falseness of all this heraldry. He has an unpleasant voice of poor quality. He is an excellent musician and much more successful in other fields than oratorio. In England, Mr. Henschel sang once only, for the Sacred Harmonic Society of London, a society which makes the reputation of an artist. At the time of Mr. Henschel's debut here he came as a singer, and especially an oratorio singer. No one has received more praise for so little real desert in that line than he. Combined with a voice which is in no wise pleasing, he did some inartistic things which have been a matter of surprise to many as being utterly ignored by critics. A habit of slurring the notes in a run, which would be severely reprimanded in an American singer, passed entirely unnoticed, either through the musical ignorance of those who listened, or from the bias of unwise friendship. As a pianist and composer Mr. Henschel shone far more brightly than as a singer, while as a conductor he has yet to make his reputation."

Boston Symphony Concerts. The sale of season tickets for the series of twenty symphony concerts under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction began at Music Hall this morning, and will continue until further notice. There were seventy-five people in line at six o'clock, some of them having been there all night. One person is credited with having appeared on the scene at 3 P. M. yesterday. Sept 5. 1881

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Symphony Concerts. Sept 10. 1881

An opportunity offering during the past week, a chat was had with Mr. Georg Henschel in regard to his plans for the series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra next winter under his direction. It was quite evident from Mr. Henschel's talk that he has the full confidence of Mr. H. L. Higginson, and that the views of both gentlemen were in entire harmony in regard to the conduct of the concerts already referred to at some length in these columns. The importance of such a joint agreement as to the details of such a great undertaking will be fully appreciated by all familiar with the danger attending all public enterprises where a difference of opinion exists at the outset, even in regard to minor matters, and it is quite evident that the scheme of the concerts is practically to be worked out according to Mr. Henschel's ideas, thus putting the personal responsibility for its success or failure upon his shoulders. It appears that the membership of the orchestra has been very nearly completed, and that every man will be bound by a personal contract, stipulating his exact duties, and providing equitable fines for non-compliance with its provisions. Without giving actual figures, it may be said that a generous sum (50 per cent. more than heretofore) is paid every member for his services, while, on the other hand, these services are described and set forth in a clear, business like manner, leaving no chance for misinterpretations, and fixing the hours and dates of the service so distinctly that all other engagements of the members may be made to harmonize with their duties in the employ of Mr. Higginson, instead of making the orchestral engagements a secondary matter, as has too frequently been the case heretofore. It will thus be seen that a permanent orchestra has at last been secured; that is, an orchestra of the same membership for the entire season which shall attend all the rehearsals and all the concerts directed by Mr. Henschel. One other gain will be made by Mr. Henschel's arrangements—the so-called public rehearsal will be a rehearsal in fact as in name, and no attempt be made to give it the character of a public performance, as is the case with the public orchestral rehearsals in New York and Brooklyn.

THE PROGRAMMES.

Much curiosity has been expressed as to the character of the programmes for these concerts, and upon this subject Mr. Henschel spoke very freely, his plans having been fully considered as regards the general character and special features of the season's work. The presentation in regular order of the nine great symphonies of Beethoven is the central idea of the winter's concerts, their production being so arranged as to allow of the introduction of novelties in alternation, and to have the ninth symphony given at the final concerts for the season. The programmes will be restricted to two hours each, and introduce a soloist, vocal or instrumental, at each concert. The arrangement will be first and always an overture, second the soloist, third the symphony, then an intermission to afford ample rest for audience and performers alike, fourth the soloist and fifth some light or brilliant orchestral selection like ballet music from the standard composers' works, or some composition calculated to leave a happy impression and send the audience away in a happy mood, as after a season of enjoyment. Mr. Henschel will include a number of new works never produced in this country in the season's programmes, but these will not be selected merely as novelties, but as works worthy of giving the conscientious study needed for their proper presentation. Mr. Henschel maintains that the great public can be won to

A full appreciation of all that is truly best in the work of the world's composers if concert programmes be so arranged that the audiences are not surfeited with heavy compositions. With proper care in affording strong contrasts and closing each programme with a selection calculated to brighten and rest the audience, we believe that a genuine appreciation of all the great symphonies will be shown by his next season's audiences.

THE ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Henschel spoke in the highest terms of the material which Boston can furnish for orchestral work, saying that nowhere in Europe could better musicians be had than those who are recognized as the members of the Harvard and Handel and Haydn orchestras. His single criticism upon these players will undoubtedly be admitted a just one by the gentlemen themselves, as it is that they appear to have so many other things to do that their constant thought is the probability of an early ending to the rehearsal or concert rather than an interested and enthusiastic desire to have it such an effort as shall reflect the highest credit upon each individual member. Mr. Henschel said that he considered that he was being hired as a member of the new organization by Mr. Higginson, and that every other member would share with him whatever credit the Boston symphony orchestra shall win for itself in the coming concerts. He believes it to be possible to create an esprit de corps among the musicians, which shall make every musician take as great a personal interest in the success of the concerts as he feels himself. Some doubts have been expressed as to the amount of ability possessed by Mr. Henschel for the position of conductor, and his lack of experience in this department of musical work has been referred to as a cause for these doubts. Mr. Henschel's studies were for many years directed to the especial purpose of fitting him as an orchestral leader, and, although his success as a vocalist has postponed till now his regular assumption of the baton, his fitness for such work was so generally acknowledged in England that earnest efforts were made to secure him as the leader of the Liverpool Philharmonic society at the time of Sir Julius Benedict's withdrawal from its direction. With such a scheme of programmes, such an organization for presenting the great works contemplated, such an able director, such a popular scale of prices and such a financial backing, the Boston symphony orchestra concerts of 1881-82 should give an impetus to musical affairs in this city such as has not been experienced for a decade of years.

Among the artists whom Mr. Henschel has induced to come here from abroad and join the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Herr C. Bayr-hoffer, a 'cellist whose thorough training as a musician, aside from his technical mastery of violoncello, will place him in the foremost rank of the Boston musical profession. He was for several years a pupil of Joachim Raff; and he also studied with Crossmann, a noted teacher of the 'cello at Frankfort-on-the-Main. Herr Bayr-hoffer, at the solicitation of Mr. Eichberg, has connected himself with the Boston Conservatory of Music.

That Permanent Orchestra --The Problem Solved.

Music in the Public Schools --General News.

X y desired

The straightforward, business-like statement concerning a series of symphony concerts to be given next season, which appeared a few mornings since over the signature of H. L. Higginson, was entirely satisfying to those personally acquainted with Mr. Higginson, but the independent character of the statement left the public at large in doubt as to its genuineness. It is hardly a matter of surprise that, after the problem "How can a permanent orchestra be sustained in Boston?" had puzzled the brains of enthusiasts in the cause of music here for a decade or more, the reliability of such a complete solution should be questioned at first. Mr. Higginson has practically said by his announcement: "I will supply Boston with an orchestra of 60 musicians. Mr. Georg Henschel will conduct it, and 20 concerts will be given, with programmes selected by Mr. Henschel, each Saturday evening from the middle of October, 1881, to the middle of March, 1882; the admission will be 25 and 50 cents, and the tickets will be put on sale to the public at large without restrictions." It is perfectly evident that, under no circumstances, will the receipts equal the expenditures for this series of concerts, and Mr. Higginson does not expect that they will. A member of the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co., he is amply able to meet all the expenses incidental to the carrying out of his purpose as set forth in his announcement. He ~~desires~~ no assistance and has made his plans public, after the careful consideration which any successful business man gives all matters before entering upon their accomplishment. It is entirely safe to assert that no citizen of Boston ever matured a plan for the advantage of his fellows with less ostentation than Mr. Higginson in this affair, and the practical benefit to Boston can hardly be overestimated. No programme will be presented until the orchestra has had it in ample rehearsal, and no pecuniary considerations will hamper the conductor in this careful preparation for each performance. The final rehearsal will be made public at a uniform charge of 25 cents, and, as these will occur in the afternoon, opportunities will be afforded for all classes to hear the Boston symphony orchestra during the coming season, that being the name selected. Mr. Higginson claims no merit for this radical innovation upon the traditions of public concert giving, holding it to be a duty, which every American owes, to do something with the means at his command for the benefit of his fellows. He has not taken this step with a view to antagonize any one, or any body or association, but merely to supply Boston with a permanent orchestra which shall reflect credit upon the city, and he has taken what to him is the most practical way to accomplish this result. Details of the programme, etc., will be made public early in the fall, and no applications for tickets will be heeded, as the sale will not occur for some months, after due public notice.

a full appreciation of all that is truly best in the work of the world's composers if concert programmes be so arranged that the audiences are not surfeited with heavy compositions. With proper care in affording strong contrasts and closing each programme with a selection calculated to brighten and rest the audience, we believe that a genuine appreciation of all the great symphonies will be shown by his next season's audiences.

THE ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Henschel spoke in the highest terms of the material which Boston can furnish for orchestral work, saying that nowhere in Europe could better musicians be had than those who are recognized as the members of the Harvard and Handel and Haydn orchestras. His single criticism upon these players will undoubtedly be admitted a just one by the gentlemen themselves, as it is that they appear to have so many other things to do that their constant thought is the probability of an early ending to the rehearsal or concert rather than an interested and enthusiastic desire to have it such an effort as shall reflect the highest credit upon each individual member. Mr. Henschel said that he considered that he was being hired as a member of the new organization by Mr. Higginson, and that every other member would share with him whatever credit the Boston symphony orchestra shall win for itself in the coming concerts. He believes it to be possible to create an esprit de corps among the musicians, which shall make every musician take as great a personal interest in the success of the concerts as he feels himself. Some doubts have been expressed as to the amount of ability possessed by Mr. Henschel for the position of conductor, and his lack of experience in this department of musical work has been referred to as a cause for these doubts. Mr. Henschel's studies were for many years directed to the especial purpose of fitting him as an orchestral leader, and, although his success as a vocalist has postponed till now his regular assumption of the baton, his fitness for such work was so generally acknowledged in England that earnest efforts were made to secure him as the leader of the Liverpool Philharmonic society at the time of Sir Julius Benedict's withdrawal from its direction. With such a scheme of programmes, such an organization for presenting the great works contemplated, such an able director, such a popular scale of prices and such a financial backing, the Boston symphony orchestra concerts of 1881-82 should give an impetus to musical affairs in this city such as has not been experienced for a decade of years.

Among the artists whom Mr. Henschel has induced to come here from abroad and join the Boston Symphony Orchestra is Herr C. Bayr-hoffer, a 'cellist whose thorough training as a musician, aside from his technical mastery of violoncello, will place him in the foremost rank of the Boston musical profession. He was for several years a pupil of Joachim Raff; and he also studied with Crossmann, a noted teacher of the 'cello at Frankfort-on-the-Main. Herr Bayr-hoffer, at the solicitation of Mr. Eichberg, has connected himself with the Boston Conservatory of Music.

That Permanent Orchestra --The Problem Solved.

Music in the Public Schools

--General News.

X y desires

The straightforward, business-like statement concerning a series of symphony concerts to be given next season, which appeared a few mornings since over the signature of H. L. Higginson, was entirely satisfying to those personally acquainted with Mr. Higginson, but the independent character of the statement left the public at large in doubt as to its genuineness. It is hardly a matter of surprise that, after the problem "How can a permanent orchestra be sustained in Boston?" had puzzled the brains of enthusiasts in the cause of music here for a decade or more, the reliability of such a complete solution should be questioned at first. Mr. Higginson has practically said by his announcement: "I will supply Boston with an orchestra of 60 musicians. Mr. Georg Henschel will conduct it, and 20 concerts will be given, with programmes selected by Mr. Henschel, each Saturday evening from the middle of October, 1881, to the middle of March, 1882; the admission will be 25 and 50 cents, and the tickets will be put on sale to the public at large without restrictions." It is perfectly evident that, under no circumstances, will the receipts equal the expenditures for this series of concerts, and Mr. Higginson does not expect that they will. A member of the banking house of Lee, Higginson & Co., he is amply able to meet all the expenses incidental to the carrying out of his purpose as set forth in his announcement. He ~~desires~~ no assistance and has made his plans public, after the careful consideration which any successful business man gives all matters before entering upon their accomplishment. It is entirely safe to assert that no citizen of Boston ever matured a plan for the advantage of his fellows with less ostentation than Mr. Higginson in this affair, and the practical benefit to Boston can hardly be overestimated. No programme will be presented until the orchestra has had it in ample rehearsal, and no pecuniary considerations will hamper the conductor in this careful preparation for each performance. The final rehearsal will be made public at a uniform charge of 25 cents, and, as these will occur in the afternoon, opportunities will be afforded for all classes to hear the Boston symphony orchestra during the coming season, that being the name selected. Mr. Higginson claims no merit for this radical innovation upon the traditions of public concert giving, holding it to be a duty, which every American owes, to do something with the means at his command for the benefit of his fellows. He has not taken this step with a view to antagonize any one, or any body or association, but merely to supply Boston with a permanent orchestra which shall reflect credit upon the city, and he has taken what to him is the most practical way to accomplish this result. Details of the programme, etc., will be made public early in the fall, and no applications for tickets will be heeded, as the sale will not occur for some months, after due public notice.

SEPT. 10.—For a scheme, conceived in a spirit of philanthropy and secured against loss by the generosity of a single citizen, the Boston Symphony Concerts are placed before the public with a perfection of detail which, instead of securing the greatest good for the greatest number, invites an exclusive patronage by its methods of coarse tickets and auction premiums. This is legitimate enough in ordinary enterprise, but these concerts have a founder—Mr. Higginson—and a purpose, which it is said by those nearest to him is to bring within the means of everyone the work of a complete orchestra, and these methods should play no part. It should be known that twenty-four orchestral concerts are given each year in Boston by an orchestra of 70, directed by Mr. Henschel, who has at his command an unlimited treasury, whose players are bound to him for certain days of the week, and who has absolute control of the programme to be performed; that tickets to these concerts are publicly sold for the season at a price equal to twenty-five and fifty cents for each concert; that the patronage of the concerts is from the best musical element of the place; that they buy the whole house (with a very few seats out of two thousand excepted) for their winter's enjoyment; that many people cannot go because of the large payment required for a season ticket; that Boston deceives herself in thinking she has within her bounds a grand enterprise for the destruction of the common place in music through the reaching down of the best and the highest to those who will only look; that the patron of the scheme draws his cheque for ten thousand dollars deficit each season, with probable unconcern as to the path his bounty takes. Somebody ought to tell him that that which might benefit and help thousands is now the delightful property of the few, and that if his concerts are to become an institution among us they should be less exclusive, for the low prices, even for the present patrons, have seriously affected the market value of similar enterprises in Boston. People will not now so quickly, as in former years, pay a fair price for an equally good thing presented by other managers, unless in addition to the work announced there is the attraction of the eminent composer or soloist. Of this the Handel and Haydn Society can testify.

Handel Musical.

April 6, 1881 THE NEW "RING."

The fact that a new and permanent orchestra is to be established in Boston, to the annihilation of other more humble organizations, has become a widely heralded fact; but while various assertions are made of the undoubted success of this new combination, thus far no real proofs of a good foundation for these assertions have been forthcoming. The conductorship of this great organization is to be in the hands of Mr. Georg Henschel, a musician; the money is to come from the well filled coffers of Mr. Higginson, a business man. So far this is well; but where is the foundation for the assertion that such an organization cannot fail to be a success under such a conductor as Mr. Henschel? When and where did that gentleman win his reputation as a conductor? He has, it is true, conducted one work of his own before the Boston public, but every musician knows, as well as many others, that a man may well and successfully conduct his own orchestral work, and be but a dire failure in presenting and conducting the works of others. Some protest is certainly needed to stem this tide of adulation that rises and breaks at the feet of Mr. Henschel. We have had conductors in Boston and good ones. It is a mistaken idea of Mr. Henschel's friends—if not of his own—that we have waited here, all unconscious of our own musical poverty and great needs, for this musical trinity combined in the person of Mr. Henschel,—oratorio exponent, composer, and orchestral conductor. We are not, and have not been, half as ignorant as they may suppose. We have had conductors among us who have raised us to an enthusiasm of appreciation, which, while opening our musical eyes to much that we need, has equally shown us much that we lack, but not a lack which to our mind can be certainly filled by the conductorship of one unskilled being made the substitute for years of real work among us. The great trouble in America has been the more than willingness to accept, at his or her own estimate, the man or woman who, heralded by friends, or by personal assertion, comes to us from abroad. Mr. Henschel came to us first heralded as an oratorio singer "par excellence," and the assertion was made that his reputation in England was so great that he could give the tempo to the greatest known conductors. What has time proved? The utter falseness of all this heraldry. He has an unpleasant voice of poor quality. He is an excellent musician and much more successful in other fields than oratorio. In England, Mr. Henschel sung once only, for the Sacred Harmonic Society of London,—a society which makes the reputation of an artist. A singer may sing all through England, for years as many good English artists do, without ever being admitted within the sacred walls of Exeter Hall as a vocalist of that society, and once engaged and satisfactory, his future reputation means more than all other successes in England can give. At the time of Mr. Henschel's debut here he came as a singer, and specially an oratorio singer. No one has received more praise for so little real desert, in that line, than he. Combined with a voice which is in no wise pleasing, he did some inartistic things which have been a matter of surprise to many, as being utterly ignored by critics. A habit of slurring the notes in a run, which would be severely reprimanded in an American singer, passed entirely unnoticed either through the musical ignorance of those who listened, or from the bias of unwise friendship. As a pianist and composer Mr. Henschel shone far more brightly than as a singer, while as a conductor he has yet to make his reputation.

At the first proposals concerning a new and permanent orchestra, the assertion was made that all "rings" were to be done away with; but this certainly is not so. The result is thus far only the formation of a new ring, which, ignoring all past conductors and their great work in Boston during the last twenty-five years, shouts, "The king is dead; long live the king," before it is seen whether the new claimant has even a right to the succession. We have no desire that Mr. Henschel shall do aught else but succeed, but this taking success for granted is unwise. Other things beside the mere mechanical part of conducting will be called for from one occupying the new position. A courtesy to other artists, which has been lacking in the past relations of Mr. Henschel; a liberality in the matter of other ability outside his own family, and more consideration toward the members of the orchestra, will do much to raise the position and its occupant in the minds of many, whose observation of Mr. Henschel's mannerisms at concerts and annoying suggestions to orchestral players, combined with a manner towards singers (sopranos noticeably) and conductors, giving to an audience an impression that their defects were really unbearable—have done much to create an unpleasant feeling in musical circles. Let the success of the new orchestra be won by true effort, not the success of press or prejudiced friends.

And while we hail the new star, let us not forget the others that have brightened our musical horizon for many years, and instead of setting have been approaching the zenith. The new organization is born, but the others are not dead; and whatever of excellence there may be in the new orchestra has been culled from the strength of its predecessors; and much of the excellence which we believe will be the outcome of this movement, will be for some time due quite as much to excellence of conductorship in the past, as to any new power in the present.

An English paper says: "Herr Henschel will shortly leave for the United States, where he is engaged to conduct a series of orchestral concerts in Boston. This will be new work for the clever baritone with the harsh voice, and we shall all hope he will succeed so well with the baton that he will be able to follow the excellent example of Sir Michael Costa and sing no more."

FRANCISCO, CAL., JUNE, 1¹⁸⁹⁷

Boston is to have a permanent orchestra under the following favorable circumstances: Mr. H. L. Higginson, a wealthy banker and musical enthusiast, proposes to form a select band of sixty musicians, to give a series of twenty concerts at the Boston Music Hall, under the conductorship of the famous Herr Georg Henschel, to take place once a week, Saturday evenings, beginning about the middle of October, and continuing up to the middle of March. "The price of season tickets with reserved seats, for the whole series of evening concerts, will be either $10 or $5, according to position. Single tickets with reserved seats will be 75 cents or 25 cents, according to location. Besides the concerts there will be a public rehearsal on one afternoon of every week, with single tickets at 25 cents, and no reserved seats." The deficit, if any, of this proposed series is to be made up by Mr. Higginson. What a wealth of enjoyment is promised in Mr. Higginson's modest little circular! Oh! for a few such men in our midst! We could name half a dozen of our wealthy citizens, who, either individually or collectively, would not feel a pang at the paltry loss of a few hundred dollars! Why should not we have a series of say twenty orchestral evening concerts—say, at a subscription price of $10 for the twenty concerts—single admission 50 cents: admission for subscribers to the last rehearsal, 25 cents? The thing is feasible—to our mind. Let Mr. Louis Homeier gather together a picked orchestra of thirty men, who have plenty of time for rehearsals in the daytime, and who could be persuaded to send substitutes once a week to the places of amusement where they may have permanent positions. With a guarantee of positive engagement for twenty concerts, let these thirty musicians make some personal sacrifice for music's sake, in giving their spare time to frequent and careful rehearsals on programmes made up of half classical and half light music, to please all tastes. Let the owners or lessees of Platt's Hall, with the assured rent of the twenty concerts, change the hall into a well ventilated, draught-proof and newly-seated room, consulting therein the oft expressed wish of its present patrons. Last of all, let the Bohemian and Loring Clubs, the Orchestral Union, and similar organizations, take the matter in hand as a body, enlist the sympathies of the rich in the good cause; and if the work is well done, who shall say it will not be a success? The concerts need not be a money making speculation. The conductor could be paid a fair salary, as is done in European cities; and the surplus, if any, might be put aside for a future series of concerts. It has been suggested that a series of evening orchestral concerts could only be successful if it could be made the "fashion" to go to them. And why should it not be so? Let a chosen few of the young ladies and gentlemen who move in fashionable society make it a matter of pride and honor to solicit the co-operation of their many friends. No matter how we get the concerts, so long as we get them. The end justifies the means, and the end in this case is the instructive, elevating and purifying influence of good music on a community, which for lack of better music takes it in a light form—with beer.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Prospects for the Season of 1881-2.

Orchestral Concerts.

The broad-minded liberality of Mr. H. L. Higginson justifies the announcement of the orchestral concerts as the leading attraction of the season of 1881-82, and it can safely be asserted that his action has put Boston on an equality with the great musical centres of the old world in this class of public entertainments. The absence of Mr. Georg Henschel, the conductor, in Europe, makes it impossible to give in detail the entire scheme of programmes of the Boston symphony orchestra, but sufficient has been learned regarding them to indicate their general character, and some of the arrangements for this series of concerts will also be found interesting. The orchestra will number 60 musicians, with Mr. Bernhard Listemann first violin, and it is arranged that there shall be sufficient rehearsals to properly prepare each programme. The 20 concerts, on each Saturday evening beginning Oct. 22 (except Christmas time), will commence at 8 o'clock and conclude at 10, or as near that hour as practicable, the two-hour limit being adhered to as much as possible. At the sale of seats, beginning tomorrow at Music Hall, two-fifths of the hall will be offered at $5 for each seat for the 20 concerts, the remaining three-fifths being held at $10 each. At the sale tomorrow no more than six seats will be delivered to any one purchaser. Soloists of ability will appear at each concert, and the engagement of Miss Annie Louise Cary and Mr. Myron W. Whitney indicates the class of talent to be employed. The arrangement of the programmes will be, first an overture, then the soloist, following this the symphony, and then an intermission. The soloist will follow, and the concerts conclude with some brilliant or characteristic composition calculated to rest the hearer and leave a pleasant impression of the evening's concert. In the list of symphonies, the "immortal nine" of Beethoven will form the central feature, being presented in alternation with the masterworks of other composers, and so arranged that the ninth, or choral, symphony shall be presented at the concluding concert. The catholicity shown in the scheme of programmes arranged is indicated by the composers represented. In addition to the Beethoven symphonies there will be represented in this class of composition the works of Mozart, Mendelssohn, Haydn, Schumann and Brahms. The overtures will include the writings of Beethoven, Weber, Mendelssohn, Gluck, Cherubini, Schubert, Max Bruch, Gounod, Rossini, Goldmark, Schumann, Nicolai, Mozart, and in the line of orchestral music of a miscellaneous character will be found compositions by Gounod, Wagner, Boieldieu, Liszt, Bach, Rubinstein, Meyerbeer, Valkmann, Lachner, Berlioz and Auber. Each concert will be preceded by a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon, to which a uniform charge of 25 cents will be made, no seats being reserved.

The interest in musical matters during the coming week will largely centre on the opening of the series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction and the patronage of Mr. H. L. Higginson, to whose generous, liberal-minded action the enterprise owes its origin. The programme selected by Mr. Henschel for the first concert, announced for next Saturday evening, is as follows:

Overture, "Dedication of the house," op. 124,Beethoven
 "I have lost my Eurydice"Gluck
 Miss Annie Louise Cary.
 Symphony, B flatHaydn
 Ballet, music from "Rosamonde"Schubert
 Song, from "Odysseus"Max Bruch
 Miss Annie Louise Cary.
 Festival overtureWeber

The hour for beginning these concerts during the season will be 8 o'clock, and the programmes will be planned for two hours each. The first public rehearsal is fixed for Friday afternoon next, beginning at 3 o'clock. Mr. Henschel desires that it be distinctly understood that these are to be rehearsals open to the public, not concerts in any sense of the word. They are designed to afford students an opportunity to gain a familiarity with the programmes, and only this. The soloists have the option of appearing at this or the earlier rehearsals, so that no guarantee is given that they will be heard always at the Friday afternoon rehearsals. Many pleasant anticipations have been had concerning the success of this series of concerts, and every effort will be made to realize them.

TO THE MEMBERS

OF THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

ve to say a few words to you now, in order to avoid waste of time after our work a body of men are working together for one and the same end as you and I, unity and mutual understanding is required in order to achieve anything that is e of us, engaged for the concerts we are on the point of beginning, has been his powers, his talents have been considered valuable for that purpose. Every ore, should have a like interest as well as a like share in the success of our work, regard that I address you now, calling your attention to the following principal ch I urgently beg of you to acquaint yourselves thoroughly:—

be punctual. Better ten minutes before than one behind the time appointed.

as well as playing will cease the moment the conductor gives the sign for doing so.

mber of the orchestra, even supposing that his presence be not needed for the moment, during the time of the rehearsals and concerts without the consent of the conductor.

ios containing the parts will be closed after each rehearsal and concert.

ch as we are engaged for musical purposes, we will not talk about private matters during rehearsals and concerts.

at thus working together with perfect understanding, our labors will be crowned am, gentlemen,

Your obedient servant,

GEORG HENSCHEL

Evening
Sazette

MUSICAL. (Woolf)

Boston Symphony Concert.

The first of the series of Boston Symphony Concerts took place at Music Hall last night, inaugurating the public-spirited undertaking initiated by Mr. Mr. H. L. Higginson in the interest of musical art. There was a very large and brilliant audience present. The selections were very well balanced, and had the special merit of discreet length, the performances having ended by a quarter to ten, an example we should like to see more generally followed than it is in our musical entertainments. The programme contained but little that has not been made very familiar here from frequent repetition, and went beyond any precedent we have had for years in the direction of strict conservatism. If the works chosen for the opening are any indication of the policy to be pursued at these concerts, there is no danger that the followers of the old school will have any reasonable cause for complaint on the ground of a too-radical eclecticism.

Mr. Henschel has adopted an arrangement of the orchestra that is somewhat novel within our experience. The first violins were ranged in a semicircle about the conductor's desk, their leader being on his left. The second violins extended in another semicircle behind these, their leader being on the right. The altos, in turn, were ranged behind the seconds. The double basses, of which there were eight, were divided into two groups of four each; one set being placed above and behind the strings on the right, and the other in a similar position on the left. The eight cellos were separated in the same manner, and were seated in front of the basses. The advisability of such a disposition of the strings was not made clearly evident. The second violins and altos were not always heard distinctly, and in the more rapid passages, where the strings predominated, the effect was often confused, the seconds not passing clearly through the line in front of them, and the altos giving forth a still more smothered tone. The oboes and clarinets, being behind all these, were often muffled in effect, especially the former. The separation of the basses, also, was not conducive to the production of that solid body of sound they would have given forth had they been placed in the conventional manner. But the mixing of the first and second violins was the most questionable policy, and its great drawbacks were made strikingly manifest whenever these bodies had occasion to respond to each other. With so fine a mass of strings at his command, it is to be regretted that Mr. Henschel did not place them so that the best results could have been obtained from them. As for the orchestra itself, we may state at once that its work was splendidly done throughout. We doubt if we have ever had anything better here in the shape of orchestral playing than was vouchsafed on this occasion. It was almost flawless, not only in respect to technique, but in precision and brilliancy as well. Mr. Henschel, as a conductor, has the faculty of imbuing his players with his own spirit, and throughout he held them thoroughly in hand, and found them wholly responsive to his every sign. He leads with great fire and firmness, but at times with a violence of action and an unnecessarily wide sweep of the arm that often distracts the attention from the music. We shall probably become used to this peculiarity in his beating, but at present it is displeasing in its disturbing quality. The concert opened with Beethoven's overture, "The Consecration of the House," which received a remarkably spirited interpretation, though we think the movement was often too rapid, especially in the concluding portions. The next instrumental work was Haydn's symphony in B-flat (No. 12, Breitkopf & Haertel) one of the freshest and most delightful of its composer's works. We must confess that we are far from agreeing with Mr. Henschel's conception and interpretation of it. To us it seems that he totally misrepresented the opening movement in the rapid pace at which he took it. All of its grace and delicacy were hurried out of it, and nothing more un-Haydnesque could possibly be conceived than the fiery and stormy coloring that was given to it in this rendering. After so much fury at the outset, what came after was necessarily tame by comparison. It was as if the symphony had been stood on its head with its feet in the air. As far as the nuances were concerned, nothing could have been better; every mark was faithfully followed, and the luxury of a crescendo that did not begin too soon was had in perfection. It is true that every indication of forte was represented by fortissimo, but that was inevitable from the reading given to the movement. The exquisite andante was taken in a better tempo, but had a fury imparted to it at times that Haydn never dreamed of, and which gave it a hardness and rigidity that marred its suave character. The minuet was played more rapidly than its nature warranted, and the reading generally was coarse and heavy. The bright and gracefully playful finale also suffered from the tremendous pace at which it was taken. In fact, the interpretation was entirely unsatisfactory as far as the character given to the work was concerned. It was not Haydn but a noisy and fiery modern whom we heard. We cannot understand how so great a mistake could have been made in a work which tells its simple and delicate story as clearly as does this. Schubert's pretty and flowing ballet music from "Rosamunde" opened the second part, and was interpreted with a keen feeling for its refinement. It was the most satisfactory reading of the programme. A brilliant and dashing performance of Weber's "Jubel" overture closed the programme, the audience rising to its feet when "God Save the Queen" was heard at the end. Miss Annie Louise Cary was the soloist, and sang the air from Gluck's "Orpheus," in which she has been heard so often. In spite of the noble beauty of the air and the beautiful manner in which Miss Cary sings it, we cannot avoid the thought that she might extend her repertoire somewhat and give this selection a needed repose. In Penelope's scena from Max Bruch's "Odysseus," she sang gloriously, and in a large and dignified style that was as impressive as it was artistic. The fair singer has never been heard here to greater advantage, and richly deserved the enthusiastic recognition she received at the hands of the audience, which recalled her three times. The applause throughout the concert was frequent, and, though not always discriminating, was sincere and hearty. The effect of the whole was brilliant and pleasing in a general way, though not always satisfactory to exacting criticism.

The next concert will take place on Saturday evening, when will be performed: "Tragic Overture," by Brahms; Concerto for Piano, A minor, op. 16, by Grieg; Symphony No. 1, Beethoven; Piano solos; and March in B-flat, from op. 113, Franz Lachner.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

Berlioz has the following, anent the "Dedication of the House" overture by Beethoven, played last Saturday evening at the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra: "M. de Lenz says that Beethoven, walking one day with his friend Schindler, said, 'I have just hit upon two themes for an overture. One is fit to be treated in my own style, the other suits Handel's manner better; which would you advise me to take?' Schindler advised him (will it be believed?) to take the second theme. M. de Lenz says that Schindler ought to have known that Beethoven's genius reigned without a rival in the free symphonic style; that the severe style was, on the other hand, but a fence for him to vault over; that he did not feel himself at home in it; the overture produced no effect in consequence. Well, I once conducted a performance of this overture with a first-rate orchestra at the Conservatoire. The audience found that Handel's style was so badly reproduced that the overture was applauded with enthusiasm."

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the series of 20 concerts by the newly-organized Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the following being the programme;

Overture, op. 124, "Dedication of the House." Beethoven
 Air (Orpheus) Miss Annie Louise Cary. Gluck
 Symphony in B flat. Haydn
 (No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)
 Ballet music (Rosamunde). Schubert
 Scena (Odysseus). Max Bruch
 Miss Annie Louise Cary.
 Festival overture. Weber

Mr. Henschel was very cordially greeted upon his entrance, and the presentation of the programme was such as to fully justify the pleasant anticipations concerning his success as an orchestral leader. The body of musicians, numbering 67 in all, with 48 strings, was massed in a semicircle, the violins forming the inner rows, with the wood, wind and brasses back of them in the centre, and the cellos and double basses evenly divided, on either side of the conductor's stand, back of the violins. The arrangement appeared to be an advantageous one, and it certainly resulted happily, as the orchestra was more directly under the eye and subject to the will of the leader than when arranged after the usual form. There is no necessity for an extended criticism of the performance; suffice it to say that Mr. Henschel has the gift of controlling men, and that the musicians fully carried out his ideas in their rendering of the several numbers. Thus every movement was given with intelligence, no points were slurred, and the composer's ideas were made to stand forth with all their beauty and completeness. Mr. Henschel ignores all traditions in his methods of conducting, and evidently considers himself sufficient authority for any departure from accepted ways and customs. His successful justification in such a position. The audience was enthusiastic in its applause throughout the evening, but the generous plaudits showered upon the leader and his orchestra were as nothing to the spontaneous recognition of the superior excellence of Miss Cary's efforts in her two numbers. A considerable bit of patriotism was shown in the general response to the national air, which concludes the "Festival" overture, the audience rising to its feet as the first measures were sounded. Mr. Henschel very properly showed annoyance at the lack of courtesy on the part of some of the audience, in neglecting to give their undivided attention to the musical numbers, and the cause of his annoyance was given about equally by those whose lack of interest led them to continue their conversation after the tap of the conductor's baton, and those whose excessive interest led them to annoy all about them by their over-energetic following of the scores of the several numbers, with the incessant turning of leaves incidental to such action. Evidently the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra are to be very enjoyable events during the coming season.

THE FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT. (Elson)

The concert at Music Hall last evening was an event in Boston's musical history. It not only served to introduce a new conductor to our public, but it inaugurated a season which will probably be without a parallel in America, if we judge by the class of works which are to be given, and the worthy manner in which the different societies propose to produce them. The first programme was not a dazzling one, it gave nothing of the modern instrumental school, although the romantic element was not lacking. It was neither conservative nor radical; it was an enjoyable feast of good music, and it was wise not to commence with too great an attempt at "sensational." The selections were all of that class where classicist and populace can enjoyably meet; nothing was intricate, but nothing was trivial. This lack of intricacy makes it impossible to form a decided judgement of Mr. Henschel as a conductor by this programme. Yet, entire praise must be awarded both to him and the orchestra for the almost perfect manner in which it was carried out. His conducting was marked by many musicianly qualities.

There was no affectation, no unnecessary movements of arm or body, and very little use of the left hand. The beats were firm and intelligible; the tempi well understood although a slight nervousness may have been perceived in an occasional quickening of the time. That Mr. Henschel has the true conductor's magnetism, and controls his forces well, was apparent. There will be no danger of lifeless or cold readings in the Boston Symphony Concerts this season. More experience will give more ease in designating the different attacks in rapid movements. The concert begun with the Dedication Overture, Beethoven, which was written for the opening of the Josephstadt Theatre, October 3, 1832, and was admirably chosen to inaugurate the new enterprise. The grand work has been seldom heard here. The opening movement with its majestic horn and wood-wind phrases was finely given, although the bassoon runs were by no means loud or firm enough. The short triplet figure which introduces the allegro con brio was excellently played by the violins, and the shadings admirably carried out. The subsequent appearance of the same figure in flute and oboe was also deserving of praise. The Stretto showed Mr. Henschel as a spirited and fiery leader, and proved the care he had taken with his strings, the true foundation of every orchestra; they played as one man. Miss Cary sang che Faro senza Euaydice in a manner which proved a happy recovery from her recent throat troubles. The accompaniment (in the strings) was not absolutely pure in intonation. Her singing of the recitation and prayer from Bruch's Odysseus was of great artistic excellence, although her voice seemed a trifle fatigued at its close. She received a hearty ovation, but we were glad to see the firmness with which she resisted the demand of the encore fiend for "more." The accompaniment of the last named song calls for good horn playing, and this added much to the beauty of the number. Haydn's symphony in Bb (No. 12 Breitkopf edition) is a work of the simplest melodic beauty. Its minuet is charmingly dainty, and its first and last movements have characteristics not unlike rustic contradances. The violins have the brunt of the work, and they have it nobly, spite of the rather hastened tempo in which the last movement was taken. It was followed by another dance movement—Schubert's ever beautiful ballet music from Rosamund. This was also well given, although it could have been a little lighter at the first theme, and once the wood-wind swerved a little from control. There was certainly enough festivity in the concert, for the entertainment ended, as it had begun, with a festival overture—this time the Jubel Overture, by Weber, and it was interesting to compare contrasts of this composer with the broader touches of Beethoven. The solos of flute and oboe, as well as the figured work of the strings, were all that could be desired. We cannot quite understand why the audience should have risen at the English national anthem, even in this era of sympathy between the nations. An English audience would scarcely do as much for the Star Spangled Banner, if one of our composers should introduce it into a symphony or overture. The concert was a great success and the programme, in its reasonable length and calibre, was possibly modelled after those of the London Monday "pops"; but we shall hope for much more varied bills of fare later on in the series. Mr. Henschel has every cause to congratulate himself on the success of all that he has attempted in his initial performance. The second programme is to be as follows: Tragic Overture, Op. 81 (new), Brahms; Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 16, Edward Grieg; Symphony in C, No. 1, Beethoven; Piano Solo: a. Warum (Why?), Op. 12, No. 3, Schumann; b. Scherzo in C sharp minor, Op. 39, Chopin; March in B flat, from the Suite Op. 113, Franz Lachner; Mr. W. H. Sherwood being the pianist of the occasion.

THE FIRST CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

We have rarely heard in Boston Music hall so positive a hush as that which on Saturday evening followed Mr. Henschel's call to order. Musicians and audience waited, with a tension of nerves that was almost painful, for the first leading movement of the slender baton held so high and still in the new conductor's hand. The programme offered nothing new, and, therefore, was an excellent one for an occasion when a largely augmented orchestra was to make its first essay under a new director. All minds being at rest, then, as to the matter of the concert, were free to follow its manner with undistracted interest and curiosity.

An instant more and the grand opening chords of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture resounded through the hall with a crispness and unity of attack and an intensity and resonance of tone that were at once a performance and a promise. It was evident that Mr. Henschel had not only the determination, but also the power, to control the nearly seventy men who sat before him, and to inspire or to constrain them to carry out absolutely his instructions. Nor did the orchestra belie for a moment during the evening this first fine impression, and we can scarcely be charged with exaggeration if we say that such vigorous and splendid playing has not been heard in Boston before. And if, after three rehearsals, such discipline and such unity can be obtained, the only possible qualification in the attainment of an ideal standard must be looked for, not in any failure of the band, but in some error or indiscretion of their leader. So that the question which has yet to be answered, is whether Mr. Henschel will be the perfect director. It is too soon yet to answer that question. Mr. Henschel is a man who, while in his early prime, has learned much, and who is therefore competent to learn much more. He is a musician of the strongest convictions, and yet we do not believe him opinionated or uncatholic. Conducting almost entirely from memory, as he did, it was clear that he had given himself up to his task, that he knew what he wanted, and meant to have it. His beating, while not ungraceful, had an extent and variety of sweep that was at first quite distracting to the attention, but which was full of significance, and at times seemed fairly to draw out from the instruments a peculiar accent or to uphold them in a difficult passage. The idiosyncrasy of the man himself was easily recognizable in the general tone of the performance; indeed, one familiar with the characteristics of Mr. Henschel's singing might almost have predicated those of his leadership. Immense verve and vigor, an unhesitating choice and pursuit of accelerated tempi, and a dramatic breadth of delivery that now and then bordered close upon the declamatory, and consequently a general heightening of all effects of tone and color, were the traits which were most prominent all the evening through, and even the gently flowing melodies of Haydn's sweet B flat symphony were read with a dash and swing which were certainly inspiring, but as certainly were not Haydn, as we have been wont to understand him. The band were obedient enough to have made many a pianissimo, but Mr. Henschel never called upon them for one. It must be noted, however, that the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde" was given with exceeding delicacy of taste, and the vocal accompaniments were shaded as only a director who understands singing and singers could shade them.

Miss Cary was the vocalist of the evening, contributing the contralto scena from Bruch's "Odysseus" and the "Che faro" from Gluck's "Orpheus," both of which she sang in her very best manner and with that even beauty of tone which, after recent illness, we had not dared to expect. It is certainly quite time, however, that when a singer of Miss Cary's ample knowledge is engaged some less threadbare air than the latter might be chosen from her repertory. For thirty years it has been the stock song of contraltos, great and small, and only a very indulgent audience will hear it now with patience. Above all, when the proper phrasing and the true development of the climax are rendered impossible by the infelicitous adaptation of English words in which the very name of Eurydice is violently unaccentuated. The substitution of English for German text in music is well enough,

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

First Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The first of the series of 20 concerts by the newly-organized Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the following being the programme:

Overture, op. 124, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven
 Air (Orpheus), Miss Annie Louise Cary, Gluck
 Symphony in B flat, Haydn
 (No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)
 Ballet music (Rosamunde), Schubert
 Scene (Odysseus), Max Bruch
 Miss Annie Louise Cary.
 Festival overture, Weber

Mr. Henschel was very cordially greeted upon his entrance, and the presentation of the programme was such as to fully justify the pleasant anticipations concerning his success as an orchestral leader. The body of musicians, numbering 67 in all, with 48 strings, was massed in a semicircle, the violins forming the inner rows, with the wood, wind and brasses back of them in the centre, and the cellos and double basses evenly divided, on either side of the conductor's stand, back of the violins. The arrangement appeared to be an advantageous one, and it certainly resulted happily, as the orchestra was more directly under the eye and subject to the will of the leader than when arranged after the usual form. There is no necessity for an extended criticism of the performance; suffice it to say that Mr. Henschel has the gift of controlling men, and that the musicians fully carried out his ideas in their rendering of the several numbers. Thus every movement was given with intelligence, no points were slurred, and the composer's ideas were made to stand forth with all their beauty and completeness. Mr. Henschel ignores all traditions in his methods of conducting, and evidently considers himself sufficient authority for any departure from accepted ways and customs. His success fully justifies him in such a position. The audience was enthusiastic in its applause throughout the evening, but the generous plaudits showered upon the leader and his orchestra were as nothing to the spontaneous recognition of the superior excellence of Miss Cary's efforts in her two numbers. A considerable bit of patriotism was shown in the general response to the national air, which concludes the "Festival" overture, the audience rising to its feet as the first measures were sounded. Mr. Henschel very properly showed annoyance at the lack of courtesy on the part of some of the audience, in neglecting to give their undivided attention to the musical numbers, and the cause of his annoyance was given about equally by those whose lack of interest led them to continue their conversation after the tap of the conductor's baton, and those whose excessive interest led them to annoy all about them by their over-energetic following of the scores of the several numbers, with the incessant turning of leaves incidental to such action. Evidently the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra are to be very enjoyable events during the coming season.

THE FIRST BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT. (Elson)

The concert at Music Hall last evening was an event in Boston's musical history. It not only served to introduce a new conductor to our public, but it inaugurated a season which will probably be without a parallel in America, if we judge by the class of works which are to be given, and the worthy manner in which the different societies propose to produce them. The first programme was not a dazzling one, it gave nothing of the modern instrumental school, although the romantic element was not lacking. It was neither conservative nor radical; it was an enjoyable feast of good music, and it was wise not to commence with too great an attempt at "sensation." The selections were all of that class where classicist and populace can enjoyably meet; nothing was intricate, but nothing was trivial. This lack of intricacy makes it impossible to form a decided judgement of Mr. Henschel as a conductor by this programme. Yet, entire praise must be awarded both to him and the orchestra for the almost perfect manner in which it was carried out. His conducting was marked by many musicianly qualities.

There was no affectation, no unnecessary movements of arm or body, and very little use of the left hand. The beats were firm and intelligible; the tempi well understood although a slight nervousness may have been perceived in an occasional quickening of the time. That Mr. Henschel has the true conductor's magnetism, and controls his forces well, was apparent. There will be no danger of lifeless or cold readings in the Boston Symphony Concerts this season. More experience will give more ease in designating the different attacks in rapid movements. The concert begun with the Dedication Overture, Beethoven, which was written for the opening of the Josephstadt Theatre, October 3, 1832, and was admirably chosen to inaugurate the new enterprise. The grand work has been seldom heard here. The opening movement with its majestic horn and wood-wind phrases was finely given, although the bassoon runs were by no means loud or firm enough. The short triplet figure which introduces the allegro con brio was excellently played by the violins, and the shadings admirably carried out. The subsequent appearance of the same figure in flute and oboe was also deserving of praise. The Stretto showed Mr. Henschel as a spirited and fiery leader, and proved the care he had taken with his strings, the true foundation of every orchestra; they played as one man. Miss Cary sang che Faro senza Eurydice in a manner which proved a happy recovery from her recent throat troubles. The accompaniment (in the strings) was not absolutely pure in intonation. Her singing of the recitation and prayer from Bruch's Odysseus was of great artistic excellence, although her voice seemed a trifle fatigued at its close. She received a hearty ovation, but we were glad to see the firmness with which she resisted the demand of the encore fiend for "more." The accompaniment of the last named song calls for good horn playing, and this added much to the beauty of the number. Haydn's symphony in Bb (No. 12 Breitkopf edition) is a work of the simplest melodic beauty. Its minuet is charmingly dainty, and its first and last movements have characteristics not unlike rustic contradances. The violins have the brunt of the work, and they gave it nobly, spite of the rather hastened tempo in which the last movement was taken. It was followed by another dance movement—Schubert's ever beautiful ballet music from Rosamunde. This was also well given, although it could have been a little lighter at the first theme, and once the wood-wind swerved a little from control. There was certainly enough festivity in the concert, for the entertainment ended, as it had begun, with a festival overture—this time the Jubel Overture, by Weber, and it was interesting to compare contrasts of this composer with the broader touches of Beethoven. The solos of flute and oboe, as well as the figured work of the strings, were all that could be desired. We cannot quite understand why the audience should have risen at the English national anthem, even in this era of sympathy between the nations. An English audience would scarcely do as much for the Star Spangled Banner, if one of our composers should introduce it into a symphony or overture. The concert was a great success and the programme, in its reasonable length and calibre, was possibly modelled after those of the London Monday "pops"; but we shall hope for much more varied bills of fare later on in the series. Mr. Henschel has every cause to congratulate himself on the success of all that he has attempted in his initial performance. The second programme is to be as follows: Tragic Overture, Op. 81 (new), Brahms; Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 16, Edward Grieg; Symphony in C, No. 1, Beethoven; Piano Solo: a. Warum (Why?), Op. 12, No. 3, Schumann; b. Scherzo in C sharp minor, Op. 39, Chopin; March in B flat, from the Suite Op. 113, Franz Lachner; Mr. W. H. Sherwood being the pianist of the occasion.

THE FIRST CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

We have rarely heard in Boston Music hall so positive a hush as that which on Saturday evening followed Mr. Henschel's call to order. Musicians and audience waited, with a tension of nerves that was almost painful, for the first leading movement of the slender baton held so high and still in the new conductor's hand. The programme offered nothing new, and, therefore, was an excellent one for an occasion when a largely augmented orchestra was to make its first essay under a new director. All minds being at rest, then, as to the matter of the concert, were free to follow its manner with undistracted interest and curiosity.

An instant more and the grand opening chords of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture resounded through the hall with a crispness and unity of attack and an intensity and resonance of tone that were at once a performance and a promise. It was evident that Mr. Henschel had not only the determination, but also the power, to control the nearly seventy men who sat before him, and to inspire or to constrain them to carry out absolutely his instructions. Nor did the orchestra belie for a moment during the evening this first fine impression, and we can scarcely be charged with exaggeration if we say that such vigorous and splendid playing has not been heard in Boston before. And if, after three rehearsals, such discipline and such unity can be obtained, the only possible qualification in the attainment of an ideal standard must be looked for, not in any failure of the band, but in some error or indiscretion of their leader. So that the question which has yet to be answered, is whether Mr. Henschel will be the perfect director. It is too soon yet to answer that question. Mr. Henschel is a man who, while in his early prime, has learned much, and who is therefore competent to learn much more. He is a musician of the strongest convictions, and yet we do not believe him opinionated or uncatholic. Conducting almost entirely from memory, as he did, it was clear that he had given himself up to his task, that he knew what he wanted, and meant to have it. His beating, while not ungraceful, had an extent and variety of sweep that was at first quite distracting to the attention, but which was full of significance, and at times seemed fairly to draw out from the instruments a peculiar accent or to uphold them in a difficult passage. The idiosyncrasy of the man himself was easily recognizable in the general tone of the performance; indeed, one familiar with the characteristics of Mr. Henschel's singing might almost have predicated those of his leadership. Immense verve and vigor, an unhesitating choice and pursuit of accelerated tempi, and a dramatic breadth of delivery that now and then bordered close upon the declamatory, and consequently a general heightening of all effects of tone and color, were the traits which were most prominent all the evening through, and even the gently flowing melodies of Haydn's sweet B flat symphony were read with a dash and swing which were certainly inspiring, but as certainly were not Haydn, as we have been wont to understand him. The band were obedient enough to have made many a pianissimo, but Mr. Henschel never called upon them for one. It must be noted, however, that the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosamunde" was given with exceeding delicacy of taste, and the vocal accompaniments were shaded as only a director who understands singing and singers could shade them.

Miss Cary was the vocalist of the evening, contributing the contralto scena from Bruch's "Odysseus" and the "Che faro" from Gluck's "Orpheus," both of which she sang in her very best manner and with that even beauty of tone which, after recent illness, we had not dared to expect. It is certainly quite time, however, that when a singer of Miss Cary's ample knowledge is engaged some less threadbare air than the latter might be chosen from her repertory. For thirty years it has been the stock song of contraltos, great and small, and only a very indulgent audience will hear it now with patience. Above all, when the proper phrasing and the true development of the climax are rendered impossible by the infelicitous adaptation of English words in which the very name of Eurydice is violently unaccentuated. The substitution of English for German text in music is well enough, because of their consonance, but English can never truly replace a Latin tongue.

Mr. Henschel has made a new disposition of his players, putting the first violins in a semicircle around his desk, with the other strings in successive curvilinear order, having the wood and brass still behind these, and the double basses and cellos in two sections at the wings. How satisfactory this plan will be cannot yet be judged. Apparently, while the first violins gain a pleasant prominence, the intermediate strings may lose in definiteness. But habit may help us to find grow in national stature side by side, and without disputing upon the question, who shall be greatest.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

Journal — October 24, 1881

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The first of the series of twenty concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the new organization founded by Mr. Higginson and having for its conductor Mr. Georg Henschel, was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. The audience was very large, and eminently representative of the musical culture and fashion of our city, and the performance of the really magnificent orchestra that has been gathered under these new auspices was satisfactory to a degree that will excite the liveliest interest and anticipation in regard to the future concerts. The programme was of a conservative character, leaning neither to the ultra classic nor the modern schools, and one upon which all true lovers of music could meet as on common ground. In its interpretations of the works presented the orchestra showed strong artistic excellence which gives great promise for the future, and Mr. Henschel exhibited some good qualities as a conductor. He has the faculty, evidently, of imparting his own spirit and enthusiasm to the players. At the same time, his method of beating time is so exact as to seem rigid and mechanical. If this manner is too strongly persisted in by a conductor the musicians are likely to acquire the same rigidity and a mechanical form of playing, to the exclusion of graceful and easy expression. It may wear off, however, when conductor and orchestra are better acquainted and are in that perfect accord that long-continued association is likely to bring. There was also something of nervousness in the conductor's manner, natural enough under the circumstances, which may have accounted for the fast time taken in some instances, and especially in the opening of the symphony. The orchestra numbered sixty-seven in all, with forty-eight in the string department. Its arrangement upon the platform was somewhat novel, and it is extremely doubtful if the fullest effect of the instruments is gained thereby. The first violins are ranged in a semi-circle about the conductor's desk, the second violins are in a line back of these, and the violas in turn behind the seconds. The violoncellos and double basses, of which there were eight of each instrument, were divided into two groups, four of each of these instruments occupying a position at the extreme end or side of the orchestra, while the other group is at the other extremity. The woods and brasses occupy the space at the back of the platform or in rear of the strings. Where the cellos, or double basses, have a difficult passage to execute together there is not likely to be the same unity and promptness that would follow if the respective instruments were massed, and it is also a question whether the sound reaches the ears of the audience with the same solidity and fullness. The seconds and violas are also covered, and, in some measure, muffled by the instruments in front. At no time did it seem that the body of sound was as great, or as solid, as such a mass of strings ought to produce. The playing of the orchestra, as we have already intimated, if not altogether above criticism was certainly very excellent. Its numbers included Beethoven's overture, op. 124, "Dedication of the House," Haydn's symphony in B flat (No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition), Schubert's Ballet Music from "Rosamunde," and Weber's Festival overture, all well-known works, but none the less delightful on that account. In all these there were displayed care and skill on the part of both conductor and musicians, and the interpretations were mainly worthy of high praise. In the symphony, as we have already said, there was a hurrying of some of the tempi which seemed to destroy its effect somewhat, but the overtures and the Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" were finely played. Mr. Henschel was very cordially received upon his entrance on the platform, and afterward called out. Miss Annie Louise Cary, who has apparently fully recovered from her recent illness, sang the recitative and aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," "Dearest Consort! Eurydice!" and "Ah! I've lost my Eurydice," and a scena from "Odysseus," by Max Bruch, "Thou far-darting sun." Both were grandly sung, and the second especially was interpreted with rich dramatic effect. Thrice Miss Cary was called out after singing the latter, but she did not repeat the selection. A graceful tribute was paid by the audience during the performance of "God Save the Queen," in Weber's Festival Overture. Nearly every person in the great concourse rose as the notes of England's national hymn first floated forth, and remained standing until its conclusion. The second concert, next Saturday afternoon, will introduce a new work by Brahms, the "Tragic Overture," Beethoven's First Symphony, and a March in B flat by Lachner. Mr. William H. Sherwood will play Grieg's Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, and two lesser pieces. There will be a public rehearsal Friday afternoon.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1881.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first concert of the course of twenty, to be given this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place in the Music Hall on Saturday evening last. On coming into the hall the first thing one was struck with was the size and character of the audience. Although the upper gallery thinned out a little near the organ, it is scarcely a figure of speech to say that the hall was full; moreover, on examining the audience closely, one found that almost everybody whom the earnest music-lover could wish to be there was actually there. It was an "oratorio" audience; any one familiar with the concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society knows how much that means. The next thing that caught the attention was the unaccustomed look of the orchestra; at first it seemed as if Mr. Henschel had upset all the traditions of our Boston players, and distributed the rôles anew. Familiar faces looked upon us from unexpected points of the stage. Well-known viola players sat, apparently ready to play first violin, while some of our leading violinists were stationed where one is accustomed to look for the second violins. Indeed the arrangement of the orchestra was wholly new.

First violins, second violins, and violas sat around the conductor in concentric semicircles. Celli and basses occupied the extreme right and left wings of the orchestra; all the wind and percussion were at the back, against the organ. We are as yet in doubt as to the advantage of this almost indiscriminate massing of first and second violins and violas. In unison passages, in cantilenas with simple accompaniment, and in plain four-part harmony, it, no doubt, makes it easier for the players to play exactly together; but in polyphonic passages—which, after all, represent the highest phase of great orchestral composition—the ear has greater difficulty in seizing the separate parts, in listening analytically, so to speak, than with the old arrangement. The dividing of celli and basses into two bodies, placed a considerable distance apart, did not strike us as having so bad an effect as might have been feared. We could detect no want of ensemble in their playing, while the fact that they were thus brought farther toward the front enabled them—especially the celli, in figural accompaniments—to be more distinctly heard. It seems to us, however, that, if the basses can play so well together when separated from each other by so wide a space, there can be no possible object in the close grouping together of violins and violas. Placing the brass behind the strings was thoroughly an excellent idea. Stationing the wooden wind in a similar position seemed to us to have its advantages and disadvantages; the excellence of the effect seemed largely to depend upon the style in which these instruments were treated in the different scores which were played. In the Haydn symphony, for instance, the effect was wholly good; but in the Beethoven overture, some of the obbligato parts were hard to hear.

The programme was:

Overture, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House."	Beethoven
Air. (Orpheus).....	Gluck
Symphony in B-flat.....	Haydn
(No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Ballet Music. (Rosamunde).....	Schubert
Scena. (Odysseus).....	Max Bruch
Festival Overture.....	Weber
Soloist, Miss Annie Louise Cary.

Saving that we heartily admire the artistic spirit of this programme, we need say nothing especial about it, as every number on it is familiar to our public. Miss Cary, who was not in good condition, sang the Gluck air ("Che farò" in English!!!) fairly well; but her rendering of Penelope's great scene from the "Odysseus" was at every point superb; the finest piece of singing we have ever heard from her.

And now for the main point of interest—or, if not of interest, at least of curiosity—Mr. Henschel's conducting. One consideration, which we will mention by and by, prevents us from saying anything in the way of criticism about a good deal that he did. Yet we confine ourselves to rehearsing his manifest and great merits as a conductor. The way in which the orchestra played, after three rehearsals, showed that he has a very unusual faculty of drilling his men; technically speaking, the playing was as fine as we have ever heard in this city. His command over his men is absolute and electric; more than this, he not only governs his orchestra with a very firm hand, he not only makes them do just what he pleases, but (what is quite as important) he makes the audience feel that he does so. His dramatic manner (dramatic in a good sense) not only has its immediate galvanic effect upon the orchestra, but it is a sure and welcome stimulant to the enthusiasm of the audience. Some conductors have the misfortune almost to nullify the effect of their orchestra's playing by a certain impassiveness of outward bearing, which acts as a sort of insulator between the music and the audience. For how can an audience be worked up to enthusiasm by even the finest playing, when it sees the conductor, whom it instinctively looks upon as the player par excellence, apparently unmoved himself? As for Mr. Henschel's conception of the various compositions he conducted, we prefer to say little as yet. If he really gave us an embodiment of that conception on Saturday evening, all we can say is that we agree with him in hardly a single instance. But we do not think that he did. Here is our reason—Mr. Henschel is an almost wholly inexperienced conductor; he is, so to speak, new to the business. Now there are many dangers which beset the path of a conductor. With unusual forethought, Mr. Henschel seemed to have guarded himself against them all save one, but this one got the better even of his clear-headedness and self-control. He apparently had not considered the effect which the exceptional excitement of the moment might have upon himself. He allowed himself (insensibly, as we think) to be carried away by his momentary enthusiasm, and we do not believe that he himself had any idea at the time, of the incredibly rapid, and ever more rapid tempo to which his nervous energy lashed the orchestra in every quick movement. The fact that he did not do so at the rehearsals (as we have been credibly informed) strengthens us in this conclusion. The internal evidence of the fact that no such tendency has ever been noticeable in his singing goes still further to prove our point. Yet time alone can give absolute proof of it.

The second concert on next Saturday evening will introduce a new work by Brahms, the "Tragic Overture," Beethoven's First Symphony, and a march in B-flat by Lachner. Mr. William H. Sherwood will play Grieg's concerto for pianoforte in A-minor, and two lesser pieces. There will be a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon.

because of their consonance, but English can never truly replace a Latin tongue.

Mr. Henschel has made a new disposition of his players, putting the first violins in a semicircle around his desk, with the other strings in successive curvilinear order, having the wood and brass still behind these, and the double basses and cellos in two sections at the wings. How satisfactory this plan will be cannot yet be judged. Apparently, while the first violins gain a pleasant prominence, the intermediate strings may lose in definiteness. But habit may help us to find grow in national stature side by side, and without disputing upon the question, who shall be greatest.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

Journal — October 24, 1881

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The first of the series of twenty concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the new organization founded by Mr. Higginson and having for its conductor Mr. Georg Henschel, was given at Music Hall Saturday evening. The audience was very large, and eminently representative of the musical culture and fashion of our city, and the performance of the really magnificent orchestra that has been gathered under these new auspices was satisfactory to a degree that will excite the liveliest interest and anticipation in regard to the future concerts. The programme was of a conservative character, leaning neither to the ultra classic nor the modern schools, and one upon which all true lovers of music could meet as on common ground. In its interpretations of the works presented the orchestra showed strong artistic excellence which gives great promise for the future, and Mr. Henschel exhibited some good qualities as a conductor. He has the faculty, evidently, of imparting his own spirit and enthusiasm to the players. At the same time, his method of beating time is so exact as to seem rigid and mechanical. If this manner is too strongly persisted in by a conductor the musicians are likely to acquire the same rigidity and a mechanical form of playing, to the exclusion of graceful and easy expression. It may wear off, however, when conductor and orchestra are better acquainted and are in that perfect accord that long-continued association is likely to bring. There was also something of nervousness in the conductor's manner, natural enough under the circumstances, which may have accounted for the fast time taken in some instances, and especially in the opening of the symphony. The orchestra numbered sixty-seven in all, with forty-eight in the string department. Its arrangement upon the platform was somewhat novel, and it is extremely doubtful if the fullest effect of the instruments is gained thereby. The first violins are ranged in a semi-circle about the conductor's desk, the second violins are in a line back of these, and the violas in turn behind the seconds. The violoncellos and double basses, of which there were eight of each instrument, were divided into two groups, four of each of these instruments occupying a position at the extreme end or side of the orchestra, while the other group is at the other extremity. The woods and brasses occupy the space at the back of the platform or in rear of the strings. Where the cellos, or double basses, have a difficult passage to execute together there is not likely to be the same unity and promptness that would follow if the respective instruments were massed, and it is also a question whether the sound reaches the ears of the audience with the same solidity and fullness. The seconds and violas are also covered, and, in some measure, muffled by the instruments in front. At no time did it seem that the body of sound was as great, or as solid, as such a mass of strings ought to produce. The playing of the orchestra, as we have already intimated, if not altogether above criticism was certainly very excellent. Its numbers included Beethoven's overture, op. 124, "Dedication of the House," Haydn's symphony in B flat (No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition), Schubert's Ballet Music from "Rosamunde," and Weber's Festival overture, all well-known works, but none the less delightful on that account. In all these there were displayed care and skill on the part of both conductor and musicians, and the interpretations were mainly worthy of high praise. In the symphony, as we have already said, there was a hurrying of some of the tempi which seemed to destroy its effect somewhat, but the overtures and the Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" were finely played. Mr. Henschel was very cordially received upon his entrance on the platform, and afterward called out. Miss Annie Louise Cary, who has apparently fully recovered from her recent illness, sang the recitative and aria from Gluck's "Orpheus," "Dearest Consort! Eurydice!" and "Ah! I've lost my Eurydice," and a scena from "Odysseus," by Max Bruch, "Thou far-darting sun." Both were grandly sung, and the second especially was interpreted with rich dramatic effect. Thrice Miss Cary was called out after singing the latter, but she did not repeat the selection. A graceful tribute was paid by the audience during the performance of "God Save the Queen," in Weber's Festival Overture. Nearly every person in the great concourse rose as the notes of England's national hymn first floated forth, and remained standing until its conclusion. The second concert, next Saturday afternoon, will introduce a new work by Brahms, the "Tragic Overture," Beethoven's First Symphony, and a March in B flat by Lachner. Mr. William H. Sherwood will play Grieg's Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, and two lesser pieces. There will be a public rehearsal Friday afternoon.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, OCTOBER 24, 1881.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The first concert of the course of twenty, to be given this winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place in the Music Hall on Saturday evening last. On coming into the hall the first thing one was struck with was the size and character of the audience. Although the upper gallery thinned out a little near the organ, it is scarcely a figure of speech to say that the hall was full; moreover, on examining the audience closely, one found that almost everybody whom the earnest music-lover could wish to be there was actually there. It was an "oratorio" audience; any one familiar with the concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society knows how much that means. The next thing that caught the attention was the unaccustomed look of the orchestra; at first it seemed as if Mr. Henschel had upset all the traditions of our Boston players, and distributed the rôles anew. Familiar faces looked upon us from unexpected points of the stage. Well-known viola players sat, apparently ready to play first violin, while some of our leading violinists were stationed where one is accustomed to look for the second violins. Indeed the arrangement of the orchestra was wholly new.

First violins, second violins, and violas sat around the conductor in concentric semicircles. Celli and basses occupied the extreme right and left wings of the orchestra; all the wind and percussion were at the back, against the organ. We are as yet in doubt as to the advantage of this almost indiscriminate massing of first and second violins and violas. In unison passages, in cantilenas with simple accompaniment, and in plain four-part harmony, it, no doubt, makes it easier for the players to play exactly together; but in polyphonic passages—which, after all, represent the highest phase of great orchestral composition—the ear has greater difficulty in seizing the separate parts, in listening analytically, so to speak, than with the old arrangement. The dividing of celli and basses into two bodies, placed a considerable distance apart, did not strike us as having so bad an effect as might have been feared. We could detect no want of ensemble in their playing, while the fact that they were thus brought farther toward the front enabled them—especially the celli, in figural accompaniments—to be more distinctly heard. It seems to us, however, that, if the basses can play so well together when separated from each other by so wide a space, there can be no possible object in the close grouping together of violins and violas. Placing the brass behind the strings was thoroughly an excellent idea. Stationing the wooden wind in a similar position seemed to us to have its advantages and disadvantages; the excellence of the effect seemed largely to depend upon the style in which these instruments were treated in the different scores which were played. In the Haydn symphony, for instance, the effect was wholly good; but in the Beethoven overture, some of the obbligato parts were hard to hear.

The programme was:

Overture, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House,"	Beethoven
Air. (Orpheus).....	Gluck
Symphony in B-flat.....	Haydn
(No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Ballet Music. (Rosamunde).....	Schubert
Scena. (Odysseus).....	Max Bruch
Festival Overture.....	Weber
Soloist, Miss Annie Louise Cary.

Saving that we heartily admire the artistic spirit of this programme, we need say nothing especial about it, as every number on it is familiar to our public. Miss Cary, who was not in good condition, sang the Gluck air ("Che farò" in English!!!) fairly well; but her rendering of Penelope's great scene from the "Odysseus" was at every point superb; the finest piece of singing we have ever heard from her.

And now for the main point of interest—or, if not of interest, at least of curiosity—Mr. Henschel's conducting. One consideration, which we will mention by and by, prevents us from saying anything in the way of

criticism about a good deal that he did. Yet we confine ourselves to rehearsing his manifest and great merits as a conductor. The way in which the orchestra played, after three rehearsals, showed that he has a very unusual faculty of drilling his men; technically speaking, the playing was as fine as we have ever heard in this city. His command over his men is absolute and electric; more than this, he not only governs his orchestra with a very firm hand, he not only makes them do just what he pleases, but (what is quite as important) he makes the audience feel that he does so. His dramatic manner (dramatic in a good sense) not only has its immediate galvanic effect upon the orchestra, but it is a sure and welcome stimulant to the enthusiasm of the audience. Some conductors have the misfortune almost to nullify the effect of their orchestra's playing by a certain impassiveness of outward bearing, which acts as a sort of insulator between the music and the audience. For how can an audience be worked up to enthusiasm by even the finest playing, when it sees the conductor, whom it instinctively looks upon as the player par excellence, apparently unmoved himself? As for Mr. Henschel's conception of the various compositions he conducted, we prefer to say little as yet. If he really gave us an embodiment of that conception on Saturday evening, all we can say is that we agree with him in hardly a single instance. But we do not think that he did. Here is our reason—Mr. Henschel is an almost wholly inexperienced conductor; he is, so to speak, new to the business. Now there are many dangers which beset the path of a conductor. With unusual forethought, Mr. Henschel seemed to have guarded himself against them all save one, but this one got the better even of his clear-headedness and self-control. He apparently had not considered the effect which the exceptional excitement of the moment might have upon himself. He allowed himself (insensibly, as we think) to be carried away by his momentary enthusiasm, and we do not believe that he himself had any idea at the time, of the inordinately rapid, and ever more rapid tempo to which his nervous energy lashed the orchestra in every quick movement. The fact that he did not do so at the rehearsals (as we have been credibly informed) strengthens us in this conclusion. The internal evidence of the fact that no such tendency has ever been noticeable in his singing goes still further to prove our point. Yet time alone can give absolute proof of it.

The second concert on next Saturday evening will introduce a new work by Brahms, the "Tragic Overture," Beethoven's First Symphony, and a march in B-flat by Lachner. Mr. William H. Sherwood will play Grieg's concerto for pianoforte in A-minor, and two lesser pieces. There will be a public rehearsal on Friday afternoon.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—Music Hall was the scene of a large and brilliant gathering on Saturday evening at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel. We find it necessary only to refer to the princely munificence of Mr. Higginson, who instituted the course, and to whose efforts alone more credit is due for the best interests of music than all the "close corporation societies" ever organized in this city. The selection of Mr. Georg Henschel as director of the orchestra is an evidence of the founder's astuteness and sound common sense, for although the announcement raised some criticisms which were far from complimentary, the results attained last evening under that gentleman's baton amply and doubly proved the wisdom of the choice, for there has not been a leader in our musical circles during recent years who has succeeded in imparting so much of his own musicianly qualities and magnetism as did Mr. Henschel on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Overture, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House".....Beethoven
Air (Orpheus).....Gluck
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Symphony in B flat.....Haydn
(No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Ballet Music (Rosamunde).....Schubert
Scena (Odysseus).....Max Bruch
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Festival Overture.....Weber

The orchestra played throughout with a certain individuality and compactness which was admirably sustained till the close of the programme. During the performance of "Weber's Festival Overture," as the great audience recognized the melody of "God Save the Queen," the people arose on mass and remained standing until the close. This delicate and appropriate compliment was a feature not down on the programme, and was all the more worthy of praise, coming as it did from a universal sentiment of respect to Her Majesty and the mother country. Miss Annie Louise Cary sang her two selections with the grace, fluency and richness which have been the notable characteristics of the greatest living contralto. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts in Music Hall on successive Saturday evenings until March, under the direction of Mr. Henschel, the programme for the next entertainment being as follows: "Tragic Overture, Op. 81" (new) Brahms; "Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Op. 16," Edvard Grieg, Mr. W. H. Sherwood; "Symphony in C, No. 1," Beethoven; piano solos, "Warum (Why)" Op. 12, No. 3, Schumann, and "Scherzo in C sharp minor, Op. 39," Chopin, Mr. W. H. Sherwood; and "March in B flat, from the Suite Op. 113," Franz Lachner.

The Encore Nuisance. Herald

The action of Mr. Georg Henschel in decidedly refusing to permit any repetition at the opening concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, and the intimation that this is to be the rule at these entertainments, gives a slight ground for hope that there is at last to be a turn in the tide of encores, and the great evil of the concert hall programmes of the day checked. If the unreasonable demands for repetition were generally made by the larger proportion of an audience, as was the case at the conclusion of Miss Cary's great effort on the occasion referred to, there might be a show for an argument in favor of the present customs. It will, however, be generally admitted that this is not the case, and it remains to be seen how long good-natured Boston concert patrons will submit to being made the sport of what is practically a species of claquers. The right to bias is a disagreeable right to make use of to check this growing nuisance, and yet it is a question if a general adoption of the right would not result in a cure of this evil more speedily than any other method. The root of the difficulty is in the easy going nature of the concert managers, who fear alike the most demonstrative portion of their audiences and the wrath of the artist anxious to win popular favor. If the managers could be shown, by a determined opposition party, that the majority of the audience desired a completion of the evening's programme within a reasonable hour, rather than a senseless repetition of every number, whether good, bad or indifferent, as is too commonly the case now, they might then realize that there are two distinct parts of an audience to please. The concert manager who, by permitting unreasonable repetitions to lengthen his programme beyond the time it would ordinarily cover, is often responsible for many serious mishaps to his audience, and practically commits a breach of faith by not giving his patrons an opportunity to hear what they have paid for, while they are compelled to listen to many things which they did not pay for and may not care to hear. A little organized effort among concert patrons who do not believe in encores will remedy this evil, and the present is an excellent season for such an effort. With this nuisance abated, or checked in a degree, the honor of being recalled after an effort will again mean something to the artist thus rewarded. In a series of concerts where the same talent appears it would seem to be a far better plan to repeat any specially approved number at the next concert, rather than risk the ill success which so often attends its immediate repetition. In miscellaneous concerts, where such a plan is not feasible, it is entirely safe for the manager to assume that his most reliable patrons will, in the long run, be best pleased by a strict adherence to the rule "no encores allowed."

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House." BEETHOVEN.
AIR. (Orpheus.) GLUCK.
SYMPHONY in B flat. HAYDN.
(No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Ballet Music. (Rosamunde.) SCHUBERT.
SCENA. (Odysseus.) MAX BRUCH.
FESTIVAL OVERTURE. WEBER.

SOLOIST:

MISS ANNIE LOUISE CARY.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—Music Hall

was the scene of a large and brilliant gathering on Saturday evening at the opening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel. We find it necessary only to refer to the princely munificence of Mr. Higginson, who instituted the course, and to whose efforts alone more credit is due for the best interests of music than all the "close corporation societies" ever organized in this city. The selection of Mr. Georg Henschel as director of the orchestra is an evidence of the founder's astuteness and sound common sense, for although the announcement raised some criticisms which were far from complimentary, the results attained last evening under that gentleman's baton amply and doubly proved the wisdom of the choice, for there has not been a leader in our musical circles during recent years who has succeeded in imparting so much of his own musicianly qualities and magnetism as did Mr. Henschel on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows:

Overture, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven
Air (Orpheus).....Gluck
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Symphony in B flat.....Haydn
(No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Ballet Music (Rosamunde).....Schubert
Scena (Odysseus).....Max Bruch
Miss Annie Louise Cary.
Festival Overture.....Weber

The orchestra played throughout with a certain individuality and compactness which was admirably sustained till the close of the programme. During the performance of "Weber's Festival Overture," as the great audience recognized the melody of "God Save the Queen," the people arose en masse and remained standing until the close. This delicate and appropriate compliment was a feature not down on the programme, and was all the more worthy of praise, coming as it did from a universal sentiment of respect to Her Majesty and the mother country. Miss Annie Louise Cary sang her two selections with the grace, fluency and richness which have been the notable characteristics of the greatest living contralto. The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give concerts in Music Hall on successive Saturday evenings until March, under the direction of Mr. Henschel, the programme for the next entertainment being as follows: "Tragic Overture, Op. 81" (new) Brahms; "Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Op. 16," Edvard Grieg, Mr. W. H. Sherwood; "Symphony in C, No. 1," Beethoven; piano solos, "Warum. (Why?) Op. 12, No. 3," Schumann, and "Scherzo in C sharp minor, Op. 39," Chopin, Mr. W. H. Sherwood; and "March in B flat, from the Suite Op. 113," Franz Lachner.

The Encore Nuisance.

The action of Mr. Georg Henschel in decidedly refusing to permit any repetition at the opening concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, and the intimation that this is to be the rule at these entertainments, gives a slight ground for hope that there is at last to be a turn in the tide of encores, and the great evil of the concert hall programmes of the day checked. If the unreasonable demands for repetition were generally made by the larger proportion of an audience, as was the case at the conclusion of Miss Cary's great effort on the occasion referred to, there might be a show for an argument in favor of the present customs. It will, however, be generally admitted that this is not the case, and it remains to be seen how long good-natured Boston concert patrons will submit to being made the sport of what is practically a species of claquers. The right to hiss is a disagreeable right to make use of to check this growing nuisance, and yet it is a question if a general adoption of the right would not result in a cure of this evil more speedily than any other method. The root of the difficulty is in the easy going nature of the concert managers, who fear alike the most demonstrative portion of their audiences and the wrath of the artist anxious to win popular favor. If the managers could be shown, by a determined opposition party, that the majority of the audience desired a completion of the evening's programme within a reasonable hour, rather than a senseless repetition of every number, whether good, bad or indifferent, as is too commonly the case now, they might then realize that there are two distinct parts of an audience to please. The concert manager who, by permitting unreasonable repetitions to lengthen his programme beyond the time it would ordinarily cover, is often responsible for many serious mishaps to his audience, and practically commits a breach of faith by not giving his patrons an opportunity to hear what they have paid for, while they are compelled to listen to many things which they did not pay for and may not care to hear. A little organized effort among concert patrons who do not believe in encores will remedy this evil, and the present is an excellent season for such an effort. With this nuisance abated, or checked in a degree, the honor of being recalled after an effort will again mean something to the artist thus rewarded. In a series of concerts where the same talent appears it would seem to be a far better plan to repeat any specially approved number at the next concert, rather than risk the ill success which so often attends its immediate repetition. In miscellaneous concerts, where such a plan is not feasible, it is entirely safe for the manager to assume that his most reliable patrons will, in the long run, be best pleased by a strict adherence to the rule "no encores allowed."

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House."	BEETHOVEN.
AIR. (Orpheus.)	GLUCK.
SYMPHONY in B flat. (No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)	HAYDN.
BALLET MUSIC. (Rosamunde.)	SCHUBERT.
SCENA. (Odysseus.)	MAX BRUCH.
FESTIVAL OVERTURE.	WEBER.

SOLOIST:

MISS ANNIE LOUISE CARY.

44
Recitative and Air from Orpheus. Gluck.

Dearest Consort! Eurydice!
My companion!
Ah! She hears not my voice, she'll return ne'er again!
I myself have death upon her brought!
More than ever am I o'erladen with grief that's more than boundless!

Now in this awful hour naught doth remain
But death, the balm of sorrow.

Ah! I've lost my Eurydice,
All my happiness I mourn,
Why on earth abide then longer?
Wretched fate that I was born!

Eurydice! O give answer, O but hear me!
My heart is thine, beats ever for thee!
Ah! I've lost, etc.

Eurydice! Vain endeavor!
Hope and joy are gone forever,
I'll no longer find them here!
Ah! I've lost, etc.

Scena from Odysseus. Max Bruch.

Thou far-darting Sun,
Must thy light divine wake me yet once again?
At the gates of dreams I was slumb'ring,
Why have the gods sent me griefs without measure?
I of women the most am bereft, and still my woes are increasing;
They first took from me, for fate most inglorious,
My lord, my consort, true, lion-hearted.
The chief in virtue amongst the Achaeans!
And now, my son well-belov'd evil tempests have snatched from my side!
Alas, I knew not the hour he went forth to seek his dear father!
My soul for his sake is troubled, I tremble
Lest any harm o'er him hath been fated!
Return, thou my solace!
My heart's delight!
Last pledge of sweet hope to thy mother forlorn!
Oh, Atrytona!
Daughter of all-subduing Kronion!
If Odysseus hath e'er burnt in his palace an off'ring to thee,
Oh, now recall his good deed!
Save my blameless, dear-cherish'd son,
From the insolent suitors at home,
From the threatening tempests yonder!
Oh, now remember his deeds,
Atrytona, save, oh, save my belov'd only son.

And thou, Helios, fountain of light,
Doth thy all-seeing eye in its course still behold
My Odysseus a dweller among mortals?
Graciously lead him with counselling hand!
Oh, to this sorrowing heart restore him,
Give back its king this sorrowing land!

Boston Home Journal

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—We were surprised to find at the debut of the Boston Symphony orchestra on Saturday evening such an audience present in response as but comfortably filled Music Hall. Mr. H. L. Higginson's generosity in offering to the public at pecuniary loss a series of cheap-priced symphony concerts was responded to by the aristocracy of the city, and a few other habitual concert-goers; while a different class of musical people, who have been loudest in their complaints of high concert rates, were conspicuously absent. Without discussing the advisability of catering so liberally to the public as Mr. Higginson has done, thereby accustoming it, as none but a millionaire could do, to rates of admission that do not pay expenses, and endangering the pecuniary success of future symphony concerts, for which reasonable prices must be charged, we will proceed to consider the actual merits of the concert in question. The programme is at least worthy of brief mention as a repertoire of some of the brightest, most spirited and soulful of classical music. It consisted of Beethoven's overture, The Consecration of the House; Haydn's symphony in B-flat; Schubert's ballet music from Rosamund; Weber's Jubel overture; and arias, rendered by Miss Annie Louise Cary from Gluck's Orpheus and Max Bruch's Odysseus. The interest in the concert largely centred in the orchestral management and conducting of Mr. Georg Henschel, a gifted and versatile musician, who, however, as the best informed know, has previously had a limited and insufficient experience in the role of chef d'orchestre. Before he appeared on the stage his originality of temperament and independence were illustrated by his having located the various branches of the orchestra in an unusual though as the effect of the playing proved in quite an unobjectionable manner. The first violins were placed in a semicircle in front of the entire orchestra, instead of appearing en masse, as by custom, to the left of the conductor's desk. Situated in relative positions behind the aforementioned instruments were semicircles of second violins, violas, 'celli and wind instruments; eight double basses equally divided being placed to the extreme left and right of the entire group. The number of double basses was out of proportion to the size of the orchestra; there should only have been six in all. Mr. Henschel's arrangement, while not wholly unlike that of the Genandhaus orchestra in Leipzig, was a novel one to a Boston audience, and well calculated, whatever else it might effect, to create a sensation. Except in strictly polyphonic music, where each branch of the band had independent melody to perform, the effect of the orchestral performance tended to fully justify his experiment, there being more unity, precision and promptness noticeable in the attack of notes and phrases than has yet been heard from a Boston orchestra. This improvement was directly traceable to the new arrangement of the instruments; but when it came to the performance of intricate fugural music,—the least experienced in the orchestra being separated from their leaders and superiors,—the inevitable inability of the inferior performers effected a confusion in the playing that would not otherwise have occurred.

45

As a priori reasoning regarding the efficacy of Mr. Henschel's notions would only interest the technically educated reader, we will proceed to touch upon other points in connection with the concert. Mr. Henschel's lack of experience as an orchestral leader was shown by his nervousness, and a constant tendency to hurry his tempi. His tempi were absurdly faster in the various movements of the Haydn symphony than the character of the music warranted. His best conducting was noticeable in the performance of the Beethoven overture, where he really entered con amore, yet with due reserve, into the spirit of its noble, stately and vigorous music. His lead was not awkward, but it was more conspicuous for its mannerisms than for musicianly qualities of a high order. The orchestra was composed of a generous amount of new material, and except in the performance of the Haydn symphony its playing was more spirited and accurate than what we have been accustomed to hear in Boston at symphony concerts. The enthusiasm of Mr. Henschel in his work, nervous and ill-timed though it often appeared, undoubtedly rendered the playing more vital by awakening the zeal of the performers; but had he displayed the tact of an artistic conductor the same effects could have been attained in a less demonstrative and none the less effective manner. Miss Annie Louise Cary almost surpassed herself by her fervent and impassioned rendering of the aria from Gluck's Orpheus, and she also sang gloriously well the scena from Bruch's Odysseus. She was recalled three times, the audience exhibiting their admiration of her singing in the heartiest and most sincere manner.

EGGSCHER MUSIC HALL.

EGGSCHER CONCERTS.

CONDUCTORHENOR EGGSCHER.

November 31, 1881.

PROGRAMME:

Overture, "Zum Andenken".....Eggscher
Song, "Vergiss-meln-nicht,".....Eggscher
Mr. Eggscher.
Chorus, "And don't you forget it,".....Eggscher Eggscher Choral Society.
Piano fantasia, "Souviens-toi,".....Eggscher
Mr. Eggscher.
Duet, "Non ti scordar di me,".....Eggscher
Mr. and Mrs. Eggscher.
Organ concerto, "Ne oblivis-caris,".....Eggscher
Mr. Eggscher.
Symphony.....Eggscher
Presto e non moderato. Andante Prestissimo. Scherzo, sempre accelerando. Fuga ("Then you'll remember me.")

The Eggscher piano used at these concerts.

All of Mr. Eggscher's compositions on sale at Mr. Eggscher's music store.

Tickets for sale at Mr. Eggscher's office.

HENOR EGGSCHER, Manager.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Feb. - Dec. 1861

have naturally excited the greatest attention, for several reasons. They introduced a new system into concert-giving in Boston, by promising to give all of Beethoven's symphonies in regular order,—an educational scheme of much good taste; they brought together an orchestra much larger than any which had been in permanent existence here; they introduced a new conductor to the public and he in turn introduced a new seating arrangement which set all the critics by the ears.

At the first concert of this orchestra, Mr. Henschel conducted at rather too rapid a pace. We attributed this to nervousness, and the event proved that we were right, for in the succeeding concerts the tempi were, as a whole, properly carried out.

Mr. Henschel makes a good conductor, and we believe will eventually become a great one. He is thorough in rehearsal, being a very patient drill-master; he is a good score-reader, has a phenomenal memory; and he is enthusiastic, and able to impart this enthusiasm to his men. His beat is rather widespread and energetic; but it controls the men, and that is the most important point. He has a few mannerisms, which we think will soon disappear, as rapping too much upon his stand to command silence in the audience and orchestra; standing with poised baton several seconds before beginning the composition, somewhat in the attitude of Jupiter hurling a thunderbolt; and bending his head forward in the most impassioned movements.

His arrangement of the orchestra is practically new here, and brings the contra-bass more forward, and places the flutes and oboes and clarinets further back than we have been accustomed to. This gives the four voices of the strings—the real foundation of almost every orchestral score—more prominence; but it weakens the effect of the wood-wind, whose coloring is somewhat faint at times, because of the arrangement. The orchestra is compactly placed in a semi-circle about the conductor, on a steeply inclined platform which raises the rear instruments much above the violins. The horn-players and trombonists who have hitherto been “born to blush unseen” are now in a state of chronic elevation, and can smile over the heads of the strings and wood-wind.

The chief works that have been performed, up to the date of our going to press, have been a Haydn symphony, Mozart's symphony in G minor, and Beethoven's first and second symphonies. At the first concert Miss Cary was the soloist. She had but recently recovered from a severe bronchial affection, but it left no trace upon her glorious voice. The first concert was purposely made up of rather simple numbers—Schubert's ballet music from “Rosamunde,” Beethoven's “Dedication Overture” and Weber's “Jubel Overture”—and it was wise to avoid more complex works, because the orchestra was not accustomed to its leader, the director himself would naturally be over-anxious, and in so large an orchestra there could not be absolute unity at first. There is even now some weak material, unavoidable in so large a mass, which has not been wholly assimilated.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 29TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

TRAGIC OVERTURE, Op. 81. (New.) . . . BRAHMS.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in A minor. Op. 16.
EDVARD GRIEG.

Allegro molto moderato.—
Adagio.—Allegro moderato e marcato.

SYMPHONY in C. No. 1, Op. 21. . . . BEETHOVEN.

Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—
Andante cantabile con moto.—
Allegro molto e vivace.—
Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.

PIANO SOLO.

a. WARUM? (Why?) Op. 12, No. 3. SCHUMANN.
b. SCHERZO in C sharp minor. Op. 39. CHOPIN.

MARCH in B flat—from the Suite Op. 113. . . FRANZ LACHNER.

SOLOIST:

MR. WM. H. SHERWOOD.

MR. SHERWOOD will use a Miller Piano.

The second concert already showed some improvement. The "Tragic Overture," by Brahms, opened the programme. It is a fine work, worthy of one of the stately tragedies of the ancient Greek poets. A broad martial theme is the chief part. The sudden interruption of this, and the accents of a grave and deep sorrow, is pictured in a masterly manner by the violins. The first Beethoven symphony possesses more historical than musical interest. It was first performed in the year 1800, and it was fitting that the 19th century music should begin with the very first year of the century. In the work the influence of Haydn and Mozart is plainly perceptible; yet though the young master worked within the limits prescribed by ancient usage, it is easy to perceive that he felt the fetters irksome.

The minuet, for example, is present, but it is not a Haydn minuet, and the development of the last movement is already an earnest of great reforms to come. The strings have some passages of great beauty in this work, and others of florid difficulty. They gave both with surety and excellence, although from where we sat the double-basses seemed too prominent.

Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood was the soloist of the occasion, and he played superbly. The piano-forte concerto in A minor, by Grieg, is a broad work of the modern school, such as this artist portrays so excellently. The finale was especially massive, difficult double-octave passages and heavy phrases against orchestral tutti appearing often. To the credit of both pianist and piano (a Miller grand) it must be said that the tones were clearly audible, even against the heavy, barbaric, march movement of the full orchestra of the climax.

The strings were excellent in the muted passages of the mournful adagio; but the orchestra did not accompany as well in the first movement. Mr. Sherwood played a Chopin scherzo very finely, but did not do quite as well in the little "Warum" of Schumann, possibly from over-confidence. Folio

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SECOND CONCERT.

As at the first concert, so on last Saturday evening, Mr. Henschel wisely made up his programme from well-known standard music, the only exception being an overture by Brahms. We say wisely,—and, for saying so, we have both the players and the listeners in mind. The latter can better judge, while hearing familiar music, whether the standard of performance is higher than that to which they have been accustomed, and their criticism as to new renderings and to new dispositions will be more sensible and more likely to be useful to the conductor. And on their part, the musicians, not being absorbed in following the text of their music, can more closely watch and obey the signals of their leader. So long as the player must keep his attention riveted to the notes upon his desk, in order to avoid elementary errors in reading, fine effects are quite unattainable. Mr. Henschel has one immense advantage over most conductors in that remarkable hold which his memory takes upon his scores. We have indeed seen Serras, at San Carlo, direct "Aïda," in its first season, entirely without book; but such feats are rare, and as a rule, conductors are almost as much tied to their notes as are their players. This independence allows Mr. Henschel to anticipate every new turn of the orchestration, and to lead it in with a hint or a command of his baton, which, in spite of its nervously extended sweep, has great significance and variety of motion. Practice in what is known to both conductor and band is needed, and must be seriously given before symmetry of performance can be reached. We have strength and spirit in the orchestra, as a whole, and unity in the movement of each single element of it, but fine shading and sweetness are yet to seek. In dynamics, for instance, a developed forte and fortissimo are practically equal; and, to our thinking, merely because the unit of force, instead of being a pianissimo in the first case, is simply a piano in both. But we have faith that this fine result will be attained. It is no small success to have imparted such life and élan to players who have been far too apt to relax into indifference.

Mr. Henschel conducted in a more sustained fashion at this second concert. The various movements were taken up by him in just time, and the beat was sustained with dignified steadiness throughout, no increase of enthusiasm or force in reading tempting him to hasten the rate. But that there was no lack of reserved spirit on his part, the brilliantly vigorous delivery of the closing number—Lachner's favorite march in B flat—proved abundantly. We cannot agree with Mr. Henschel, however, in his arrangement of the strings. Where he stands, every voice is, no doubt, heard in its due turn and place; but for the audience, much that is fine and necessary in the middle parts is lost or blurred, while in the strongest passage the first violin came to the ear with a hardness which needs tempering by a nearer volume of modifying seconds and violas. There is also noticeable at times a tendency to overloudness in the bass—especially the trombones. We might say, however, that the andante-cantabile in the symphony (Beethoven's first) was played with much suavity and ease. The new number on the programme was Brahms's opus 81, which he names a "Tragic Overture." Tragic, by what it suggests, and for what it seems to be adapted, rather than by its own individuality. Written throughout with great clearness, and beauty, it might well form the prelude to a grave and noble tragedy. A broad and simple introductory movement, not unlike a solemn march, gradually strengthens in character as the brass instruments are added, and as it approaches its end there are heard short plaintive phrases passing across the steady harmony, like faint cries of grief; then comes a gentle and peaceful passage, of quite a spiritual character, sustained, occasionally, upon a smooth foundation of horn-notes; and finally the first motif is recalled, for full orchestra, with rich figuration for the basses and the wooden wind instruments, the whole ending with a short but swift and splendid upward flight of violins.

Mr. Sherwood was the soloist, contributing the piano part of Grieg's concerto in A minor. Schumann's "Warum?" and Chopin's schерzo in C-sharp minor. The accuracy and decision of Mr. Sherwood's playing were apparent in all of his selections, and the elaborate and extremely difficult cadenzas in the concerto were quite triumphs of execution. The Schumann morceau was given very delicately, but we could not at all sympathize with Mr. Sherwood's presentment of his Chopin selection. Technically, it was perfect; but we found the tone of the reading far too academic and unpoetic.

The third programme will have for its nucleus Mozart's symphony in G minor. The "Tragic Overture" will be repeated. Mrs. Lilian Bailey Henschel will be the soloist, singing an air from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," and a "Hymne au Créateur," by Mr. Henschel, which is the only novelty for that evening.

The public may be interested to know that some few seats may be had for single concerts in this series. Also that strict orders have been given to admit no person to the hall while the orchestra are playing, and that no encores will be permitted. A very brief grace may be allowed after eight o'clock, to allow for contingencies, but as the programmes are to be composed with a view to harmony of effect, and of such just length that all the audience may remain to the end, no concessions can be made to the tardy or to the admirers of some particular number. In these provisions the audience has already shown a disposition to concur. The best listeners in our great concert-attending public have been present on both of these Saturday evenings, and the perfect silence which follows Mr. Henschel's warning rap is no less creditable to the company than it is flattering to him.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The second concert of the Boston symphony orchestra occurred in Music Hall last evening. The weather did not appear to have materially diminished the size of the audience. The programme for the evening, taken as a whole, appeared, to our judgment at least, to be selected with by no means the best of taste. Not that it was lacking by any means in musical excellences, but it was not of a quality to attract a miscellaneous audience in any where near the same degree that a programme some other works of the masters could do. The symphony in C, Beethoven's first, for instance, contrasted very unfavorably with the beautiful symphony of Haydn given at the opening concert. Beethoven composed his first symphony before his musical genius had developed itself. It was modelled upon the symphony of Haydn, and as is very apt to be the case, it had all the weakness of an imitation—Haydn's form without his spirit. It was not, indeed, until his third symphony that Beethoven's unapproachable original symphonic creations began. Edward Grieg's concerto in A minor (op. 16) gave Mr. William H. Sherwood a fine opportunity to exhibit his mechanical dexterity and his musical insight; but it was none the less wearisome to most of the audience. It has been said by pretty good musical authority that a concerto is something which never ought to be inflicted on a miscellaneous audience, for the reason that it is a means, and only a means, to an end, and that while it should be the province of the intelligent pianist to bring the rich results of his years of labor before the public, it is by no means his province to inflict upon them the exercises by which his fingers were taught the secret of their cunning. Whether this should be laid down as an inflexible rule or not there is certainly food for thought in it. The particular composition under consideration, which received an exceedingly fine interpretation last evening, notwithstanding the striking beauty of a few passages, was one which, we venture to say, not one intelligent person in a hundred on first hearing would listen to without a feeling of weariness, unless indeed that sensation was kept away by the hearer's wonderment at the intricacy and rapidity of the digital gymnastics which were being displayed before him.

The opening number of the programme, the tragic overture (op. 81) by Brahms, presented in Boston last night for the first time, was perhaps the most enjoyable feature of the programme. This is not according to infinite praise. Twenty-eight years ago, Robert Schumann informed the musical world that the then young pianist, Johannes Brahms, was "destined to give expression of the deepest feeling of the century and present us with the qualities of a master." But the musical public have been waiting in vain for the fulfillment of this prophecy ever since. Still his works are above mediocrity, and his influence has always been exerted for good. The programme for next Saturday will be found elsewhere.

Slobe

THE SECOND BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT. Courier

We cannot but regard the concert of last evening as really the first of the great series, since the programme of the week previous, although technically classical, was yet not of a character to completely satisfy the highest music lover, it having too much festival music and too many dance movements in its numbers, with but little of a deeper nature to relieve them. In the overture, the concerto, and the symphony of last night, the deeper element was represented. The first symphony of Beethoven is not a very familiar number upon American concert programmes. To those who have heard the Eroica, the 9th, or even the Pastoral, it does not seem to fairly represent the

Beethoven of modern times. It belongs to the first period of the master's work when the influence of Haydn, and the example of Mozart, were yet strong upon him. Yet even with this influence so strongly marked, this symphony, which was first played in the first year of this century (fittingly inaugurating the 19th century music) contains evidence of an originality which was certain sooner or later, to burst the bounds of martinet rule. The minuet, for example, already in its second theme, is radically different from the dance themes of Haydn, and the Finale (Allegro Molto e Vivace) has touches which were not at all liked on their first appearance. The odd scale progressions (violin solo), which introduce the first theme, were omitted by some conductors as "ludicrous."

The Grieg concerto is a work which finely represents the northern school; there is dash, there is pomposity and weirdness, in constantly shifting color. It is the Scandinavian nature drawn through a German mould. The empty fifths, and drone effects are no longer new to us, but Grieg does not employ them enough to weaken their power.

The conducting of Mr. Henschel grows more intelligible as it is watched more closely. He is evidently as careful as Thomas in regard to shading, and aspires to make his orchestra especially effective in this direction. But he is decidedly a "warmer" conductor than the New York one. Yet the quickening of tempo which we alluded to last week, proves to be, as we thought, merely a result of temporary nervousness. The unanimity with which this fault was decried, led us to reduce the matter to a certainty by timing the beats. The result was that we found a movement metronomized at one hundred and twelve half notes, was taken at one hundred and eighteen, a comparatively small difference, and one which we venture to say may be found in the variations of any conductor. The method of placing the orchestra with wood wind and brass together at the rear, is one which cannot be hastily endorsed. The clarinet, oboe and bassoon passages, lose somewhat thereby, but the four voices of the strings gain considerably in clearness. But some noticeable changes in the placing of the instruments will take place in about two weeks, and then it will be time enough to judge fully of the success of the innovation. The evening's performance opened with the Tragic Overture (Brahms's) which is in every respect an earnest and masterly work. Brahms is too seldom heard in our concerts. In this overture there are some vivid touches and massive harmonies. A pompous, martial vein pervades the first part. Yet the brass is not over-used. There is none of the blare of some of the modern compositions. The violins have some heavy bowing which is effective and was excellently played. After a sudden pizzicato the style changes, and imitations and sequences follow, almost promising a fugue; they are however followed by a march theme in minor, and brusque responses between the strings and brass. There is alternate sadness and despair in the picture until a short stretto closes the scene.

The Grieg Concerto was played by Mr. Sherwood in an admirable manner. There was verve, fire and tenderness in his interpretation. The first movement opens at once with a bold, short motive on the piano, which afterwards reappears as nucleus of a brilliant cadenza, and as closing theme. The second movement is chiefly a mournful theme given by muted strings, the piano furnishing delicate embellishments. This was most refinedly given both by pianist and orchestra. The last movement is grandiose in almost every feature, and it was grandly given. Then came the glorious climax sweeping everything before it:—a powerful theme of short rhythm, almost like a Tartar or Cossack march.

Chopin's Scherzo (C sharp minor) and Schumann's Why? were the other piano selections and were worthily given.

The Symphony was as a whole very finely played. There was a blur in the violins at the very beginning but this passed away almost immediately, and the rapid figures for strings in unison, which herald the closing theme, were quite clearcut. In the second movement the staccato scales of the violins were musically work, and the sudden changes, at the repeats, from loud to soft playing, bore evidence of careful drill. The cello in the minuet, and the wood-wind and violins in its trio were admirably played. The audience certainly enjoyed every movement of the work, judging from the rapt attention and hearty applause, and the Beethoven of the first symphony is a very pleasant fellow; but the composer of the second symphony is already more earnest and more of a reformer. We earnestly hope that the less simple constructions will not be less cordially listened to.

The March by Lachner with which the concert closed is in simple form, but effectively scored. The next concert bids fair to be equally interesting. It is to consist of Tragic Overture, Op. 81, Brahms; Air (Giulio Cesare), Handel; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Two Slavonian Dances, Op. 46, Nos. 4 and 1, Dvorak; Hymne au Createur (New, MS.), Henschel; Overture (The Merry Wives of Windsor), Nicolai. Mrs. Henschel will be the vocalist of the occasion.

Sarotte

The Boston Symphony Concert.

There was another large audience at Music Hall last night to listen to the second of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The great pressure upon our space compels us to be brief in our notice of the performance. We may begin by stating that the concert was an improvement upon its predecessor in as far as avoiding too rapid tempi was concerned. Mr. Henschel also seemed to have more command over himself, and did not give way to the impulsiveness that characterized his leading in the opening concert. Beethoven's first symphony received a creditable interpretation, on the whole; though here and there was an unnecessary coarseness, especially in the strings. The composer's marks of expression were not always observed, and again no difference was made between the force of forte and fortissimo. Curiously enough, whenever a sforzando was taken, instead of being confined to the note under which it was marked, the players seemed to treat it exactly as they would the sign forte, and continued to play loud until the next change of sign was indicated. Then, again, some unwarrantable liberties were taken with the phrasings of the strings, probably owing to certain supposed exigencies of bowing. It is always well to obey a composer's markings, especially when the composer is a Beethoven. But the improvement upon the earlier performance was so decided that we will not stop to point out farther faults, in view of the prevailing merit of the performances taken altogether. The disadvantages of Mr. Henschel's arrangement of the orchestra struck us more forcibly than before. The responses between the first and second violins were very confused, and this was particularly noticeable in the second part of the finale. The bassoon was rarely heard, and its answers in the first movement were wholly lost. The same may be said of the oboe whenever it was most necessary that they should be prominent. In fact, the more delicate expressions of the wood instruments seldom made themselves felt. The only novelty was Brahms's new "Tragic Overture," a strong and effective work, and much clearer than it is the habit of the composer to write. It was vigorously interpreted. The other orchestral work was a march from Franz Lachner's Suite, op. 113, which though large and measured in style is not of marked interest or value. The soloist was Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who rendered Grieg's concerto in A minor with great brilliancy, power and expressiveness. Later in the evening he played Schumann's "Warum?" and Chopin's Scherzo in C-sharp minor, both of which he interpreted in his best and most artistic manner. The Miller piano used by him merits notice for its fine volume and quality of tone, and its other admirable features.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Transcript—
Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the two concerts already given by this orchestra, and the one announced for next Saturday, give a fair sample of Mr. Henschel's policy, there are certain items in his scheme which must surely earn public gratitude. For the conspicuous absence of encores all of us must be thankful; again, the announcement of a repetition of Brahms's Tragic Overture at the concert immediately following the one at which the work was first given, leads us to hope that the same policy will be pursued with every new composition of importance to be performed during the course. A single hearing of a new work is nothing; a second hearing, while first impressions are still fresh, is very valuable. In view of this promised repetition, we refrain from saying anything about the Brahms overture (the first number on last Saturday evening's programme) until we shall have heard it again. It seems hardly judicious to have let Grieg's A-minor pianoforte concerto immediately follow the overture; the gloomy element predominates in both works, and one mood is maintained too long in listening to both without the relief of contrast. Our respect for this work of Grieg's does not increase with repeated hearings; the themes are exceedingly beautiful, it is true, and there is something in the regularity of their recurrence which at first gives the impression of symmetry of form; but the work is devoid of all true development, and mere iteration strives hard to take the place of organic, thematic working-out. Of Mr. Sherwood's performance of the leading part it would be unfair to speak critically, for, if the truth must be told, he was not well accompanied by the orchestra; his elastic rhythm was not always sympathetically caught, and pianoforte and orchestra did not invariably go together. In the unaccompanied passages, notably in the cadenza of the first movement, his playing was easily to be recognized as superb; yet even here the thin and insignificant tone of the instrument upon which he played was prejudicial to the good effect of his playing. Later in the evening he gave us Schumann's "Warum?" which he played very clearly, but with, perhaps, too much elaborateness of style, and Chopin's third scherzo in C-sharp minor, in which the usual brilliancy and artistic discretion of his playing shone forth in unmistakable splendor. Beethoven's first symphony in C-major—that de-

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The second concert of the Boston symphony orchestra occurred in Music Hall last evening. The weather did not appear to have materially diminished the size of the audience. The programme for the evening, taken as a whole, appeared, to our judgment at least, to be selected with by no means the best of taste. Not that it was lacking by any means in musical excellences, but it was not of a quality to attract a miscellaneous audience in any where near the same degree that a programme some other works of the masters could do. The symphony in C, Beethoven's first, for instance, contrasted very unfavorably with the beautiful symphony of Haydn given at the opening concert. Beethoven composed his first symphony before his musical genius had developed itself. It was modelled upon the symphony of Haydn, and as is very apt to be the case, it had all the weakness of an imitation—Haydn's form without his spirit. It was not, indeed, until his third symphony that Beethoven's unapproachable original symphonic creations began. Edward Grieg's concerto in A minor (op. 16) gave Mr. William H. Sherwood a fine opportunity to exhibit his mechanical dexterity and his musical insight; but it was none the less wearisome to most of the audience. It has been said by pretty good musical authority that a concerto is something which never ought to be inflicted on a miscellaneous audience, for the reason that it is a means, and only a means, to an end, and that while it should be the province of the intelligent pianist to bring the rich results of his years of labor before the public, it is by no means his province to inflict upon them the exercises by which his fingers were taught the secret of their cunning. Whether this should be laid down as an inflexible rule or not there is certainly food for thought in it. The particular composition under consideration, which received an exceedingly fine interpretation last evening, notwithstanding the striking beauty of a few passages, was one which, we venture to say, not one intelligent person in a hundred on first hearing would listen to without a feeling of weariness, unless indeed that sensation was kept away by the hearer's wonderment at the intricacy and rapidity of the digital gymnastics which were being displayed before him.

The opening number of the programme, the tragic overture (op. 81) by Brahms, presented in Boston last night for the first time, was perhaps the most enjoyable feature of the programme. This is not according to infinite praise. Twenty-eight years ago, Robert Schumann informed the musical world that the then young pianist, Johannes Brahms, was "destined to give expression of the deepest feeling of the century and present us with the qualities of a master." But the musical public have been waiting in vain for the fulfillment of this prophecy ever since. Still his works are above mediocrity, and his influence has always been exerted for good. The programme for next Saturday will be found elsewhere.

Slobe

THE SECOND BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT. Courier

We cannot but regard the concert of last evening as really the first of the great series, since the programme of the week previous, although technically classical, was yet not of a character to completely satisfy the highest music lover, it having too much festival music and too many dance movements in its numbers, with but little of a deeper nature to relieve them. In the overture, the concerto, and the symphony of last night, the deeper element was represented. The first symphony of Beethoven is not a very familiar number upon American concert programmes. To those who have heard the Eroica, the 9th, or even the Pastoral, it does not seem to fairly represent the

Beethoven of modern times. It belongs to the first period of the master's work when the influence of Haydn, and the example of Mozart, were yet strong upon him. Yet even with this influence so strongly marked, this symphony, which was first played in the first year of this century (fittingly inaugurating the 19th century music) contains evidence of an originality which was certain sooner or later, to burst the bounds of martinet rule. The minuet, for example, already in its second theme, is radically different from the dance themes of Haydn, and the Finale (Allegro Molto e Vivace) has touches which were not at all liked on their first appearance. The odd scale progressions (violin solo), which introduce the first theme, were omitted by some conductors as "ludicrous."

The Grieg concerto is a work which finely represents the northern school; there is dash, there is pomposity and weirdness, in constantly shifting color. It is the Scandinavian nature drawn through a German mould. The empty fifths, and drone effects are no longer new to us, but Grieg does not employ them enough to weaken their power.

The conducting of Mr. Henschel grows more intelligible as it is watched more closely. He is evidently as careful as Thomas in regard to shading, and aspires to make his orchestra especially effective in this direction. But he is decidedly a "warmer" conductor than the New York one. Yet the quickening of tempo which we alluded to last week, proves to be, as we thought, merely a result of temporary nervousness. The unanimity with which this fault was decried, led us to reduce the matter to a certainty by timing the beats. The result was that we found a movement metronomized at one hundred and twelve half notes, was taken at one hundred and eighteen, a comparatively small difference, and one which we venture to say may be found in the variations of any conductor. The method of placing the orchestra with wood wind and brass together at the rear, is one which cannot be hastily endorsed. The clarinet, oboe and bassoon passages, lose somewhat thereby, but the four voices of the strings gain considerably in clearness. But some noticeable changes in the placing of the instruments will take place in about two weeks, and then it will be time enough to judge fully of the success of the innovation. The evening's performance opened with the Tragic Overture (Brahms') which is in every respect an earnest and masterly work. Brahms is too seldom heard in our concerts. In this overture there are some vivid touches and massive harmonies. A pompous, martial vein pervades the first part. Yet the brass is not overused. There is none of the blare of some of the modern compositions. The violins have some heavy bowing which is effective and was excellently played. After a sudden pizzicato the style changes, and imitations and sequences follow, almost promising a fugue; they are however followed by a march theme in minor, and brusque responses between the strings and brass. There is alternate sadness and despair in the picture until a short stretto closes the scene.

The Grieg Concerto was played by Mr. Sherwood in an admirable manner. There was verve, fire and tenderness in his interpretation. The first movement opens at once with a bold, short motive on the piano, which afterwards reappears as nucleus of a brilliant cadenza, and as closing theme. The second movement is chiefly a mournful theme given by muted strings, the piano furnishing delicate embellishments. This was most refinedly given both by pianist and orchestra. The last movement is grandiose in almost every feature, and it was grandly given. Then came the glorious climax sweeping everything before it:—a powerful theme of short rhythm, almost like a Tartar or Cossack march.

Chopin's Scherzo (C sharp minor) and Schumann's Why? were the other piano selections and were worthily given.

The Symphony was as a whole very finely played. There was a blur in the violins at the very beginning but this passed away almost immediately, and the rapid figures for strings in unison, which herald the closing theme, were quite clearcut. In the second movement the staccato scales of the violins were musicianly work, and the sudden changes, at the repeats, from loud to soft playing, bore evidence of careful drill. The cello in the minuet, and the wood-wind and violins in its trio were admirably played. The audience certainly enjoyed every movement of the work, judging from the rapt attention and hearty applause, and the Beethoven of the first symphony is a very pleasant fellow; but the composer of the second symphony is already more earnest and more of a reformer. We earnestly hope that the less simple constructions will not be less cordially listened to.

The March by Lachner with which the concert closed is in simple form, but effectively scored. The next concert bids fair to be equally interesting. It is to consist of Tragic Overture, Op. 81, Brahms; Air (Giulio Cesare), Handel; Symphony in G minor, Mozart; Two Slavonian Dances, Op. 46, Nos. 4 and 1, Dvorak; Hymne au Createur (New, MS.), Henschel; Overture (The Merry Wives of Windsor), Nicolai. Mrs. Henschel will be the vocalist of the occasion.

Saroth

The Boston Symphony Concert.

There was another large audience at Music Hall last night to listen to the second of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The great pressure upon our space compels us to be brief in our notice of the performance. We may begin by stating that the concert was an improvement upon its predecessor in as far as avoiding too rapid tempi was concerned. Mr. Henschel also seemed to have more command over himself, and did not give way to the impulsiveness that characterized his leading in the opening concert. Beethoven's first symphony received a creditable interpretation, on the whole; though here and there was an unnecessary coarseness, especially in the strings. The composer's marks of expression were not always observed, and again no difference was made between the force of forte and fortissimo. Curiously enough, whenever a sforzando was taken, instead of being confined to the note under which it was marked, the players seemed to treat it exactly as they would the sign forte, and continued to play loud until the next change of sign was indicated. Then, again, some unwarrantable liberties were taken with the phrasings of the strings, probably owing to certain supposed exigencies of bowing. It is always well to obey a composer's markings, especially when the composer is a Beethoven. But the improvement upon the earlier performance was so decided that we will not stop to point out farther faults, in view of the prevailing merit of the performances taken altogether. The disadvantages of Mr. Henschel's arrangement of the orchestra struck us more forcibly than before. The responses between the first and second violins were very confused, and this was particularly noticeable in the second part of the finale. The bassoon was rarely heard, and its answers in the first movement were wholly lost. The same may be said of the oboe, whenever it was most necessary that they should be prominent. In fact, the more delicate expressions of the wood instruments seldom made themselves felt. The only novelty was Brahms's new "Tragic Overture," a strong and effective work, and much clearer than it is the habit of the composer to write. It was vigorously interpreted. The other orchestral work was a march from Franz Lachner's Suite, op. 113, which though large and measured in style is not of marked interest or value. The soloist was Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who rendered Grieg's concerto in A minor with great brilliancy, power and expressiveness. Later in the evening he played Schumann's "Warum?" and Chopin's Scherzo in C-sharp minor, both of which he interpreted in his best and most artistic manner. The Mill piano used by him merits notice for its fine volume and quality of tone, and its other admirable features.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. If the two concerts already given by this orchestra, and the one announced for next Saturday, give a fair sample of Mr. Henschel's policy, there are certain items in his scheme which must surely earn public gratitude. For the conspicuous absence of encores all of us must be thankful; again, the announcement of a repetition of Brahms's Tragic Overture at the concert immediately following the one at which the work was first given, leads us to hope that the same policy will be pursued with every new composition of importance to be performed during the course. A single hearing of a new work is nothing; a second hearing, while first impressions are still fresh, is very valuable. In view of this promised repetition, we refrain from saying anything about the Brahms overture (the first number on last Saturday evening's programme) until we shall have heard it again. It seems hardly judicious to have let Grieg's A-minor pianoforte concerto immediately follow the overture; the gloomy element predominates in both works, and one mood is maintained too long in listening to both without the relief of contrast. Our respect for this work of Grieg's does not increase with repeated hearings; the themes are exceedingly beautiful, it is true, and there is something in the regularity of their recurrence which at first gives the impression of symmetry of form; but the work is devoid of all true development, and mere iteration strives hard to take the place of organic, thematic working-out. Of Mr. Sherwood's performance of the leading part it would be unfair to speak critically, for, if the truth must be told, he was not well accompanied by the orchestra; his elastic rhythm was not always sympathetically caught, and pianoforte and orchestra did not invariably go together. In the unaccompanied passages, notably in the cadenza of the first movement, his playing was easily to be recognized as superb; yet even here the thin and insignificant tone of the instrument upon which he played was prejudicial to the good effect of his playing. Later in the evening he gave us Schumann's "Warum?" which he played very clearly, but with, perhaps, too much elaborateness of style, and Chopin's third scherzo in C-sharp minor, in which the usual brilliancy and artistic discretion of his playing shone forth in unmistakable splendor. Beethoven's first symphony in C-major—that de-delicious work, in which the young Beethoven pays homage so charmingly to the genius of Haydn and Mozart—came back to us like an old and loved friend after a too long absence. Mr. Henschel's conducting of this symphony shone alike by its positive merits and by the absence of certain too common faults. Of that furious, passionate onslaught upon the musical mood of his listeners which was noticeable at the first concert, not a trace remained. Not a single tempo was exaggerated. Also, we cannot thank Mr. Henschel enough for sparing us those excessive pianissimos with which some modern conductors try to adorn whatever composition falls into their hands; over-delicate effects which delight the ear in much of the more modern music, but which sit on a Beethoven symphony about as gracefully as an "ashes-of-roses" æsthetic gown would upon a Raphael Madonna. Yet it will take more rehearsing to make the orchestra implicitly follow Mr. Henschel's baton through this brighter and serenely musical domain than it did to make them do his more vehement bidding at the first concert. Impetuosity is ever more infectious than discretion; it is always easier to make an orchestra play faster than they have been accustomed to do (if the lead is given with vigorous decision) than to make them do things more deliberately. In the andante con moto Mr. Henschel kept his forces well together; the easy, rhythmic swing of his tempo in the opening phrase was of a sort easily to impress itself on the minds of the players at once; but in the finale he could not quite prevent the orchestra from running away from his baton, and the admirable tempo he began by taking was lost after the first few measures of the allegro molto e vivace. Upon the whole, the orchestra did not preserve so perfect an ensemble as at the first concert; the intention was far better, but the execution less good.

The march from Franz Lachner's B-flat suite closed the concert brilliantly, and was most capably played—vigorously, in strict time, with excellent accent, and without any meritorious attempt at getting more out of the music than there was in it. The audience was even larger than at the first concert. On next Saturday the following programme will be given:

Tragic overture, op. 81, Brahms; air (Giulio Cesare), Handel; symphony in G-minor, Mozart; two Slavonian dances, op. 46, Nos. 4 and 1, Dvořák; hymne au Créateur (new, MS.), Henschel; overture (The Merry Wives of Windsor), Nicolai.

Mrs. Henschel will be the singer.

MUSICAL MATTERS. Herald

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Mr. W. H. Sherwood, and the programme as follows:

Tragic Overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor. Op. 16.....Edvard Grieg
Symphony in C. No. 1.....Beethoven
Piano Solo—
a. Warum (Why?). Op. 12, No. 3.....Schumann
b. Scherzo in C sharp minor. Op. 39.....Chopin
March in B flat, from the Suite Op. 113, Franz Lachner

The programme again demonstrated Mr. Henschel's good taste and judgment, the works being well contrasted and of just sufficient length to avoid any weariness. The Brahms overture was the novelty of the evening, and proved a highly interesting work, the strong individuality of the composer being shown in it very clearly, and its character appealing more quickly to the ear than that by the same composer recently presented by Mr. Thomas. The work done by the soloist and orchestra on this occasion calls for no extended comment. Undoubtedly a close following of the score of the several works might show an occasional error, but the effect of the whole obliterated any such slight imperfections and left only a feeling of unqualified pleasure at the success attending the new conductor's efforts. Mr. Sherwood has never been heard to better advantage, his crisp, clear touch, his intelligent and artistic phrasing and his finished technique combining to give, to the concert especially, an interpretation full of excellent points. Mr. Henschel appears to have gained largely in ease during the last week, and, while his direction retains all the magnetic control which promises so much for his future career, his action indicated a more assured feeling than at the opening concert. His reading of the symphony was full of vitality, and the beauties of the work were presented with a freshness and vigor which has seldom been equalled by American orchestras. The Lachner march made a capital finale for such a programme, and sent the audience away, with its stirring measures ringing in their ears, resting and refreshing them. It is worthy of record that the audience was a model one, hardly a sound interrupting the several numbers, the tap of the conductor's baton causing, as it should, absolute silence throughout the hall. The programme of the next concert will be found in the musical column.

Special MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The second concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel. The opening number was Brahms's "Tragic Overture, opus 81," a work of surprising richness and nobility, and which received a most glorious interpretation by the band. Beethoven's "Symphony in C, No. 1, opus 21," was rendered with the conductor's own clearness and insight, and Lachner's "March in B flat," which concluded the programme, was likewise given with magnificent effect. Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who was the soloist, played Edward Greig's "Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, opus 16," "Warum?" by Schumann, and Chopin's "Scherzo in C sharp minor," with the same artistic elegance which we have had so many occasions to commend before. The audience was a model one,—generous in its appreciation, but profoundly conscious of the fact that repetitions were notoriously out of place. Mr. Henschel's work had the marked characteristics of his first appearance before a Boston audience as a conductor. Strength, vitality and magnetism over his musicians, imparting to them his own enthusiasm and musicianly qualities, being perhaps even more noticeable than at the last concert. On Saturday evening of this week Mozart's "Symphony in G minor" will be given, and Miss Lillian Bailey Henschel will sing an air from Handel's "Giulio Cesare" and Mr. Henschel's "Hymne and Créateur."

Musical.

How Journal Nov. 5, 1897

MR. HENSCHEL AND THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—We must confess that we cannot commend the extravagant use that is being made of Mr. Henschel's name in connection with the series of symphony concerts now being given in Music Hall. Few are really aware that there exists such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its concerts are now advertised as the Henschel symphony concerts, notwithstanding it was the intention of Mr. H. L. Higginson, who established the series with a view of popularizing a high class of music, the credit accruing thereby to enhance in due measure upon the reputation of our city by the use that was made of its name. He not only refused, but unlike Mr. Henschel he successfully prevented the formal use of his name in connection with the series. He hired Mr. Henschel to conduct the concerts at a high salary for the series, the name Henschel to be a secondary consideration in connection with the enterprise, but that of Boston being patriotically designated in its stead. But Mr. Henschel's individuality is now being set forth and lauded by indiscreet friends so effectively that he seems to be monopolizing a vast amount of reputation that is far from being his due. A noteworthy project in Boston's behalf has thus been subjected to a misnomer. Were Mr. Henschel the most eminent of conductors, instead of appearing in this capacity as an able musician, though one of limited experience, the criticisms we have made would still hold good. It would indeed seem absurd to advertise the Harvard or the Philharmonic concerts as those of Zerrahn and Maas, and the respective societies themselves would probably object to such arrangements, displaying thereby a jealousy of their own good designations such as Mr. Higginson, in his present position, from motives of delicacy, no doubt, carefully represses. We have been actuated by naught but just and proper regard for Mr. Henschel in the exceptions we have taken. We have objected to a misnomer because it unfairly detracts from the praise that is Mr. Higginson's due, and does not in the least degree express his intentions in regard to the naming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Nevertheless it is all quite natural that we should hear so much ill-timed talk about the Henschel Symphony concerts. Mr. Henschel has made himself conspicuous in many ways, and though a very capable musician he has acquired that peculiar kind of notoriety which artists generally abhor. He is a man of unusual versatility, yet in his methods of doing things he occasionally displays the eccentricity of a genius, and does it with a self-consciousness that seems to be wholly irrepressible. All this accounts for our hearing so much about the "Henschel" Symphony concerts, and so little in regard to some of their most praiseworthy features. Mr. Henschel's method of conducting is made an absorbing theme for discussion whenever music itself is referred to in this vicinity. In considering his merits we shall do so with the sympathy due him who so to speak is subjected to a vast amount of snow-balling, yet who is not in a position to snow-ball in return. He should be judged with more than an ordinary degree of fairness, and his musical performances and acts should be correspondingly treated. Such an artist as he, tho' he will not exercise a great deal of shrewdness, must take care that arrogance and ardent self-appreciation do not inflame the jealousy of others so effectively as to cause his failure. The self-pride, that his friends have commended, and his adversaries condemned, should not appear more prominent than his capacity to sustain the praiseworthy element with good, solid, conscientious and artistic work;—such work as he is capable of, and such as would prove a benefit to almost any community. He should be fully capable of shaping his own course, and we depart from advice in order to refer more directly to some of his peculiar ideas in regard to orchestral management, etc., some of which only it is our duty to defend and commend. True, he appears in a slight degree to be playing the role of a sensationalist, but his conducting is not of an empirical order, and he is in no sense of the word a charlatan. His arrangement of his orchestra upon the stage from its very novelty of inception is calculated to excite intense aversion; but we are even more convinced than we were at the first concert respecting the practicability of this new arrangement. To place the first and second violins promiscuously together, and other instruments in relative positions, tends to a unity and completeness of performance that we do not believe can be attained by any of the more conservative methods. Mr. Henschel is a radical, but there appears to be a well-established theory at the foundation of this important phase in his radicalism. This promiscuity of orchestral arrangement, bringing in tonal sympathy elements of the orchestra that have heretofore been separated, requires not extended reasoning to demonstrate its merit. The musical effect it produces is a novel, and, deducting such partial qualifications as we shall make, a decidedly agreeable one.

If in the String Quartette it has always been found necessary to place the first and second violins beside each other, we do not see why a similar principle should not hold good in its application to a full string band. We ourselves objected last week to an application of the principle so far as it affected the performance of elaborately contrapuntal music. The objection has been unanimously urged, but we are inclined to believe it has a very remote effect upon the feasibility of the plan itself. An orchestra of fairly skilled players, where the members one and all can read intricate music in individual parts correctly, should experience but little difficulty and create no tonal confusion whatever in performing under such circumstances as Mr. Henschel has created.

We now come to a consideration of the concert on Saturday evening last, when Mr. Henschel presented the following programme: Tragic Overture, Op. 81, (new), Brahms; Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 16, Edvard Grieg; Symphony in C, No. 4, Beethoven; Piano Solo—a. Warum (Why?) Op. 12, No. 3, Schumann; b. Scherzo in C sharp minor, Op. 39, Chopin; March in B flat, from the Suite, Op. 113, Franz Lachner; the soloist of the concert being Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood. The programme proved a very acceptable one, and we can praise it for all but its single novelty, the overture, so-called "tragic," by Brahms. For one who has licious work, in which the young Beethoven pays homage so charmingly to the genius of Haydn and Mozart—came back to us like an old and loved friend after a too long absence. Mr. Henschel's conducting of this symphony shone alike by its positive merits and by the absence of certain too common faults. Of that furious, passionate onslaught upon the musical mood of his listeners which was noticeable at the first concert, not a trace remained. Not a single tempo was exaggerated. Also, we cannot thank Mr. Henschel enough for sparing us those excessive pianissimos with which some modern conductors try to adorn whatever composition falls into their hands; over-delicate effects which delight the ear in much of the more modern music, but which sit on a Beethoven symphony about as gracefully as an "ashes-of-roses" æsthetic gown would upon a Raphael Madonna. Yet it will take more rehearsing to make the orchestra implicitly follow Mr. Henschel's baton through this brighter and serenely musical domain than it did to make them do his more vehement bidding at the first concert. Impetuosity is ever more infectious than discretion; it is always easier to make an orchestra play faster than they have been accustomed to do (if the lead is given with vigorous decision) than to make them do things more deliberately. In the andante con moto Mr. Henschel kept his forces well together; the easy, rhythmic swing of his tempo in the opening phrase was of a sort easily to impress itself on the minds of the players at once; but in the finale he could not quite prevent the orchestra from running away from his baton, and the admirable tempo he began by taking was lost after the first few measures of the allegro molto e vivace. Upon the whole, the orchestra did not preserve so perfect an ensemble as at the first concert; the intention was far better, but the execution less good.

The march from Franz Lachner's B-flat suite closed the concert brilliantly, and was most capitally played—vigorously, in strict time, with excellent accent, and without any meritorious attempt at getting more out of the music than there was in it. The audience was even larger than at the first concert. On next Saturday the following programme will be given:

Tragic overture, op. 81, Brahms; air (Giulio Cesare), Handel; symphony in G-minor, Mozart; two Slavonian dances, op. 46, Nos. 4 and 1, Dvořák; hymne au Créateur (new, MS.), Henschel; overture (The Merry Wives of Windsor), Nicolai.

Mrs. Henschel will be the singer.

MUSICAL MATTERS. Herald

Second Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Mr. W. H. Sherwood, and the programme as follows:

Tragic Overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor. Op. 16.....Edvard Grieg
Symphony in C. No. 1.....Beethoven
Piano Solo—
a. Warum (Why?). Op. 12, No. 3.....Schumann
b. Scherzo in C sharp minor. Op. 39.....Chopin
March in B flat, from the Suite Op. 113, Franz Lachner

The programme again demonstrated Mr. Henschel's good taste and judgment, the works being well contrasted and of just sufficient length to avoid any weariness. The Brahms overture was the novelty of the evening, and proved a highly interesting work, the strong individuality of the composer being shown in it very clearly, and its character appealing more quickly to the ear than that by the same composer recently presented by Mr. Thomas. The work done by the soloist and orchestra on this occasion calls for no extended comment. Undoubtedly a close following of the score of the several works might show an occasional error, but the effect of the whole obliterated any such slight imperfections and left only a feeling of unqualified pleasure at the success attending the new conductor's efforts. Mr. Sherwood has never been heard to better advantage, his crisp, clear touch, his intelligent and artistic phrasing and his finished technique combining to give, to the concert, especially, an interpretation full of excellent points. Mr. Henschel appears to have gained largely in ease during the last week, and, while his direction retains all the magnetic control which promises so much for his future career, his action indicated a more assured feeling than at the opening concert. His reading of the symphony was full of vitality, and the beauties of the work were presented with a freshness and vigor which has seldom been equalled by American orchestras. The Lachner march made a capital finale for such a programme, and sent the audience away, with its stirring measures ringing in their ears, resting and refreshing them. It is worthy of record that the audience was a model one, hardly a sound interrupting the several numbers, the tap of the conductor's baton causing, as it should, absolute silence throughout the hall. The programme of the next concert will be found in the musical column.

77026107 MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The second concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel. The opening number was Brahms's "Tragic Overture, opus 81," a work of surprising richness and nobility, and which received a most glorious interpretation by the band. Beethoven's "Symphony in C, No. 1, opus 21," was rendered with the conductor's own clearness and insight, and Lachner's "March in B flat," which concluded the programme, was likewise given with magnificent effect. Mr. W. H. Sherwood, who was the soloist, played Edward Grieg's "Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, opus 16," "Warum?" by Schumann, and Chopin's "Scherzo in C sharp minor," with the same artistic elegance which we have had so many occasions to commend before. The audience was a model one,—generous in its appreciation, but profoundly conscious of the fact that repetitions were notoriously out of place. Mr. Henschel's work had the marked characteristics of his first appearance before a Boston audience as a conductor. Strength, vitality and magnetism over his musicians, imparting to them his own enthusiasm and musicianly qualities, being perhaps even more noticeable than at the last concert. On Saturday evening of this week Mozart's "Symphony in G minor" will be given, and Miss Lillian Bailey Henschel will sing an air from Handel's "Giulio Cesare" and Mr. Henschel's "Hymne and Créateur."

Musical.

Home Journal Nov 5, 1897

MR. HENSCHEL AND THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—We must confess that we cannot commend the extravagant use that is being made of Mr. Henschel's name in connection with the series of symphony concerts now being given in Music Hall. Few are really aware that there exists such an organization as the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Its concerts are now advertised as the Henschel symphony concerts, notwithstanding it was the intention of Mr. H. L. Higginson, who established the series with a view of popularizing a high class of music, the credit accruing thereby to enhance in due measure upon the reputation of our city by the use that was made of its name. He not only refused, but unlike Mr. Henschel he successfully prevented the formal use of his name in connection with the series. He hired Mr. Henschel to conduct the concerts at a high salary for the series, the name Henschel to be a secondary consideration in connection with the enterprise, but that of Boston being patriotically designated in its stead. But Mr. Henschel's individuality is now being set forth and lauded by indiscreet friends so effectively that he seems to be monopolizing a vast amount of reputation that is far from being his due. A noteworthy project in Boston's behalf has thus been subjected to a misnomer. Were Mr. Henschel the most eminent of conductors, instead of appearing in this capacity as an able musician, though one of limited experience, the criticisms we have made would still hold good. It would indeed seem absurd to advertise the Harvard or the Philharmonic concerts as those of Zerrahn and Maas, and the respective societies themselves would probably object to such arrangements, displaying thereby a jealousy of their own good designations such as Mr. Higginson, in his present position, from motives of delicacy, no doubt, carefully represses. We have been actuated by naught but just and proper regard for Mr. Henschel in the exceptions we have taken. We have objected to a misnomer because it unfairly detracts from the praise that is Mr. Higginson's due, and does not in the least degree express his intentions in regard to the naming of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts. Nevertheless it is all quite natural that we should hear so much ill-timed talk about the Henschel Symphony concerts. Mr. Henschel has made himself conspicuous in many ways, and though a very capable musician he has acquired that peculiar kind of notoriety which artists generally abhor. He is a man of unusual versatility, yet in his methods of doing things he occasionally displays the eccentricity of a genius, and does it with a self-consciousness that seems to be wholly irrepressible. All this accounts for our hearing so much about the "Henschel" Symphony concerts, and so little in regard to some of their most praiseworthy features. Mr. Henschel's method of conducting is made an absorbing theme for discussion whenever music itself is referred to in this vicinity. In considering his merits we shall do so with the sympathy due him who so to speak is subjected to a vast amount of snow-balling, yet who is not in a position to snow-ball in return. He should be judged with more than an ordinary degree of fairness, and his musical performances and acts should be correspondingly treated. Such an artist as he, though he will not exercise a great deal of shrewdness, must take care that arrogance and ardent self-appreciation do not inflame the jealousy of others so effectively as to cause his failure. The self-pride, that his friends have commended, and his adversaries condemned, should not appear more prominent than his capacity to sustain the praiseworthy element with good, solid, conscientious and artistic work;—such work as he is capable of, and such as would prove a benefit to almost any community. He should be fully capable of shaping his own course, and we depart from advice in order to refer more directly to some of his peculiar ideas in regard to orchestral management, etc., some of which only it is our duty to defend and commend. True, he appears in a slight degree to be playing the role of a sensationalist, but his conducting is not of an empirical order, and he is in no sense of the word a charlatan. His arrangement of his orchestra upon the stage from its very novelty of inception is calculated to excite intense aversion; but we are even more convinced than we were at the first concert respecting the practicability of this new arrangement. To place the first and second violins promiscuously together, and other instruments in relative positions, tends to a unity and completeness of performance that we do not believe can be attained by any of the more conservative methods. Mr. Henschel is a radical, but there appears to be a well-established theory at the foundation of this important phase in his radicalism. This promiscuity of orchestral arrangement, bringing in tonal sympathy elements of the orchestra that have heretofore been separated, requires not extended reasoning to demonstrate its merit. The musical effect it produces is a novel, and, deducting such partial qualifications as we shall make, a decidedly agreeable one.

If in the String Quartette it has always been found necessary to place the first and second violins beside each other, we do not see why a similar principle should not hold good in its application to a full string band. We ourselves objected last week to an application of the principle so far as it affected the performance of elaborately contrapuntal music. The objection has been unanimously urged, but we are inclined to believe it has a very remote effect upon the feasibility of the plan itself. An orchestra of fairly skilled players, where the members one and all can read intricate music in individual parts correctly, should experience but little difficulty and create no tonal confusion whatever in performing under such circumstances as Mr. Henschel has created.

We now come to a consideration of the concert on Saturday evening last, when Mr. Henschel presented the following programme: Tragic Overture, Op. 81, (new), Brahms; Concerto for Pianoforte in A minor, Op. 16, Edvard Grieg; Symphony in C, No. 4, Beethoven; Piano Solo—a. Warum (Why?) Op. 12, No. 3, Schumann; b. Scherzo in C sharp minor, Op. 39, Chopin; March in B flat, from the Suite, Op. 113, Franz Lachner; the soloist of the concert being Mr. Wm. H. Sherwood. The programme proved a very acceptable one, and we can praise it for all but its single novelty, the overture, so-called "tragic," by Brahms. For one who has all his life-time been a bitter opponent of Wagner and Liszt, the mysterious Brahms appears a most inconsistent imitator of his opponents' theories. He does not imitate wisely, but too well; and we find in his compositions all that is visionary and experimental in connection with the new school, much that is laborious in its development, and little that is royal and inspiring. Tragic Overture! We were about to object to the designation, but as its second performance takes place in Music Hall to-night we shall no doubt find a certain likeness to tragedy in the fate that inevitably will consign it to oblivion. Such ambiguous and meaningless works cannot be tolerated for more than several hearings. Another selection on the programme worthy of mention, was the Grieg concerto. It has been heard here before, and it again impressed us as for the most part an impassioned and scholarly production. Mr. Sherwood's interpretation of it was an earnest, broad and artistic one. He presented his enviable mastery of the piano in its most favorable light, and as usual disarmed criticism of even that trivial tendency to pick flaws which too many musicians and critics delight in commending. He interpreted that delicate gem of sentiment by Schumann, "Warum?" ("Why?") just at the close of an intermission (why?) when there was a disturbance in the hall that somewhat embarrassed his effort; but a superb and manly rendering of Chopin's C sharp minor scherzo proved a crowning element of his evening's playing that every one present seemed enthusiastic in appreciating. The Miller piano on which he performed shared our appreciation of the effect of his playing by its thoroughly musical and impressive qualities. The orchestra did exceptionally good service, except in its accompaniment of the Grieg concerto, where it shabbily assisted the pianist, who, had he not been so experienced and capable, would have often been greatly hindered in his effort. Mr. Henschel conducted, and though he often exhibited an unsteadiness in his beat which he would no doubt have us regard as a tempo rubato, yet in other respects his lead was spirited and intelligent.

AIDS TO THE "UNMUSICAL."

The Henschel Concerts and Other Musical Advantages in Boston This Winter—Their Improvement—A Friendly Word to the Unmusical—Some Musical Terms Explained. Advertiser

The Henschel symphony concerts, by their low price, afford standard music to many who have not often heard such; and their weekly recurrence, together with the advance publication of each programme, tends to produce in their regular auditors a continuity of what might be called a musical frame of mind. The Friday afternoon rehearsals, also, enable any one to hear the same music twice, with but a day's interval. Other concerts have already multiplied; and, altogether, opportunities for improvement in musical knowledge and taste are presented this winter which all would do well to seize. But aside from those who desire real acquaintance with classical music, there is the far larger class who go to concerts just to be pleased. These are always ready to proclaim that "they know nothing at all about music, though they enjoy it." But have not these something to do, in connection with their present unusual opportunities, to make even this enjoyment all that it might be? No one need learn anything, for learning's own sake, even in Boston; but would not the same pains taken by people of ordinary attainments to inform themselves about pictures and artists, about authors and their books, for a better appreciation of these, meet the same reward in the direction of music? Why should music be set apart as a subject of utter ignorance, merely because one does not make a deliberate study of learning to play on some instrument, or to sing? It seems doubtful if the gulf between the "musical," so-called, and the "unmusical" be so unchangeably wide as it is popularly supposed. It is true enough that a separation exists; but the very fact that, in proportion as musical knowledge becomes profound, does the possible appreciation of music and its performers who translate it become comprehensive, is itself the best argument for beginning, at any time of life, the alphabet of the science if not of the art. And this alphabet is by no means necessarily the notes, and the counting, and all that. It is whatever awakens interest, sharpens the perceptions, assists the judgment, and purifies the taste. It is preëminently the education of the ear.

"All roads lead to Rome": it remains for the would-be traveller only to choose one and walk in it. Perhaps a good enough guide-post may be the programme of the next concert. Who were the various composers named in it? What is a symphony? What is meant by the musical terms given in regard to this one? Of the many such used by musicians, but few ever appear on a concert programme, and these relate chiefly to the "time" of the music, that is, to its rate of speed. They are always Italian, and frequently with a literal signification. In the Henschel concert of next Saturday night, the symphony is the fourth of Beethoven, his sixtieth work. The short breaks between its four "movements" are indicated by little dashes separating the words descriptive of its time. The first movement begins "adagio,"—slow,—but not in the slowest time, which is called "largo." The next grade of quickness above "adagio" would be "andante," which strictly means going or walking at a smooth and ordinary pace. A reasonable acceleration changes the latter into "allegro," or quick, and this betokens the character of the closing portion of the first movement, with the idea of vivacity added,—"allegro vivace." This second movement is wholly adagio. The third, in any symphony, is usually of a wide-awake character, and is more commonly the one known as the "scherzo," or the light, playful movement which relieves the weight of the heavier parts. Yet not all symphonies have precisely four movements, so that the absolute position of this may vary. This one before us is lively enough, being at its beginning and ending "allegro vivace," and in the middle also quick in but a little less degree, as "un poco meno" signifies. The fourth and final movement, or finale, is still allegro, but not too much ("ma non troppo"). Those familiar with French, if not with Italian, may discern a shortened mais in "ma," and in "troppo" a lengthened trop. These same words, with slight adverbial modifications meaning "enough," or "very," or "spiritedly," and the like, form the staple of the musical terms which even the unmusical need to know.

Very different schools of music are represented on this programme of a half-dozen pieces. The closing overture is from one of the painstaking Boieldieu's best and later works, though the "Caliph of Bagdad" is perhaps more generally known. It is one merit of these concerts that, while presenting the indispensable favorites, they introduce to the general public many pleasing works which they might otherwise miss. The biographies of most of these composers have much of interest for the general reader, in their pictures of hard-working genius, of fascinating precocity, of saddened but indomitable manhood, especially as shown in Beethoven and Mozart. The life of the latter is one romance, from his marvellous childhood to his neglected burial and now unknown grave, in which he was laid in his thirty-sixth year.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 5TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

- | | |
|---|-----------|
| TRAGIC OVERTURE, Op. 81. | BRAHMS. |
| AIR. (Giulio Cesare.) | HÄNDEL. |
| SYMPHONY in G minor. (Koechel, No. 48.) | MOZART. |
| Allegro molto.—Andante.—
Minuetto (Allegro).—Finale (Allegro assai.) | |
| TWO SLAVONIAN DANCES. Op. 46, Nos. 4 and 1. | DVOŘÁK. |
| Tempo di Minuetto.—Presto.— | |
| HYMNE AU CRÉATEUR. (New, MS.) | HENSCHEL. |
| OVERTURE. (The merry wives of Windsor.) | NICOLAI. |

SOLOIST:

MRS. HENSCHEL.

Air. (Giulio Cesare.) HÄNDEL.

E pur così in un giorno perdo fasti e grandezze; Ahi, fato rio! Cesare, il mio bel nome è forse estinto; Cornelia e Sesto inermi son, nè sanno darmi soccorso. Oh Dio! Non resta alcuna speme al viver mio.

Piangerò la sorte mia,
Si crudele e tanto ria,
Finchè vita in petto avrò.
Ma poi morta d'ogni intorno,
Il tiranno, e notte e giorno,
Fatta spettro, agiterò.
Piangerò, etc., etc.

Hymne au Créateur. HENSCHEL.

Quel feu s'allume dans mon cœur!
Quel dieu vient habiter mon âme!
A son aspect consolateur
Et je m'éclaire et je m'enflamme.
Ah viens! Je t'adore, Esprit Créateur!

Un jour plus pur luit à mes yeux,
Dieu de clarté, je t'en rends grâce!
Je vois fuir l'esprit ténébreux,
La foi dans mon cœur prend sa place,
Tous mes désirs sont pour les cieux.

Je vois mille ennemis divers
Conjurer ma perte éternelle;
J'entends tous leurs complots pervers:
Dieu, romps leur trame criminelle
Qu'ils retombent dans les Enfers.

Règne à jamais, O Dieu d'amour,
Sur ce cœur qui devient ton temple,
Que je t'honore dès ce jour,
Que mon œil charmé te contemple
Dans l'éclat du divin séjour.

THE THIRD BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last night does not require as extended mention as that of the previous week. It was lighter and of pleasant diversity. The Brahms Tragic Overture was a repetition from the last concert. The piece de resistance was the Mozart symphony in G minor. This is one of the most interesting of Mozart's instrumental works, and the most original of his symphonies. Mozart gives more of sadness in this work than is usual with him, and his portrayal of passion is more forcible and less formal than is his wont. Critics certainly have discovered more in the work than circumstances may warrant, but the fact that this was the favorite Mozart symphony with both Mendelssohn and Schubert, is significant. For all its depth of feeling and its passionate beauty, its form is clear and easily grasped; even the key is seldom changed.

To place such works as Dvorak's Slavonic Dances beside this symphony could not but enhance the effect of each. The freest of musical pictures are these half-savage compositions. We have heard them here before, but Mr. Henschel's conception is a new one, and gives an entirely different flavor to the movements. He takes the minuetto movement slower than usual, and he has evidently given special attention to internal variations of time. We much admire his reading of them. As to the performance of the symphony, it had both merits and faults. The work itself does not gain by being presented by a large orchestra. It was written for a very small one, and all of its effects can be given more delicately by fewer numbers. The strings were rough at times, in the heavy bowings, and the large number of contra-basses gave some rather coarse touches.

The development of the principal theme in the first movement was finely done, especially the responses between strings and clarinets and flutes. The andante was taken very slowly, and its effect may have been a trifle weakened thereby. The last movement (allegro assai) is probably the most interesting piece of instrumental work that Mozart has left us. Its very beginning, a tender motive of violins, brusquely interrupted at every phrase, is different from the master's usual vein, and its furious and passionate development is wonderful. The Handel aria—from Julius Caesar—was well sung by Mrs. Henschel. Its recitative was finely enunciated; its legato first part given with tender pathos, and its more elaborate trio part, roudades and embellishments well phrased; but the great vocal success was in Mr. Henschel's own Hymn to the Creator, which was sung with the greatest possible expression and purity. The composition is a masterly one, opening with a broad, sweeping melody, which is followed by an agitated movement, dramatic and forcible, which leads to the finale, a passage of great sweetness, which pictures bliss in the modern musical vein, by sustained notes of woodwind and muted strings against the voice; effects which remind one unconsciously of Lohengrin. We have not space to worthily analyze the construction and thought of the work. The overture to the Merry Wives of Windsor, by Nicolai, with its swingy movement and pompous effects, was well given, save in the syncopations, which were somewhat demoralized. Next week there will be an alteration in the manner of seating the orchestra, the rear performers being raised on a platform, and brought nearer the conductor. The woodwind will still, however, be near its present position. The next programme will be an especially fine one, consisting of overture, Ruy Blas, Mendelssohn; concerto for piano forte in G, (No. 3) op. 45, Anton Rubinstein; symphony in D, (No. 2) op. 36, Beethoven; piano solo, a prelude in B flat minor, J. S. Bach (No. 22 of the clavichord bien tempere), b. Scherzo in B flat minor, op. 31, Chopin; introduction, the Master Singers of Nuremberg, Wagner; with Mr. B. J. Lang in the piano works.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The arrangement of the Boston Symphony orchestra has occasioned some criticism, and Mr. Henschel's idea has been both commended and condemned by those familiar with the arrangement followed by the great conductors of the world. The plan of seating at the first three concerts has been an approximation to Mr. Henschel's idea, but at the next concert the audience will see the plan in all its completeness, the platform now in process of construction being promised in season for the rehearsals of the coming week. The following plan shows the general position of the several instruments, but it must be borne in mind that the several rows rise one above the other, in amphitheatre style, the extreme height at the back being 42 inches from the level on which the first violins are seated.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THIRD SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Mr. Henschel has thus far managed his concerts well, in that he has made their performance time fall almost within an hour and a half, and that each programme has ended with a selection so bright and so brightly played that the audience should have found themselves going away in the brightest humor and pleasantest disposition. The many who failed to do so on Saturday evening last have to blame a few dozen thoroughly reprehensible people who hustled out in that unpleasant way which we all know only too well, spoiling, as they went, the effect of a charmingly fresh rendering of Nicolai's delicate "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture. Before this number Mr. Henschel made a pause ample and reasonable enough for all persons to go out who were bound to ten o'clock trains. The local time tables show no trains which would justify this other uprising of only three or five minutes later, and it must therefore be characterized as completely unnecessary and inexcusable. The evil of breaking in upon the earlier numbers has been cured, and if such persons as these are not deterred hereafter by a sense of shame or a perception of how the majority of the audience regard them from injuring the last number, we hope that Mr. Henschel will apply to them the same heroic remedy of closed doors, and let them be kept in full view of the audience, to be noted and censured as they deserve.

The orchestral part of the concert was a new proof of Mr. Henschel's vigorous and inspiring leadership, and of his own growth in steadiness and sustained intention. Isolated chords are struck by the whole orchestra with a unity and instantaneousness which indicate better perhaps than almost anything else the promptness and vitality which he has developed. "Something too much" yet lacks in delicacy, especially in the first violins. And here, possibly, public opinion is somewhat to blame. We have so long cried out for greater force and decision in the strings, that it is not unreasonable to suppose that the players, finding themselves in goodly number and led by a man who demands and inspires animation and strength, exceed, in the excitement of so full an ensemble, that limit which their own better judgment would dictate. Certainly at the rehearsal they were less harsh than at the concert in their reading of the Mozart symphony, although even then there was perceptible a good deal of stiffness in the last movement. We cannot think that the first movement need have lost an atom of its clearness, if the incisiveness of this part had been tempered by a sensitiveness like that which was pleasantly apparent in portions of the andante,—in which latter movement, by the way, the sforzandi showed improvement since the preceding concert. The "Tragic Overture" began the programme, as on the preceding evening, and was willingly reheard. Not a wonderful work, it has yet more consecutiveness and apparent plan than many of Brahms's compositions, and so really merits more than a passing presentation. The other orchestral number was the two Slavonian dances, by Dvorak, which have been heard here under Mr. Listemann's direction. They were rendered with great good taste, and yet with so marked a ballabile rhythm that more than one listener must have longed to assume the bedecked costumes and tread the romantic measures which their strains suggested. Much praise is here due for the keen but unexaggerated entrances of the drums and cymbals, as well as for the general smoothness of the basses and the excellence of the short modulation and obligato for violoncello.

Mrs. Henschel was the soloist of the evening, and was most warmly welcomed and heartily recalled after each selection. These were the recitative and air from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," "Piangerò la mia sorte," and Mr. Henschel's "Hymne au Créateur." The first is stately and noble, in a vein so sombre that at first it seemed too much in the tone of the "Tragic Overture" which it immediately followed; but, on second thought, we are inclined to consider it well-placed as illustrating vocally the sentiment suggested by the instrumental introduction. Mr. Henschel's hymn, taken from his portfolio of manuscripts, is a pensive, but by no means tame or monotonous melody, orchestrated with a variety which, although fanciful, never departs from the quietude and respect due to the subject, and in which much agreeable use is made of the wooden wind instruments and the horns. Mrs. Henschel was admirable throughout in style, and in the dramatic expression which she suggested in the aria and in the third couplet of the hymn:—

*Je vois mille ennemis divers
Conjurer ma perte éternelle.*

We say suggested, in no captiously critical sense; for with her delicate voice, almost child-like in its simplicity and freshness, it is impossible for Mrs. Henschel to give such music the strong declamation and full lyric breadth which are necessary to a complete performance of it, and it is no depreciation of her artistic merit to say that in this sense the Handel selection was beyond her powers. The other couplets of the hymn were sung admirably, and with a truly reverent spirit. If Mrs. Henschel would only try to pronounce her words intelligibly! Without the text before one it would be impossible to guess in what language she might be singing; and having a voice whose quality needs no purifying, the mechanical matter of nice enunciation ought to offer no great difficulty.

The symphony for the fourth concert will be Beethoven's second; the introductory overture, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," and the closing number Wagner's introduction to his "Meistersänger von Nürenberg." The solo music will be Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto in G, a Bach prelude and a Chopin scherzo, all to be played by Mr. B. J. Lang. At this concert, also, the band will probably be arranged exactly according to the disposition which Mr. Henschel had in his mind at first, but which he has not yet been able to carry out for the want of proper platforms for the middle and rear rows of players. It is expected that when these members of the band are more elevated there will be a greater clearness and directness in their playing, and that the objection hitherto raised to their position will disappear.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Tammany
Third Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Another admirable programme, and a fuller house than ever! Brahms's tragic overture, with which the concert opened, seems, after two hearings, one of the most entirely satisfactory works of the composer. The themes, if not of the most plastic distinctness of contour, are yet noble in character, and are worked out by the hand of a master, the varied aspects they assume during the course of the composition never overstepping the limits of good taste, nor infringing upon that general unity of purpose which the artistic sense demands in a serious work. The orchestration is at once masterly and free from all undue striving after purely physical effects. In a word, the work is classic in style and character, in the best sense of the term. The title "tragic" is peculiarly felicitous; Brahms has shown a keen perception of the exact meaning of this adjective. The overture is well suited to herald the presentation of a true tragedy in the antique (or even French conventional) sense of the word; its dignified reserve of style, its freedom from sordid intensity are perfectly in harmony with the spirit of true tragedy. Compared with some other things of the composer which we have heard, it is seen to bear very much the same relation to them that Sophocles's "Oedipus," or Corneille's "Les Horaces," does to Hugo's "Hernani." The orchestra played it most excellently. The soprano air, "Piangerò la mia sorte" from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," which immediately followed the overture, is still more in the ideal tragic vein—in Handel's very largest and most serious style. Mrs. Henschel sang it with consummate artistic finish, and with the truest appreciation of its real character. Yet one cannot but feel, after all, that the selection was an unfortunate one. There are certain compositions which demand peculiar physical qualities in the performer. These qualities lacking, no amount of artistic instinct or culture, no amount of intellect, however well applied to the task, will fit the singer to render them adequately. This air of Handel's, like many airs of Gluck's, absolutely demands a large, generous and commanding physique in the singer; it is on a heroic scale throughout. How admirably Mrs. Henschel's musical nature, her excellent vocal training and the rare amount of brains and talent she brings to bear upon whatever she undertakes, fit her for the accomplishment of the highest musical tasks, we recognize most heartily. But her physique unfits her for tasks of just this sort; not that her voice cannot be heard—we heard every note distinctly—but that her voice is in quality as well as in quantity out of character with the music. Mme. Pappenheim would be equally out of place in Mozart's "Vedrai, carino." The ever wonderful G-minor symphony of Mozart came next. After the concert we heard one of our younger musicians say, "I had to leave the hall after the symphony; I felt so dazed with sugary sweetness that I could listen to nothing more!" We have met with similar expressions of feeling concerning Mozart several times of late; indeed, there is probably a large portion of our public who regard Mozart as little more than a delightful musical candy maker. We wish it were in our power to rectify their singularly superficial opinion. We never hear Mozart spoken of in this vein without thinking of what Professor Bowen said about Schopenhauer (we quote from memory) that "he wrote so brilliantly and was so easily to be read, that people thought that he could not possibly be a profound metaphysician." In Mozart's case it may truly be said, "Out of the strong cometh sweetness." Under the fascinating grace of style, under the finished perfection of detail, there lurk a profound depth of thought, a burning fire of passion, a noble pathos and a titanic strength, which the casual listener too often does not suspect, and for which one may seek in vain in many another composer. Look for it in him, and you shall surely find it. One thing may be said—Mr. Henschel is pursuing a somewhat daring plan in thus playing Mozart, Haydn and the younger Beethoven at the very outset when his orchestra has had less drill and less experience of his baton than it will have had later on. These apparently simple works are terrible tests of an orchestra's playing; their texture is not only delicate, but as transparent as glass; the most unimportant player in the band is almost as much "in evidence"—to use a Gallicism—as if he were playing a solo; the slightest slip tells. That Mr. Henschel is fast getting control over his forces in delicate work, is evident, but that he has not yet reached perfection is equally plain. Dvorak's two Slavonian Dances (already heard here) were given with great spirit, and made an immense effect. Too brilliant an effect, indeed, to make it easy for the audience to force themselves back into the proper mood for Mr. Henschel's MS. "Hymne au Créateur" which immediately followed. In this hymn (which was beautifully sung by Mrs. Henschel) there are many instances of new and effective use being made of familiar musical material—not of borrowed themes, by any means, but of familiar melodic and harmonic turns. The orchestration is singularly beautiful; we hope to hear the work again. Nicolai's ever-fascinating overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor" brought the concert to a brilliant close. This overture has been too little heard of late; it is one of the most thoroughly excellent works of its class, and cannot fail to delight all sorts of music lovers. It was capitally played.

At the next concert the programme announced on the bills will not be given, on account of Mr. Lang's having met with a serious (albeit temporary) injury to his right hand. We understand that his inability to play the Rubinstein concerto will necessitate an entire change of bill, which will be announced in due season.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony Concert took place at Music Hall last night before a similarly large and brilliant audience as attended each of the preceding entertainments of the series. The programme opened with a second performance of Brahms's "Tragic" Overture, which is not one of those works which present new beauties upon a second hearing. All that it contained was heard upon its first presentation a week ago, and a further acquaintance with it does no more than afford a deeper insight into its composer's technical skill and the dryness of his melodic invention. The symphony was Mozart's ever fresh and ever beautiful one in G-minor. Mr. Henschel did better with the temple of this work than with either of the other symphonies he has conducted here. The opening allegro received the best treatment of the four, though it was lacking here and there in true Mozartian delicacy of expression and there was a dragging heaviness in the playing of the strings in the lighter passages of the movement, but the general effect was praiseworthy. Not so that of the andante, which was given in a very coarse and unsympathetic manner, and with much unnecessary rasping in the double basses. The difficulty experienced in hearing some of the delicate passages for the wind instruments, owing to their unfavorable position, left several awkward gaps in the score. The roughness with which the more decided portions of the movement were interpreted was antagonistic also to the innate character of the movement. The first part of the minuet was played in a large and impressive manner, but the delicate trio was rendered very cloudy by the uncertainty of the wind instruments. The finale was interpreted with much coarseness by the strings, which showed a disposition to hurry the time and at last almost carried the conductor along with them. The double basses again came into unpleasant prominence through the roughness of their work. As we gain experience of the orchestra we are more and more impressed that there are too many of these instruments to form a due balance with the rest of the strings, and the disproportion is very strongly felt in such delicate works as this symphony. Two Slavonian Dances, Nos. 4 and 1 of op. 46, by Dvorak, spirited and very interesting compositions and richly scored, were very finely performed. The other instrumental number was Nicolai's charming overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," which also had an exceedingly broad, expressive and spirited rendering. Mrs. Henschel was the soloist. Her first contribution to the programme was the Recitative and Aria, "E pur così,"—"Piangere la sorte mia," from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," a wonderfully fresh and beautiful composition, which was sung by Mrs. Henschel with fine breadth of expression and largeness of style. The modern scoring to which it had been subjected deprived it of some of its original effect, but it was tastefully if not reverently done. The other solo was a "Hymne au Créateur," by Mr. Henschel, a pleasing, thoughtful and musicianly little work, daintily harmonized and richly but discreetly instrumented. Mrs. Henschel sang it with much grace of sentiment and warm tenderness of expression. Both the composition and its rendering pleased greatly, and singer and composer were enthusiastically recalled, to bow their acknowledgments. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony No. 2, in D, Beethoven; Prelude in B-flat minor, Bach; Scherzo, in B-flat minor, Chopin; and Introduction, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. B. J. Lang. The usual public rehearsal will take place on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Henschel's Hymne au Créateur has just been published in Berlin by Adolph Fürstner with an English translation by Mr. Louis C. Elson. It is issued with both orchestral and piano accompaniment.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—On Saturday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave third concert in Music Hall, which was well filled with a brilliant and attractive audience. Mr. Georg Henschel was the conductor, and Mrs. Lillian Bai Henschel the soloist for the evening. The program included Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Mozart "Symphony in G minor," two Slavonian Dances, Dvorak, and Nicolai's "Overture to the Merry Wives of Windsor." The orchestral work was magnificently performed, Mr. Henschel's musicians playing even more superbly than at either of the two preceding concerts. The charming numbers of Dvorak were especially praiseworthy, the orchestra catching the conductor's spirit with exceptional accuracy. Mrs. Henschel sang an aria from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," and Mr. Henschel's "Hymne au Créateur." The latter selection was a novelty, and proved to a grave, noble and inspiring composition, breathing the spirit of true devotion, and the artist sang it with wonderful purity and a dignified simplicity which lent an additional charm to the rendition. The fourth concert will take place in Music Hall on Saturday evening of this week, and will present Beethoven Second Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," and Wagner's Introduction to "Meistersänger von Nuremberg," for the orchestra, while Mr. B. J. Lang will play "Concerto in G," for the pianoforte, Rubinstein, a Bach Prelude, and a Scherzo Chopin.

Third MUSICAL MATTERS.

Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth of the Boston symphony orchestra's concerts, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mrs. Georg Henschel being the soloist, and the programme as follows:

Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Aria, "Giulio Cesare".....Handel
Symphony in G minor, Koechel, No. 48.....Mozart
Two Slavonian dances, op. 46, Nos. 4 and 1.....Dvorak
Hymne au Créateur.....Henschel
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai

The cordial greeting given the soloist of the evening upon her entrance bespoke the friendly character of the audience, but the enthusiastic applause following her two selections told a more flattering tale, as it indicated a hearty appreciation of the artist and her work. The rendering of the Handel aria was marked by that charming directness and simplicity which have always characterized Mrs. Henschel's efforts upon the concert stage, and the artistic delivery of the graceful composition was thoroughly enjoyable. Mr. Henschel's "Hymne au Créateur" was heard for the first time, and proved to be a composition of rare beauty; the themes being treated in the Wagnerian style, though not in any imitative way, and the intelligent and finished interpretation given the vocal score by Mrs. Henschel made it one of the brightest gems of the evening. The opportunities given at the rehearsals and two concerts of becoming familiar with the Brahms overture only strengthen the appreciation of its beauties, but last evening's presentation was not as satisfactory as that of a week ago, many little errors occurring, apparently from an overestimated acquaintance with the work on the part of some of the musicians. The most stirring effects of the orchestral numbers were found in the Dvorak dances, the weird, fantastic melodies being presented with a vigor and brilliancy that could hardly be bettered. The symphony was given a strong, fresh reading, in which its many beauties were admirably presented, the opening allegro movement being notably well played. The "Merry Wives" overture made a fitting close to this pleasing programme, and its performance was so admirable that the rare pleasure was enjoyed of hearing the final number of a programme unaccompanied by singing doors and the general confusion of a departing audience. The attendance was larger than at any previous concert, every available seat in the hall being occupied.

CLARK. Mr. Wm. W. Schubert Quartette.

LONDON has just heard the first time and of course

PHILADELPHIA wants "Patience" Company to

ABBOTT. Emma Abbott will soon appear at the G.

PHILLIPPS. Miss Adeline suffering from malaria, but

HOWE. We are glad to success of Miss Emma S.

JUCH. Miss Emma Juch is a "sweet singer of

WILEY. Miss Dora V. Harrison "Photos" Combelvi.

THAYER. Mr. Charles engaged to superintend Bay State Opera Company

LISZT's seventieth birthday in London and through concert performances of im-

MARCHINGTON. Miss sang at Leominster on the ple Quartette also appeared

THOMS. Miss Clara C. Mr. Wm. M. Thoms, editor

Art Journal, have been

COLEMAN. Mr. Henry has accepted the position

gusta, Ga., formerly held Southard.

CARY. Miss Annie L. possess one of the finest its value has been estimated thousand dollars.

VAN ZANDT. The ruling marriage of Miss Maud contradicted. The report of the engagement of her

MELVILLE. The English Company will give "Boccaccio," "Madame keteers," etc., during the Gaiety Theatre.

The New Music Hall Exit.

The transfer of certain estates in Hamilton place during the past year has finally made it possible to obtain the long desired exit from Music Hall into this way, which opens directly upon Tremont street. The new exit will have an aggregate width of 25 feet, divided into three doorways, two of which will be 10 feet wide and one 5 feet wide. By the plans made, a corridor or hall of about 25x30 feet will be given just within the new exit, so that, as it is on the street level, the crowds from the hall floor and balconies can flow into Hamilton place with all desirable freedom. The changes necessitated by the new exit are the carrying of the stairway from the Winter street entrance to the wide corridor straight up, instead of having the right angle turn, as formerly; the abolition of the ladies' waiting room, opposite the stage end of the hall, in the wide corridor, and the closing of a single door into the hall from the wide corridor. The straightening of the stairway will be a decided improvement. The waiting room has been replaced by another at the opposite end of the corridor, and the closing of the doorway will be only during the incoming of an audience. Extra swing doors will be put in to prevent draughts, and a ticket office will be handily located at the right of the new exit. The old Tremont street entrance will be discontinued when the new exit is done. 1891 Oct.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The fourth of the series of magnificent orchestral concerts now being given at Music Hall under Mr. Henschel's direction will take place to-morrow evening, and a public rehearsal of the same programme is announced for this afternoon. Signor Leandro Campanari, the violinist, will assist at the concert to-morrow evening. The opportunity offered by this series of concerts to hear the best orchestral music interpreted by a grand orchestra, and at low prices, is something that should be fully availed of by students and lovers of music. Such an opportunity has rarely been presented on this side of the Atlantic, and never before in Boston. It is a source of gratification that the concerts are largely attended, and that their generous founder will therefore see that his munificent efforts in behalf of musical art meet with public appreciation.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony Concert took place at Music Hall last night before a similarly large and brilliant audience as attended each of the preceding entertainments of the series. The programme opened with a second performance of Brahms's "Tragic" Overture, which is not one of those works which present new beauties upon a second hearing. All that it contained was heard upon its first presentation a week ago, and a further acquaintance with it does no more than afford a deeper insight into its composer's technical skill and the dryness of his melodic invention. The symphony was Mozart's ever fresh and ever beautiful one in G-minor. Mr. Henschel did better with the tempi of this work than with either of the other symphonies he has conducted here. The opening allegro received the best treatment of the four, though it was lacking here and there in true Mozartian delicacy of expression and there was a dragging heaviness in the playing of the strings in the lighter passages of the movement, but the general effect was praiseworthy. Not so that of the andante, which was given in a very coarse and unsympathetic manner, and with much unnecessary rasping in the double basses. The difficulty experienced in hearing some of the delicate passages for the wind instruments, owing to their unfavorable position, left several awkward gaps in the score. The roughness with which the more decided portions of the movement were interpreted was antagonistic also to the intimate character of the movement. The first part of the minuet was played in a large and impressive manner, but the delicate trio was rendered very cloudy by the uncertainty of the wind instruments. The finale was interpreted with much coarseness by the strings, which showed a disposition to hurry the time and at last almost carried the conductor along with them. The double basses again came into unpleasant prominence through the roughness of their work. As we gain experience of the orchestra we are more and more impressed that there are too many of these instruments to form a due balance with the rest of the strings, and the disproportion is very strongly felt in such delicate works as this symphony. Two Slavonian Dances, Nos. 4 and 1 of op. 46, by Dvorak, spirited and very interesting compositions and richly scored, were very finely performed. The other instrumental number was Nicolai's charming overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," which also had an exceedingly broad, expressive and spirited rendering. Mrs. Henschel was the soloist. Her first contribution to the programme was the Recitative and Aria, "E pur così,"—"Piangere la sorte mia," from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," a wonderfully fresh and beautiful composition, which was sung by Mrs. Henschel with fine breadth of expression and largeness of style. The modern scoring to which it had been subjected deprived it of some of its original effect, but it was tastefully if not reverently done. The other solo was a "Hymne au Créateur," by Mr. Henschel, a pleasing, thoughtful and musicianly little work, daintily harmonized and richly but discreetly instrumented. Mrs. Henschel sang it with much grace of sentiment and warm tenderness of expression. Both the composition and its rendering pleased greatly, and singer and composer were enthusiastically recalled, to bow their acknowledgments. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony No. 2, in D, Beethoven; Prelude in B-flat minor, Bach; Scherzo, in B-flat minor, Chopin; and Introduction, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. B. J. Lang. The usual public rehearsal will take place on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Henschel's Hymne au Créateur has just been published in Berlin by Adolph Fürstner with an English translation by Mr. Louis C. Elson. It is issued with both orchestral and piano accompaniment.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—On Saturday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave third concert in Music Hall, which was well filled with a brilliant and attractive audience. Mr. Georg Henschel was the conductor, and Mrs. Lillian Bai Henschel the soloist for the evening. The programme included Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Mozart's "Symphony in G minor," two Slavonian Dances by Dvorak, and Nicolai's "Overture to the Merry Wives of Windsor." The orchestral work was magnificently performed, Mr. Henschel's musicians playing even more superbly than at either of the two preceding concerts. The charming numbers of Dvorak were especially praiseworthy, the orchestra catching the conductor's spirit with exceptional accuracy. Mrs. Henschel sang an aria from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," and Mr. Henschel's "Hymne au Créateur." The latter selection was a novelty, and proved to a grave, noble and inspiring composition, breathing the spirit of true devotion, and the artist sang it with wonderful purity and a dignified simplicity which lent an additional charm to the rendition. The fourth concert will take place in Music Hall on Saturday evening of this week, and will present Beethoven's Second Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," and Wagner's Introduction to "Meistersänger von Nuremberg," for the orchestra, while Mr. B. J. Lang will play "Concerto in G," for the pianoforte, Rubinstein, a Bach Prelude, and a Scherzo by Chopin.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth of the Boston symphony orchestra's concerts, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mrs. Georg Henschel being the soloist, and the programme as follows:

Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Aria, "Giulio Cesare".....Handel
Symphony in G minor, Koechel, No. 48.....Mozart
Two Slavonian dances, op. 46, Nos. 4 and 1.....Dvorak
Hymne au Créateur.....Henschel
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai

The cordial greeting given the soloist of the evening upon her entrance bespoke the friendly character of the audience, but the enthusiastic applause following her two selections told a more flattering tale, as it indicated a hearty appreciation of the artist and her work. The rendering of the Handel aria was marked by that charming directness and simplicity which have always characterized Mrs. Henschel's efforts upon the concert stage, and the artistic delivery of the graceful composition was thoroughly enjoyable. Mr. Henschel's "Hymne au Créateur" was heard for the first time, and proved to be a composition of rare beauty; the themes being treated in the Wagnerian style, though not in any imitative way, and the intelligent and finished interpretation given the vocal score by Mrs. Henschel made it one of the brightest gems of the evening. The opportunities given at the rehearsals and two concerts of becoming familiar with the Brahms overture only strengthen the appreciation of its beauties, but last evening's presentation was not as satisfactory as that of a week ago, many little errors occurring, apparently from an overestimated acquaintance with the work on the part of some of the musicians. The most stirring effects of the orchestral numbers were found in the Dvorak dances, the weird, fantastic melodies being presented with a vigor and brilliancy that could hardly be bettered. The symphony was given a strong, fresh reading, in which its many beauties were admirably presented, the opening allegro movement being notably well played. The "Merry Wives" overture made a fitting close to this pleasing programme, and its performance was so admirable that the rare pleasure was enjoyed of hearing the final number of a programme unaccompanied by banging doors and the general confusion of a departing audience. The attendance was larger than at any previous concert, every available seat in the hall being occupied.

CLARK. Mr. Wm. W. Schubert Quartette.

LONDON has just heard the first time and of course.

PHILADELPHIA wants "Patience" Company to

ABBOTT. Emma Abbott will soon appear at the G

PHILLIPPS. Miss Adel suffering from malaria, b

HOWE. We are glad to success of Miss Emma S. I

JUCH. Miss Emma Juch is a "sweet singer of

WILEY. Miss Dora V Harrison "Photos" Com Selvi.

THAYER. Mr. Charles engaged to superintend

Bay State Opera Compan

Liszt's seventieth birth in London and througho

MARCHINGTON. Miss sang at Leominster on ple Quartette also appear

THOMS. Miss Clara C Mr. Wm. M. Thoms, ed

Art Journal, have been

COLEMAN. Mr. Henry has accepted the positio

gusta, Ga., formerly held Southard.

CARY. Miss Annie L possess one of the finest its value has been estimated thousand dollars.

VAN ZANDT. The ru ing marriage of Miss Ma contradicted. The rep of the engagement of he

MELVILLE. The E Company will give

"Boccaccio," "Madame keteers," etc., during the the Gaiety Theatre.

The New Music Hall Exit.

The transfer of certain estates in Hamilton place during the past year has finally made it possible to obtain the long desired exit from Music Hall into this way, which opens directly upon Tremont street. The new exit will have an aggregate width of 25 feet, divided into three doorways, two of which will be 10 feet wide and one 5 feet wide. By the plans made, a corridor or hall of about 25x30 feet will be given just within the new exit, so that, as it is on the street level, the crowds from the hall floor and balconies can flow into Hamilton place with all desirable freedom. The changes necessitated by the new exit are the carrying of the stairway from the Winter street entrance to the wide corridor straight up, instead of having the right angle turn, as formerly; the abolition of the ladies' waiting room, opposite the stage end of the hall, in the wide corridor, and the closing of a single door into the hall from the wide corridor. The straightening of the stairway will be a decided improvement. The waiting room has been replaced by another at the opposite end of the corridor, and the closing of the doorway will be only during the incoming of an audience. Extra swing doors will be put in to prevent draughts, and a ticket office will be handily located at the right of the new exit. The old Tremont street entrance will be discontinued when the new exit is done. 1881 Oct.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The fourth of the series of magnificent orchestral concerts now being given at Music Hall under Mr. Henschel's direction will take place to-morrow evening, and a public rehearsal of the same programme is announced for this afternoon. Signor Leandro Campanari, the violinist, will assist at the concert to-morrow evening. The opportunity offered by this series of concerts to hear the best orchestral music interpreted by a grand orchestra, and at low prices, is something that should be fully availed of by students and lovers of music. Such an opportunity has rarely been presented on this side of the Atlantic, and never before in Boston. It is a source of gratification that the concerts are largely attended, and that their generous founder will therefore see that his munificent efforts in behalf of musical art meet with public appreciation.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The third Boston Symphony Concert took place at Music Hall last night before a similarly large and brilliant audience as attended each of the preceding entertainments of the series. The programme opened with a second performance of Brahms's "Tragic" Overture, which is not one of those works which present new beauties upon a second hearing. All that it contained was heard upon its first presentation a week ago, and a further acquaintance with it does no more than afford a deeper insight into its composer's technical skill and the dryness of his melodic invention. The symphony was Mozart's ever fresh and ever beautiful one in G-minor. Mr. Henschel did better with the tempi of this work than with either of the other symphonies he has conducted here. The opening allegro received the best treatment of the four, though it was lacking here and there in true Mozartian delicacy of expression and there was a dragging heaviness in the playing of the strings in the lighter passages of the movement, but the general effect was praiseworthy. Not so that of the andante, which was given in a very coarse and unsympathetic manner, and with much unnecessary rasping in the double basses. The difficulty experienced in hearing some of the delicate passages for the wind instruments, owing to their unfavorable position, left several awkward gaps in the score. The roughness with which the more decided portions of the movement were interpreted was antagonistic also to the innate character of the movement. The first part of the minuet was played in a large and impressive manner, but the delicate trio was rendered very cloudy by the uncertainty of the wind instruments. The finale was interpreted with much coarseness by the strings, which showed a disposition to hurry the time and at last almost carried the conductor along with them. The double basses again came into unpleasant prominence through the roughness of their work. As we gain experience of the orchestra we are more and more impressed that there are too many of these instruments to form a due balance with the rest of the strings, and the disproportion is very strongly felt in such delicate works as this symphony. Two Slavonian Dances, Nos. 4 and 1 of op. 46, by Dvorak, spirited and very interesting compositions and richly scored, were very finely performed. The other instrumental number was Nicolai's charming overture to "The Merry Wives of Windsor," which also had an exceedingly broad, expressive and spirited rendering. Mrs. Henschel was the soloist. Her first contribution to the programme was the Recitative and Aria, "E pur così,"—"Piangere la sorte mia," from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," a wonderfully fresh and beautiful composition, which was sung by Mrs. Henschel with fine breadth of expression and largeness of style. The modern scoring to which it had been subjected deprived it of some of its original effect, but it was tastefully if not reverently done. The other solo was a "Hymne au Créateur," by Mr. Henschel, a pleasing, thoughtful and musicianly little work, daintily harmonized and richly but discreetly instrumented. Mrs. Henschel sang it with much grace of sentiment and warm tenderness of expression. Both the composition and its rendering pleased greatly, and singer and composer were enthusiastically recalled, to bow their acknowledgments. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn; Concerto for pianoforte in G, op. 45, Rubinstein; Symphony No. 2, in D, Beethoven; Prelude in B-flat minor, Bach; Scherzo, in B-flat minor, Chopin; and Introduction, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. B. J. Lang. The usual public rehearsal will take place on Friday afternoon.

Mr. Henschel's Hymne au Createur has just been published in Berlin by Adolph Fürstner with an English translation by Mr. Louis C. Elson. It is issued with both orchestral and piano accompaniment.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—On Saturday evening the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a third concert in Music Hall, which was well filled with a brilliant and attractive audience. Mr. Georg Henschel was the conductor, and Mrs. Lillian Bai Henschel the soloist for the evening. The programme included Brahms's "Tragic Overture," Mozart's "Symphony in G minor," two Slavonian Dances by Dvorak, and Nicolai's "Overture to the Merry Wives of Windsor." The orchestral work was magnificently performed, Mr. Henschel's musicians playing even more superbly than at either of the two preceding concerts. The charming numbers of Dvorak were especially praiseworthy, the orchestra catching the conductor's spirit with exceptional accuracy. Mrs. Henschel sang an aria from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," and Mr. Henschel's "Hymne au Créateur." The latter selection was a novelty, and proved to be a grave, noble and inspiring composition, breathing the spirit of true devotion, and the artist sang it with wonderful purity and a dignified simplicity which lent an additional charm to the rendition. The fourth concert will take place in Music Hall on Saturday evening of this week, and will present Beethoven's Second Symphony, Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas," Wagner's Introduction to "Meistersänger von Nuremberg," for the orchestra, while Mr. B. J. Lang will play "Concerto in G," for the pianoforte, Rubinstein, a Bach Prelude, and a Scherzo by Chopin.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Fourth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth of the Boston symphony orchestra's concerts, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mrs. Georg Henschel being the soloist, and the programme as follows:

Tragic overture, op. 81.....Brahms
Aria, "Giulio Cesare".....Handel
Symphony in G minor, Koechel, No. 48.....Mozart
Two Slavonian dances, op. 46, Nos. 4 and 1.....Dvorak
Hymne au Créateur.....Henschel
Overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor".....Nicolai

The cordial greeting given the soloist of the evening upon her entrance bespoke the friendly character of the audience, but the enthusiastic applause following her two selections told a more flattering tale, as it indicated a hearty appreciation of the artist and her work. The rendering of the Handel air was marked by that charming directness and simplicity which have always characterized Mrs. Henschel's efforts upon the concert stage, and the artistic delivery of the graceful composition was thoroughly enjoyable. Mr. Henschel's "Hymne au Créateur" was heard for the first time, and proved to be a composition of rare beauty; the themes being treated in the Wagnerian style, though not in any imitative way, and the intelligent and finished interpretation given the vocal score by Mrs. Henschel made it one of the brightest gems of the evening. The opportunities given at the rehearsals and two concerts of becoming familiar with the Brahms overture only strengthen the appreciation of its beauties, but last evening's presentation was not as satisfactory as that of a week ago, many little errors occurring, apparently from an overestimated acquaintance with the work on the part of some of the musicians. The most striking effects of the orchestral numbers were found in the Dvorak dances, the weird, fantastic melodies being presented with a vigor and brilliancy that could hardly be bettered. The symphony was given a strong, fresh reading, in which its many beauties were admirably presented, the opening allegro movement being notably well played. The "Merry Wives" overture made a fitting close to this pleasing programme, and its performance was so admirable that the rare pleasure was enjoyed of hearing the final number of a programme unaccompanied by changing doors and the general confusion of a departing audience. The attendance was larger than at any previous concert, every available seat in the hall being occupied.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. The third of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concerts was given last Saturday evening to the usual large audience. The program opened with a second performance of Brahms's "Tragic Overture." The masterly orchestration of this work was even more apparent than upon its first performance. It is a really "tragic" composition and deserves to take rank with the standard classical works. The orchestra seemed to catch the real spirit of the composition, and its interpretation was an improvement over its first presentation even. The soprano air, "Piangere la mia Sorte," from Handel's "Giulio Cesare," came next, and it was a most appropriate selection to follow, being in a similar vein. Mrs. Henschel sang it with due regard to its real meaning, bringing to bear upon it her artistic feeling, but it is a selection for which she hardly seems to possess the requisite quality of voice and breadth of style. It is impossible for this young artist to sing anything poorly, or with lack of the most exquisite finish, but it is not to be expected that all vocal numbers should be equally adapted to her voice and method. Mozart's G-minor Symphony followed, and it was beautifully interpreted. For those who look beneath the surface of almost cloying sweetness of this work there is in it a strength and dignity which interests and delights long after the effects produced by apparently superficial lightness and simplicity have passed away. Another hearing of Dvorak's two Slavonic Dances—now well-known to our concert-goers,—added to the appreciation of their beauty and grace. Then came Mr. Henschel's "Hymne au Createur"—a beautiful composition, in manuscript—which was sung charmingly by Mrs. Henschel. It is to be hoped that this work will be heard often in our concert rooms. The instrumentation is remarkably original and effective. Nicolai's "Merry Wives" Overture brought the highly entertaining concert to an end.

The New Music Hall Exit.

The transfer of certain estates in Hamilton place during the past year has finally made it possible to obtain the long desired exit from Music Hall into this way, which opens directly upon Tremont street. The new exit will have an aggregate width of 25 feet, divided into three doorways, two of which will be 10 feet wide and one 5 feet wide. By the plans made, a corridor or hall of about 25x30 feet will be given just within the new exit, so that, as it is on the street level, the crowds from the hall floor and balconies can flow into Hamilton place with all desirable freedom. The changes necessitated by the new exit are the carrying of the stairway from the street entrance to the wide corridor at up, instead of having the right turn, as formerly; the abolition of the waiting room, opposite the stage end hall, in the wide corridor, and the closing of a single door into the hall from the corridor. The straightening of the stairway will be a decided improvement. The waiting room has been replaced by another at the end of the corridor, and the closing doorway will be only during the inclement audience. Extra swing doors will be put in to prevent draughts, and a ticket will be handily located at the right of the new exit. The old Tremont street entrance will be discontinued when the new is done. 1891 Oct.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS. The fourth of a series of magnificent orchestral concerts being given at Music Hall under Mr. Henschel's direction will take place to-morrow evening, and a public rehearsal of the same programme is announced for this afternoon. Leandro Campanari, the violinist, will be at the concert to-morrow evening. The unity offered by this series of concerts to the best orchestral music interpreted by a single orchestra, and at low prices, is something that could be fully availed of by students and of music. Such an opportunity has rarely presented on this side of the Atlantic, and before in Boston. It is a source of gratification that the concerts are largely attended, and that their generous founder will therefore meet with public appreciation.

changed on a/c of condition of Mr Lang's hand

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Ruy Blas.) Op. 95. . . . MENDELSSOHN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in G. (No. 3.) Op. 45.
ANTON RUBINSTEIN.

Moderato con moto.—Andante; Adagio.—Allegro.—

SYMPHONY in D. No. 2, Op. 36. . . . BEETHOVEN.

Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—Larghetto.—
Scherzo. (Allegro.)—Allegro molto.—

PIANO SOLO.

a. PRELUDE in B flat minor. . . . J. S. BACH.
(No. 22 of the clavécin bien tempéré.)

b. SCHERZO in B flat minor, op. 31. . . . CHOPIN.

INTRODUCTION. (The Master Singers of Nuremberg.) WAGNER.

SOLOIST:

MR. B. J. LANG.

MR. LANG will use a Chickering Piano.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 12TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Camacho's Wedding.) Op. 10. . . . MENDELSSOHN.

CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN in A. (No. 8.) Op. 47.
(In modo di Scena cantante.) . . . SPOHR.
Allegro molto; Recit.; Adagio; Andante;
Allegro moderato.—

SYMPHONY in D. No. 2, Op. 36. . . . BEETHOVEN.
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—Larghetto.—
Scherzo. (Allegro.)—Allegro molto.—

ROMANCE FOR VIOLIN in C. Op. 48. . . . SAINT-SAËNS.

INTRODUCTION. (The Master Singers of Nuremberg.) WAGNER.

SOLOIST:

SIGNOR LEANDRO CAMPANARI.

Mr. B. J. LANG's indisposition has rendered this change of Programme necessary.

THE FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

To use a political phrase—Mr. Henschel's platform is completed. The orchestra is rearranged. The handsome and attractive hornplayers, and the beautiful pouter of tympani can now wear their dress-coats, serene in the conviction that they will no longer be seen only by a favored few in the upper gallery. In short, all the performers are now arranged in a compact semicircle with a steep incline, facing the audience. The result is, on the whole, a satisfactory one, musically speaking, save that the woodwind does not yet come out with all the clearness desirable. We may not be the best judges in the matter, since our seats are rather near the deep strings, and the otherwise estimable gentlemen who are attached to the double basses have caused the flutes and oboes to be lost beyond all hope of advertising for. The musical season is not yet fairly under way, and yet the record of the past week is a tolerably large one. Maas, Henschel and Listemann have kept a fairly equal balance between the old and the new schools. And now will follow all sorts of comparisons between the conductors. It is perhaps too early to give a fixed opinion, yet the indications may be briefly stated thus: Maas, the most intelligent of score readers, calm, reserved and dignified; a giant in all that relates to the technique of his art, yet speaking far more from his head than from his heart: unable to awaken great enthusiasm in audience or orchestra, and apt to ice his music a little. Henschel: an enthusiastic, earnest worker for a high ideal; able, too, to impress his men with enthusiasm and love for their work; not yet a great conductor, but constantly progressing toward that goal. One whose faults can be excused as one excuses the false notes of Rubinstein, because of the ardor that is behind them; but a little too much given to stand-rapping and picturesque attitudes. Messrs. Listemann, Zerrahn and Lang are too well known to require description as conductors. The programme last night was a heavy one, but very few left the hall before its close. The overture to Camacho (Mendelssohn) was not the most interesting of works, but was clearly rendered. The second number was Spohr's violin concerto in A, performed by Signor Campanari. We are not enthusiastic over Spohr's works; they display certain technicalities well, but are full of stereotyped formulas which soon cloy. The performer was quite successful in his interpretation. He has a sympathetic, sweet tone, adheres faithfully to proper tempi, and is sure even in difficult phrases and double stopping. His faults were a lack of force, and a slip in the cadenza. His performance of Saint-Saens Romance in C, was unaffected musically work. Such a man would be excellent in an orchestra, as well as in solo work. The scheme of giving the Beethoven symphonies in regular order, is a good educational one. In the first symphony we saw the master burdened somewhat with time-honored fetters. In this, the second, we find him bursting one of them which hampered his teacher, Haydn. The minuet had long been a vexation to Haydn, who endeavored to find new forms of expression within its limits. It was Beethoven who in this work first threw the old institution overboard, and made the modern symphony a possibility. Mr. Henschel's readings, save, perhaps, portions of the last movement, was a masterly one. The sporzando note of the allegro, followed by string scales, piano, were most carefully shaded. In the beginning of the allegro, however, the higher strings were rough and irregular. Later, in the same movement, they did much better, especially in the numerous trills. The cellos and double basses also did musical work in the development of this part. The Laighetto could have had more light and shade. The horns in this did very finely, save at the very end, where a break was perceptible. The crescendo effects in the scherzo were admirable. The last movement was taken at a furious pace, but was tolerably clear for all that. It is a thankless task to pick flaws in a work where so much was well done. The artistic whole should be remembered and praised. In so large an orchestra there is necessarily some poor material, and there has been but a month to put this in shape. The glorious Vorspiel to the Meistersinger was nobly performed. It is one of the very best examples of the modern school; the themes of Waltheis song, and of the hurly-burly of the public square were inspiring enough. These latter are what Shakespeare would call "alarums excursions,"—it is a pity that they are not yet popular excursions. The second violins made a slip in this work, but the brasses were crisp and steady. The next programme offers solos by Mr. Toedt, the overtures to Mehul's Joseph, and Cherubini's Faniska, and the great Eroica symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert in Music Hall on Saturday evening, the soloist being Mr. Leandro Campanari. The programme for the orchestra was Mendelssohn's "Camacho's Wedding Overture," Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D, and the overture to Wagner's "Meister-singer," and the playing was noticeable for the clearness, precision and vigor which Mr. Henschel has so infused into the interpretations of his band. Much of the performance suffered for delicacy and sweetness, but the characteristics which we have before mentioned were displayed to extraordinary advantage in the Wagner number, which received the very best rendition which we remember to have heard. Mr. Leandro Campanari, the violinist, played Spohr's Concerto in A and Saint-Saens's "Romance in C," with such genuine artistic elegance and purity of tone as to surprise even those ardent admirers of his finished style who have known him as one of the greatest of our violin virtuosi. The next concert will be given on Saturday evening of this week, and is to include Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," Cherubini's "Faniska," and songs by Mr. Toedt, a tenor.

Mr. Henschel is very es-Henschel to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

That the City Will Support an Orchestra—An Enjoyable Evening.

Number four in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred in Music Hall last evening, in spite of the rain, before the crowded houses. If anybody has ever doubted Boston's readiness to support a permanent orchestra or its fondness for this class of music, he will now have ample opportunity to see the folly of his scepticism. During the present season there have been and are to be given at least sixty-eight orchestral performances of classical music, the Symphony Orchestra contributing thirty, the Philharmonic Society sixteen, the Harvard eight, and the Conservatory Orchestra four. But on each succeeding occasion it seems as if the spacious auditorium of the Music Hall was if possible more and more crowded, the public rehearsals drawing almost as well as the regular concerts. Large as this number of concerts seems, each succeeding performance serves only to strengthen the conviction that the musician who compose these different organizations need all the opportunities which the season will give them of united practice. However excellent most of them are individually, there is a certain harshness and uncertainty in their concerted action which might escape other than critical ears, but which, nevertheless, must be overcome before the Boston orchestra can take its place in the first rank among the similar organizations of other cities and countries. We fail to see, however, why such a result should not be eventually attained. Mr. Henschel is certainly doing good work for them. Last night the new platform arrangement, which he has designed, went into use for the first time. The effect of placing the double basses, trumpets, trombones, etc., upon a raised platform, so as to throw the sound of these instruments out into the audience, over the heads of the performers on the lighter instruments, is unique in this city at any rate, and its advantages will have to be a test of experience. The programme, which on account of the illness of Mr. B. J. Lang was somewhat changed from that originally announced, will be found below. Signor Leandro Campanari contributed the violin solos.

Overture, "Camacho's Wedding," op. 10, Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin in A, No. 8, op. 47, Spohr
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, Beethoven
Romance for violin in C, op. 48, Saint-Saens
Introduction, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner

The orchestra was in excellent condition, and the opening number was played with a vivacity and delicateness which called forth the deserved plaudits of the audience. The Spohr concerto, though wearisome to many if not most of the listeners, was very finely interpreted by the young violinist who, during the evening, gave ample proof of his talent and great promise. As for the symphony in D, it was a thoroughly enjoyable performance, although Mr. Henschel, who never does anything by halves, accelerates the allegro movements a little too much for our liking. It was this more moderate tempo which, if we are to credit his friends, Beethoven himself employed, and which was beautifully illustrated in the feeling interpretation of the famous seventh symphony under the direction of Dr. Maas Thursday evening. It can hardly be credited that Beethoven, who made so much sport of what he derisively called "finger dancing," was inspired with that enthusiasm for speed which Mr. Henschel seems to think is necessary to a proper interpretation of his allegro movements. As the Beethoven symphonies have thus far been played in order, and as the "Eroica" is down for the next programme, it is to be hoped that Mr. Henschel intends giving all of these unapproachable compositions in their order. The Wagner number of last evening received a strong and characteristic interpretation. The programme for next Saturday is as follows:

Overture, recitative and air (Joseph and His Brethren), Mehul
Symphony in E flat, (Eroica), No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven

Songs with Piano:
a. The Dream, Rubinstein.
b. Gipsy Serenade, Henschel.
(Violin Obligato, Mr. Listemann.)
Overture, (Faniska), Cherubini
Soloist, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

Gazette MUSICAL.

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

There was a very fine audience at Music Hall last evening, in spite of the unfavorable state of the weather, the occasion being the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was an exceedingly good one. Some changes were made in the orchestra in connection with the staging, but we could not distinguish any advantage over the former arrangement. Of the playing of the orchestra we have only to repeat what we have said of their work in the previous concerts of the series, save, perhaps, that they have improved something in respect to precision. Last evening, they followed the gyrations of their conductor with the sureness and the regularity of a well-oiled machine. We cannot understand why Mr. Henschel should consider it necessary to use his baton as if it was a flail. There was more of this exaggeration in his beating last night than ever before, and it at length became almost ridiculous in its drum-majoresque vigor. If anything were gained by it there would be no cause to complain, but the only result we could discover was that the violence of the conductor was imparted to the players, especially the violins, who rasped and sawed unmercifully in sympathy with the baton flourished so excitedly and with such absurdly wide sweeps before them. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's "Camacho's Wedding" overture, which was spiritedly interpreted. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 2, in D. The tempi were well taken, except in the Scherzo, which instead of being played allegro, was given at about as lively a presto as we have heard of late. The opening movement, with its delicate responses, was rendered with an almost barbarous coarseness; and portions of the lovely largetto were as badly treated by the strings. The reading throughout was not noticeable for refinement; but its vigor, in place and out of place, was remarkably strong. In respect to attack, unity and precision, but little, if any, fault could be found with the orchestra through the entire evening. What it lacked, unmistakably, however, was delicacy in the less forcible passages. There was an immense sweep and massiveness in the tutti portions throughout, but a painful raspiness elsewhere, principally in the first violins. The other orchestral work was Wagner's noisy and squalling "Meistersinger" overture with its pudding-stone fugue, which was interpreted with a force and an intensity that brought its confusion out in the most perfect manner. Owing to the accident to his hand, Mr. B. J. Lang was unable to appear as originally announced. His place as soloist was filled by the violinist Signor Leandro Campanari, who played Spohr's Concerto, No. 8, in A, and a Romance for violin, op. 48, by Saint-Saens. Signor Campanari has a very refined and delicate style, a sweet tone and admirable intonation. He plays with great taste and expressiveness. His method was hardly broad and large enough to do full justice to the Spohr Concerto, but he performed it with much brilliancy and in a manner wholly artistic. The Romance, a graceful and flowing work charmingly scored, was played by him with exceeding tenderness of sentiment and warmth of color. We may add that the applause of the audience was frequent and hearty through the entire performance. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, Recitative and Air, "Joseph," Mehul; Symphony, "Eroica," Beethoven; Songs by Rubinstein and Henschel; and Overture, "Faniska," Cherubini. The soloist is to be Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

THE FOURTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

To use a political phrase—Mr. Henschel's platform is completed. The orchestra is rearranged. The handsome and attractive hornplayers, and the beautiful pouter of tympani can now wear their dress-coats, serene in the conviction that they will no longer be seen only by a favored few in the upper gallery. In short, all the performers are now arranged in a compact semicircle with a steep incline, facing the audience. The result is, on the whole, a satisfactory one, musically speaking, save that the woodwind does not yet come out with all the clearness desirable. We may not be the best judges in the matter, since our seats are rather near the deep strings, and the otherwise estimable gentlemen who are attached to the double basses have caused the flutes and oboes to be lost beyond all hope of advertising for. The musical season is not yet fairly under way, and yet the record of the past week is a tolerably large one. Maas, Henschel and Listemann have kept a fairly equal balance between the old and the new schools. And now will follow all sorts of comparisons between the conductors. It is perhaps too early to give a fixed opinion, yet the indications may be briefly stated thus: Maas, the most intelligent of score readers, calm, reserved and dignified; a giant in all that relates to the technique of his art, yet speaking far more from his head than from his heart: unable to awaken great enthusiasm in audience or orchestra, and apt to ice his music a little. Henschel: an enthusiastic, earnest worker for a high ideal; able, too, to impress his men with enthusiasm and love for their work; not yet a great conductor, but constantly progressing toward that goal. One whose faults can be excused as one excuses the false notes of Rubinstein, because of the ardor that is behind them; but a little too much given to stand-rapping and picturesque attitudes. Messrs. Listemann, Zerrahn and Lang are too well known to require description as conductors. The programme last night was a heavy one, but very few left the hall before its close. The overture to Camacho (Mendelssohn) was not the most interesting of works, but was clearly rendered. The second number was Spohr's violin concerto in A, performed by Signor Campanari. We are not enthusiastic over Spohr's works; they display certain technicalities well, but are full of stereotyped formulas which soon cloy. The performer was quite successful in his interpretation. He has a sympathetic, sweet tone, adheres faithfully to proper tempi, and is sure even in difficult phrases and double stopping. His faults were a lack of force, and a slip in the cadenza. His performance of Saint-Saens Romance in C, was unaffected musically work. Such a man would be excellent in an orchestra, as well as in solo work. The scheme of giving the Beethoven symphonies in regular order, is a good educational one. In the first symphony we saw the master burdened somewhat with time-honored fetters. In this, the second, we find him bursting one of them which hampered his teacher, Haydn. The minuet had long been a vexation to Haydn, who endeavored to find new forms of expression within its limits. It was Beethoven who in this work first threw the old institution overboard, and made the modern symphony a possibility. Mr. Henschel's readings, save, perhaps, portions of the last movement, was a masterly one. The sporzando note of the allegro, followed by string scales, piano, were most carefully shaded. In the beginning of the allegro, however, the higher strings were rough and irregular. Later, in the same movement, they did much better, especially in the numerous trills. The cellos and double basses also did musical work in the development of this part. The Laighetto could have had more light and shade. The horns in this did very finely, save at the very end, where a break was perceptible. The crescendo effects in the scherzo were admirable. The last movement was taken at a furious pace, but was tolerably clear for all that. It is a thankless task to pick flaws in a work where so much was well done. The artistic whole should be remembered and praised. In so large an orchestra there is necessarily some poor material, and there has been but a month to put this in shape. The glorious Vorspiel to the Meistersinger was nobly performed. It is one of the very best examples of the modern school; the themes of Waltheis song, and of the hurly-burly of the public square were inspiring enough. These latter are what Shakespeare would call "alarums excursions,"—it is a pity that they are not yet popular excursions. The second violins made a slip in this work, but the brasses were crisp and steady. The next programme offers solos by Mr. Toedt, the overtures to Mehul's Joseph, and Cherubini's Faniska, and the great Eroica symphony.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its fourth concert in Music Hall on Saturday evening, the soloist being Mr. Leandro Campanari. The programme for the orchestra was Mendelssohn's "Camacho's Wedding Overture," Beethoven's Symphony No. 2 in D, and the overture to Wagner's "Meistersinger," and the playing was noticeable for the clearness, precision and vigor which Mr. Henschel has so infused into the interpretations of his band. Much of the performance suffered for delicacy and sweetness, but the characteristics which we have before mentioned were displayed to extraordinary advantage in the Wagner number, which received the very best rendition which we remember to have heard. Mr. Leandro Campanari, the violinist, played Spohr's Concerto in A and Saint-Saens's "Romance in C," with such genuine artistic elegance and purity of tone as to surprise even those ardent admirers of his finished style who have known him as one of the greatest of our violin virtuosi. The next concert will be given on Saturday evening of this week, and is to include Beethoven's "Eroica Symphony," Cherubini's "Faniska," and songs by Mr. Toedt, a tenor.

Mr. Henschel is very es-Henschel to the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

That the City Will Support an Orchestra—An Enjoyable Evening.

Number four in the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurred in Music Hall last evening, in spite of the rain, before the crowded houses. If anybody has ever doubted Boston's readiness to support a permanent orchestra or its fondness for this class of music, he will now have ample opportunity to see the folly of his scepticism. During the present season there have been and are to be given at least sixty-eight public orchestral performances of classical music, the Symphony Orchestra contributing thirty, the Philharmonic Society sixteen, the Harvard eight, and the Conservatory Orchestra four. But on each succeeding occasion it seems as if the spacious auditorium of the Music Hall was if possible more and more crowded, the public rehearsals drawing almost as well as the regular concerts. Large as this number of concerts seems, each succeeding performance serves only to strengthen the conviction that the musician who compose these different organizations need all the opportunities which the season will give them of united practice. However excellent most of them are individually, there is a certain harshness and uncertainty in their concerted action which might escape other than critical ears, but which, nevertheless, must be overcome before the Boston orchestra can take its place in the first rank among the similar organizations of other cities and countries. We fail to see, however, why such a result should not be eventually attained. Mr. Henschel is certainly doing good work for them. Last night the new platform arrangement, which he has designed, went into use for the first time. The effect of placing the double basses, trumpets, trombones, etc., upon a raised platform, so as to throw the sound of these instruments out into the audience, over the heads of the performers on the lighter instruments, is unique in this city at any rate, and its advantages will have to be a test of experience.

The programme, which on account of the illness of Mr. B. J. Lang was somewhat changed from that originally announced, will be found below. Signor Leandro Campanari contributed the violin solos.

Overture, "Camacho's Wedding," op. 10. Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin in A, No. 8, op. 47. Spohr
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36. Beethoven
Romance for violin in C, op. 48. Saint-Saens
Introduction, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner

The orchestra was in excellent condition, and the opening number was played with a vivacity and delicateness which called forth the deserved plaudits of the audience. The Spohr concerto, though wearisome to many if not most of the listeners, was very finely interpreted by the young violinist who, during the evening, gave ample proof of his talent and great promise. As for the symphony in D, it was a thoroughly enjoyable performance, although Mr. Henschel, who never does anything by halves, accelerates the allegro movements a little too much for our liking. It was this more moderate tempo which, if we are to credit his friends, Beethoven himself employed, and which was beautifully illustrated in the feeling interpretation of the famous seventh symphony under the direction of Dr. Maas Thursday evening. It can hardly be credited that Beethoven, who made so much sport of what he derisively called "finger dancing," was inspired with that enthusiasm for speed which Mr. Henschel seems to think is necessary to a proper interpretation of his allegro movements. As the Beethoven symphonies have thus far been played in order, and as the "Eroica" is down for the next programme, it is to be hoped that Mr. Henschel intends giving all of these unapproachable compositions in their order. The Wagner number of last evening received a strong and characteristic interpretation. The programme for next Saturday is as follows:

Overture, recitative and air (Joseph and His Brethren)..... Mehul
Symphony in E flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55. Beethoven

Songs with Piano:
a. The Dream..... Rubinstein.
b. Gipsy Serenade..... Henschel.
(Violin Obligato, Mr. Listemann.)
Overture. (Faniska.)..... Cherubini
Soloist, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

Gazette MUSICAL.

Fourth Boston Symphony Concert.

There was a very fine audience at Music Hall last evening, in spite of the unfavorable state of the weather, the occasion being the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme was an exceedingly good one. Some changes were made in the orchestra in connection with the staging, but we could not distinguish any advantage over the former arrangement. Of the playing of the orchestra we have only to repeat what we have said of their work in the previous concerts of the series, save, perhaps, that they have improved something in respect to precision. Last evening, they followed the gyrations of their conductor with the sureness and the regularity of a well-oiled machine. We cannot understand why Mr. Henschel should consider it necessary to use his baton as if it was a flail. There was more of this exaggeration in his beating last night than ever before, and it at length became almost ridiculous in its drum-majoresque vigor. If anything were gained by it there would be no cause to complain, but the only result we could discover was that the violence of the conductor was imparted to the players, especially the violins, who rasped and sawed unmercifully in sympathy with the baton flourished so excitedly and with such absurdly wide sweeps before them. The concert opened with Mendelssohn's "Camacho's Wedding" overture, which was spiritedly interpreted. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 2, in D. The tempi were well taken, except in the Scherzo, which instead of being played allegro, was given at about as lively a presto as we have heard of late. The opening movement, with its delicate responses, was rendered with an almost barbarous coarseness; and portions of the lovely largetto were as badly treated by the strings. The reading throughout was not noticeable for refinement; but its vigor, in place and out of place, was remarkably strong. In respect to attack, unity and precision, but little, if any, fault could be found with the orchestra through the entire evening. What it lacked, unmistakably, however, was delicacy in the less forcible passages. There was an immense sweep and massiveness in the tutti portions throughout, but a painful raspiness elsewhere, principally in the first violins. The other orchestral work was Wagner's noisy and squalling "Meistersinger" overture with its pudding-stone fugue, which was interpreted with a force and an intensity that brought its confusion out in the most perfect manner. Owing to the accident to his hand, Mr. B. J. Lang was unable to appear as originally announced. His place as soloist was filled by the violinist Signor Leandro Campanari, who played Spohr's Concerto, No. 8, in A, and a Romance for violin, op. 48, by Saint-Saens. Signor Campanari has a very refined and delicate style, a sweet tone and admirable intonation. He plays with great taste and expressiveness. His method was hardly broad and large enough to do full justice to the Spohr Concerto, but he performed it with much brilliancy and in a manner wholly artistic. The Romance, a graceful and flowing work charmingly scored, was played by him with exceeding tenderness of sentiment and warmth of color. We may add that the applause of the audience was frequent and hearty through the entire performance. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, Recitative and Air, "Joseph," Mehul; Symphony, "Eroica," Beethoven; Songs by Rubinstein and Henschel; and Overture, "Faniska," Cherubini. The soloist is to be Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT. The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday night called out an audience notably large when the depressing powers of the weather are considered. The programme was one whose interpretation paid for much discomfort, and all who were present must have congratulated themselves upon their decision to brave the assaults of the elements. The occasion was peculiarly important to those who have attended all the concerts hitherto, in that it showed the orchestra disposed according to Mr. Henschel's matured plan, and gave opportunity for deciding upon the success of his arrangement. It may be admitted to be a work of impossibility to arrange an orchestra in such wise that its work appears complete and its effects accurately balanced in all parts of a large hall. Those whose seats are near the deep strings on the sides of the stage must lose much of the effect of other parts of the orchestra, particularly the wind instruments of wood, but those whose stations were more remote will doubtless agree that the arrangement as a whole is as satisfactory as could be devised. Having his forces in control, Mr. Henschel exercised his discipline over them in a manner somewhat more imperative than on former occasions—although even then he cannot be said to have failed at all in decision. It may be ungracious to criticize the method of a conductor who so ably carries the musicians with him, but Mr. Henschel certainly seems to waste a great deal of energy. A suggestion of repose is necessary to dignify any effort, but the actions of the conductor on Saturday night were somewhat extravagant. Indeed, at times it seemed as if his movements would have been better in place at the head of the band of a marching regiment than before an orchestra. His energy may convince an audience that he is a conductor of rare power, but musicians must prefer to see a control which suggests more of the moral and less of the physical. Moreover, his repeated rappings upon the desk before a selection is performed, suggestive, as they are, of a pedagogue presiding over an unruly country school, are not only unnecessary, but are also uncomplimentary to the discipline of the orchestra. It was, perhaps, owing to the excessive energy of the conductor that the players seemed to have lost something of their delicacy, while showing improved force in their methods. It is manifestly not easy for musicians to insist upon expression when the movements of the directing baton are vigorously suggesting power; nevertheless, Saturday night's performance was interesting in showing Mr. Henschel's undeniable control of the orchestra.

The three selections performed by the orchestra were Mendelssohn's "Camacho's Wedding" overture, Beethoven's symphony No. 2, in D, and the overture to Wagner's "Meistersinger." The first opened with superb vigor and was excellently interpreted throughout. In the symphony some of the best work yet done by the orchestra was performed. The various movements were admirably caught, except that the scherzo was extremely rapid, and at times its notes were vaguely and raggedly taken. At the very beginning of the symphony, also, there was considerable roughness, which was, however, soon remedied. The largo movement was brought out with rare sweetness, and although the horns, which in the main did finely, broke at the end, there was little to call for criticism. As a whole, the symphony has had few superior interpretations in this city. Wagner's noisy and crashing overture, with its mixed motive and jumbled elements, was given with all the vigor the performers possessed, and therein, for the only time during the evening, their work and that of the conductor seemed in full accord.

There is little demand for delicacy in this composition, but nothing can be better adapted to show the power of an orchestra. Compared to it the stormy overture to "The Flying Dutchman" seems like the whisper of faith to the dull ear of doubt.

The soloist of the evening was Signor Leandro Campanari, who performed upon the violin Spohr's concerto in A and Saint-Saëns romance in C. He made a very favorable impression, showing an unusual skill in difficult passages, a remarkably expressive and flexible tone, and a strong sense of the emotional power of his instrument. His playing is very refined and sympathetic; if any criticism is allowable it must be in the matter of vigor and force, the lack of which is shown in his system by the spaciousness of the hall in which he played. He is, however, an artist of unusual gifts and accomplishments, and his playing here will always be listened to with interest. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture; Recitative and Air, "Joseph," Menul; Symphony, "Eroica," Beethoven; Songs by Rubenstein and Henschel; and Overture, "Faniska," Cherubini. The soloist is to be Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

Home Journal
MR. HENSCHEL AND THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—Though Henschel enthusiasts were undoubtedly the predominating element in the crowded audience at Music Hall on Saturday evening, yet we think too highly of Boston not to presume that there were those present whose regard for the music performed transcended by far any erroneous impressions that might have been created by Mr. Henschel's brilliant individuality, of which we hear so much. These Boston Symphony concerts are at the height of a popularity that Mr. Henschel monopolizes with a wonderful degree of success. Let us not be deceived by outward signs. An æsthetic degree of interest is being taken in Mr. Henschel. It is quite the fashion to laud and magnify his musicianship. No one should infer because of the crowds attending the Boston Symphony concerts, that classical music is about to become as popular as were once the tunes in Pinafore. With all but musical people, and they are comparatively few in number, classical music goes in at one ear and out at the other without being mentally digested, or to any adequate extent enjoyed. Symphony concerts are very apt to attract large audiences, when associated with novelties of an interesting order. In the present instance it is Mr. Henschel's conducting that is generally regarded as the novelty par excellence. Mr. Henschel is fast becoming the victim of an æsthetic craze. It must be the indefinable and very ethereal something called magnetism that has effected this craze. That Mr. Henschel is "magnetic, and so charmingly magnetic," is the familiar response to a suggestion that he fails to exhibit the artistic repose and well balanced judgment in his lead that are the indispensable habits of the competent conductor.

The spirited playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra was as noticeable on Saturday evening last as at the previous concerts, but the performances were often barren of the refinement so requisite for the production of the best artistic effects. The crescendos are made too spasmodically; the fortissimi are too many and of too frequent occurrence; and vacillating tempi are the rule rather than the exception. The only ability that Mr. Henschel has yet shown to conduct an andante of one of the masters, in the slow, quiet, refined and steady tempi that is required for such a movement, was in the performance on Saturday evening of Mozart's symphony in E minor. It is just barely possible that Mr. Henschel in displaying the improvement referred to, is inclined to profit by the well intended criticisms of his fellow musicians. His interpretation of this Mozart symphony was at least faithful in spirit, and we felt that the work was not being Henschelized to an inordinate degree. In performing two Slavonic Dances by Dvorak the expression was exaggerated and almost wholly barren of the graceful, swaying, Vienna-like swing that even such grotesque music as that of Dvorak would seem to suggest. Mr. Henschel's "Hymne au Createur," the first of his own music that he has introduced in these concerts, is a very creditable specimen of misplaced romanticism, and one that unites original and carefully prepared invention with singular beauty and depth of feeling. It requires a more dramatic soprano than Mrs. Henschel's to accord it justice, and her singing of it, though praiseworthy in spirit and intent, was impressively lacking in power. She was very successful with the Handel aria from Giulio Cesare, when the pleasing quality of her voice and artistic finesse were most favorably displayed. The concert ended with Nicolai's overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," a selection that no doubt seemed a novelty to the younger generation of concert-goers, though twenty or thirty years ago it was the favorite concert piece of the day. It will have been observed that we are far from hypercritical in our notices of these concerts, though as the successor in Boston of conductors of experience and ability, Mr. Henschel's course has been such as to elicit fulsome criticisms. He is a very fine musician indeed; but as chef d'orchestre his ability is by no means displayed at its best.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Transcript
Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some changes in the programme announced week before last were necessitated by the accident to Mr. B. J. Lang's right hand, and his consequent inability to appear last Saturday evening. These changes, however, were not so thorough-going as was at one time anticipated; besides the substitution of Signor Leandro Campanari for Mr. Lang as solo player, only one orchestral number on the programme originally announced for this, the fourth, concert was changed. Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," which was to open the concert, was struck out, and the programme finally appeared as follows: Overture to "Camacho's Wedding," op. 110; Mendelssohn; concerto for violin in A (No. 8), op. 47, Spohr; Symphony in D (No. 2), op. 36, Beethoven; romance for violin in C, op. 48, Saint-Saëns; introduction to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner. Mendelssohn's "Camacho" overture has, we believe, never been heard here before. It, as well as the opera to which it belongs (the soprano air from which, "Wer pocht so leise an der Thür?" was sung here some years ago by Mme. Rudersdorff), was written when the composer was still a boy; it thus belongs very nearly to the period of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. It is a bright, genial work, strongly reflecting the influence which Weber's genius is known to have exerted upon the young Mendelssohn. Indeed, it shows far less individuality of style than the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, which is wholly Mendelssohnian in manner, and only suggests Weber in one of its episodic phrases. The opening of the "Camacho" overture—the broad initial phrase of the trombones and trumpets, and the ensuing vigorous tutti, with its rapid violin figure—is thoroughly "Weberisch;" the manner in which the second theme is introduced is also after Weber's familiar pattern; and more "Weberisch" than all is the brilliant coda. The second theme itself, suggesting, as it does, something of Spanish local character, reminds one more of certain passages in Spohr's "Jessonda." Yet even in this early work Mendelssohn shows symptoms of that future power of his, which, more than any other, distinguished him from the favorite composer of his boyhood, in that the overture is already decidedly better written than almost anything we have from Weber's pen; the accomplished master of musical form shows himself here most unmistakably. The overture was very brilliantly played—the trombones overblowing a little at times—and was heartily enjoyed by the audience. Decidedly the best bit of "classical" playing yet done by Mr. Henschel's orchestra was in the Beethoven symphony. Except that the Scherzo was taken very fast, and that the tempo in the Larghetto asserted itself decisively only after the first dozen measures or so, Mr. Henschel's part of the work calls for nothing but high praise. Even the rapid tempo in the Scherzo cannot be unconditionally condemned, for the metronome mark in the score fully agrees with Mr. Henschel. But we have already said, on previous occasions, that these metronome marks in Beethoven's orchestral scores are by no means unquestionable; indeed, Mr. Henschel showed that he, too, is of this opinion, by taking the finale decidedly slower than marked in the score (half-note=152), for which piece of good judgment every musician must thank him. Even in the Larghetto the general run of his tempo seemed admirable; he was only too undecided at first in asserting the rhythm, and his beat seemed to waver for a while. Be it said, however, that this movement presents certain difficulties; a tempo which gives the opening phrase its true largo character (i. e., which does not suggest an "andante con moto"), may very easily make some of the ensuing passages assume the character of an absolute largo. It is only by the greatest and most intelligent care that the uniformly largo character of the movement can be preserved throughout. The orchestra played generally with great vigor, smoothness, and good attention to shading. Some of the rapid runs in the first violins were not quite so perfect as we could have wished them; not that the notes were not played together, but that certain delicate nuances of sudden crescendo and diminuendo were not made quite simultaneously by all the players. In the hazardous passage in the first movement (beginning with the sixty-eighth measure of the allegro

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT. The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday night called out an audience notably large when the depressing powers of the weather are considered. The programme was one whose interpretation paid for much discomfort, and all who were present must have congratulated themselves upon their decision to brave the assaults of the elements. The occasion was peculiarly important to those who have attended all the concerts hitherto, in that it showed the orchestra disposed according to Mr. Henschel's matured plan, and gave opportunity for deciding upon the success of his arrangement. It may be admitted to be a work of impossibility to arrange an orchestra in such wise that its work appears complete and its effects accurately balanced in all parts of a large hall. Those whose seats are near the deep strings on the sides of the stage must lose much of the effect of other parts of the orchestra, particularly the wind instruments of wood, but those whose stations were more remote will doubtless agree that the arrangement as a whole is as satisfactory as could be devised. Having his forces in control, Mr. Henschel exercised his discipline over them in a manner somewhat more imperative than on former occasions—although even then he cannot be said to have failed at all in decision. It may be ungracious to criticize the method of a conductor who so ably carries the musicians with him, but Mr. Henschel certainly seems to waste a great deal of energy. A suggestion of repose is necessary to dignify any effort, but the actions of the conductor on Saturday night were somewhat extravagant. Indeed, at times it seemed as if his movements would have been better in place at the head of the band of a marching regiment than before an orchestra. His energy may convince an audience that he is a conductor of rare power, but musicians must prefer to see a control which suggests more of the moral and less of the physical. Moreover, his repeated rappings upon the desk before a selection is performed, suggestive, as they are, of a pedagogue presiding over an unruly country school, are not only unnecessary, but are also uncomplimentary to the discipline of the orchestra. It was, perhaps, owing to the excessive energy of the conductor that the players seemed to have lost something of their delicacy, while showing improved force in their methods. It is manifestly not easy for musicians to insist upon expression when the movements of the directing baton are vigorously suggesting power; nevertheless, Saturday night's performance was interesting in showing Mr. Henschel's undeniable control of the orchestra.

The three selections performed by the orchestra were Mendelssohn's "Camacho's Wedding" overture, Beethoven's symphony No. 2, in D, and the overture to Wagner's "Meistersinger." The first opened with superb vigor and was excellently interpreted throughout. In the symphony some of the best work yet done by the orchestra was performed. The various movements were admirably caught, except that the scherzo was extremely rapid, and at times its notes were vaguely and raggedly taken. At the very beginning of the symphony, also, there was considerable roughness, which was, however, soon remedied. The largo movement was brought out with rare sweetness, and although the horns, which in the main did finely, broke at the end, there was little to call for criticism. As a whole, the symphony has had few superior interpretations in this city. Wagner's noisy and crashing overture, with its mixed motive and jumbled elements, was given with all the vigor the performers possessed, and therein, for the only time during the evening, their work and that of the conductor seemed in full accord.

There is little demand for delicacy in this composition, but nothing can be better adapted to show the power of an orchestra. Compared to it the stormy overture to "The Flying Dutchman" seems like the whisper of faith to the dull ear of doubt.

The soloist of the evening was Signor Leandro Campanari, who performed upon the violin Spohr's concerto in A and Saint-Saëns romance in C. He made a very favorable impression, showing an unusual skill in difficult passages, a remarkably expressive and flexible tone, and a strong sense of the emotional power of his instrument. His playing is very refined and sympathetic; if any criticism is allowable it must be in the matter of vigor and force, the lack of which is shown in his system by the spaciousness of the hall in which he played. He is, however, an artist of unusual gifts and accomplishments, and his playing here will always be listened to with interest. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture; Recitative and Air, "Joseph," Menul; Symphony, "Eroica," Beethoven; Songs by Rubenstein and Henschel; and Overture, "Faniska," Cherubini. The soloist is to be Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

MR. HENSCHEL AND THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—Though Henschel enthusiasts were undoubtedly the predominating element in the crowded audience at Music Hall on Saturday evening, yet we think too highly of Boston not to presume that there were those present whose regard for the music performed transcended by far any erroneous impressions that might have been created by Mr. Henschel's brilliant individuality, of which we hear so much. These Boston Symphony concerts are at the height of a popularity that Mr. Henschel monopolizes with a wonderful degree of success. Let us not be deceived by outward signs. An æsthetic degree of interest is being taken in Mr. Henschel. It is quite the fashion to laud and magnify his musicianship. No one should infer because of the crowds attending the Boston Symphony concerts, that classical music is about to become as popular as were once the tunes in Pinafore.—With all but musical people, and they are comparatively few in number, classical music goes in at one ear and out at the other without being mentally digested, or to any adequate extent enjoyed. Symphony concerts are very apt to attract large audiences, when associated with novelties of an interesting order. In the present instance it is Mr. Henschel's conducting that is generally regarded as the novelty par excellence. Mr. Henschel is fast becoming the victim of an æsthetic craze. It must be the indefinable and very ethereal something called magnetism that has effected this craze. That Mr. Henschel is "magnetic, and so charmingly magnetic," is the familiar response to a suggestion that he fails to exhibit the artistic repose and well balanced judgment in his lead that are the indispensable habits of the competent conductor.

The spirited playing of the Boston Symphony orchestra was as noticeable on Saturday evening last as at the previous concerts, but the performances were often barren of the refinement so requisite for the production of the best artistic effects. The crescendos are made too spasmodic-

ally; the fortissimi are too many and of too frequent occurrence; and vacillating tempi are the rule rather than the exception. The only ability that Mr. Henschel has yet shown to conduct an andante of one of the masters, in the slow, quiet, refined and steady tempi that is required for such a movement, was in the performance on Saturday evening of Mozart's symphony in E minor. It is just barely possible that Mr. Henschel in displaying the improvement referred to, is inclined to profit by the well intended criticisms of his fellow musicians. His interpretation of this Mozart symphony was at least faithful in spirit, and we felt that the work was not being Henschelized to an inordinate degree. In performing two Slavonic Dances by Dvorak the expression was exaggerated and almost wholly barren of the graceful, swaying, Vienna-like swing that even such grotesque music as that of Dvorak would seem to suggest. Mr. Henschel's "Hymne au Createur," the first of his own music that he has introduced in these concerts, is a very creditable specimen of misplaced romanticism, and one that unites original and carefully prepared invention with singular beauty and depth of feeling. It requires a more dramatic soprano than Mrs. Henschel's to accord it justice, and her singing of it, though praiseworthy in spirit and intent, was impressively lacking in power. She was very successful with the Handel aria from Giulio Cesare, when the pleasing quality of her voice and artistic finesse were most favorably displayed. The concert ended with Nicolai's overture, "The Merry Wives of Windsor," a selection that no doubt seemed a novelty to the younger generation of concert-goers, though twenty or thirty years ago it was the favorite concert piece of the day. It will have been observed that we are far from hypercritical in our notices of these concerts, though as the successor in Boston of conductors of experience and ability, Mr. Henschel's course has been such as to elicit fulsome criticisms. He is a very fine musician indeed; but as chef d'orchestre his ability is by no means displayed at its best.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Some changes in the programme announced week before last were necessitated by the accident to Mr. B. J. Lang's right hand, and his consequent inability to appear last Saturday evening. These changes, however, were not so thorough-going as was at one time anticipated; besides the substitution of Signor Leandro Campanari for Mr. Lang as solo player, only one orchestral number on the programme originally announced for this, the fourth, concert was changed. Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," which was to open the concert, was struck out, and the programme finally appeared as follows: Overture to "Camacho's Wedding," op. 10, Mendelssohn; concerto for violin in A (No. 8), op. 47, Spohr; Symphony in D (No. 2), op. 36, Beethoven; romance for violin in C, op. 48, Saint-Saëns; introduction to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner. Mendelssohn's "Camacho" overture has, we believe, never been heard here before. It, as well as the opera to which it belongs (the soprano air from which, "Wer pocht so leise an der Thür?" was sung here some years ago by Mme. Rudersdorff), was written when the composer was still a boy; it thus belongs very nearly to the period of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture. It is a bright, genial work, strongly reflecting the influence which Weber's genius is known to have exerted upon the young Mendelssohn. Indeed, it shows far less individuality of style than the "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture, which is wholly Mendelssohnian in manner, and only suggests Weber in one of its episodic phrases. The opening of the "Camacho" overture—the broad initial phrase of the trombones and trumpets, and the ensuing vigorous tutti, with its rapid violin figure—is thoroughly "Weberisch;" the manner in which the second theme is introduced is also after Weber's familiar pattern; and more "Weberisch" than all is the brilliant coda. The second theme itself, suggesting, as it does, something of Spanish local character, reminds one more of certain passages in Spohr's "Jessonda." Yet even in this early work Mendelssohn shows symptoms of that future power of his, which, more than any other, distinguished him from the favorite composer of his boyhood, in that the overture is already decidedly better written than almost anything we have from Weber's pen; the accomplished master of musical form shows himself here most unmistakably. The overture was very brilliantly played—the trombones overblowing a little at times—and was heartily enjoyed by the audience. Decidedly the best bit of "classical" playing yet done by Mr. Henschel's orchestra was in the Beethoven symphony. Except that the Scherzo was taken very fast, and that the tempo in the Larghetto asserted itself decisively only after the first dozen measures or so, Mr. Henschel's part of the work calls for nothing but high praise. Even the rapid tempo in the Scherzo cannot be unconditionally condemned, for the metronome mark in the score fully agrees with Mr. Henschel. But we have already said, on previous occasions, that these metronome marks in Beethoven's orchestral scores are by no means unquestionable; indeed, Mr. Henschel showed that he, too, is of this opinion, by taking the finale decidedly slower than marked in the score (half-note=152), for which piece of good judgment every musician must thank him. Even in the Larghetto the general run of his tempo seemed admirable; he was only too undecided at first in asserting the rhythm, and his beat seemed to waver for a while. Be it said, however, that this movement presents certain difficulties; a tempo which gives the opening phrase its true largo character (i. e., which does not suggest an "andante con moto"), may very easily make some of the ensuing passages assume the character of an absolute largo. It is only by the greatest and most intelligent care that the uniformly largo character of the movement can be preserved throughout. The orchestra played generally with great vigor, smoothness, and good attention to shading. Some of the rapid runs in the first violins were not quite so perfect as we could have wished them; not that the notes were not played together, but that certain delicate nuances of sudden crescendo and diminuendo were not made quite simultaneously by all the players. In the hazardous passage in the first movement (beginning with the sixty-eighth measure of the allegro con brio), where all the strings play the figure in sixteenth-notes, which constitutes part of the leading theme, the playing was not quite smooth, albeit we do not remember to have heard this passage played any better (or quite so well) here before. The oboes and bassoons left out some few expression marks in the introduction, but the playing in general was, as we have said, highly praiseworthy; the basses showed especial prowess in some of the strong running passages of the first movement, and the accents in the Scherzo were brought out with grand effect. It is interesting to know that the theme of the first movement of this symphony shares with one other the honor of having been called the "model theme." Robert Franz has analyzed it very carefully (as Hanslick has the theme of the "Prometheus" overture) and said that it "fulfills every requirement of a symphonic theme to an almost unexampled degree." The overture to the "Meistersinger," which, all things considered, must be recognized as Wagner's most elaborately and organically developed orchestral work, was superbly played almost throughout. A few of the more delicate passages sounded a little ragged, but painful experience has taught us almost to despair of hearing these passages sound otherwise; they can rapk only with what is most perplexingly difficult in orchestral writing. Signor Campanari played Spohr's celebrated concerto, "In modo di scena cantante," decidedly well. If in the last allegro he lacked somewhat of that commanding assurance, that making light of difficulties, which bespeak the complete virtuoso, his rendering of the rest of the work was eminently artistic, graceful and sympathetic. His almost constantly exact intonation is a real delight to the ear, and his style was much freer and more buoyant than when he played this concerto a month or so ago in Wesleyan Hall. His playing of the Saint-Saëns Romance, a charming work of rather "chamber" character, was wholly satisfying. The programme for the next concert is:

Overture and recitative and air from "Joseph and his Brethren," Méhul. Symphony in E-flat, "Eroica," No. 3, Beethoven. Songs with piano-forte—a. "The Dream," Rubinstein; b. "Gypsy Serenade," Henschel. Overture to "Feniska," Cherubini. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt will be the singer.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA — FOURTH adv: CONCERT.

The concert of Saturday evening last was the least interesting of the series thus far, albeit every number and every movement were greatly applauded. The audience, which was very large for so stormy an evening, seemed so satisfied with itself for having come out, and for having passed safely through the difficulties encompassing whomsoever enters the Music hall from Tremont street, that it had nothing but good temper and indulgence even for what was not meritorious. The unfortunate accident which broke the ligaments of the little finger of Mr. Lang's right hand, and so temporarily disabled him for public playing, necessitated a considerable change in the programme, the new composition of which was less attractive than the old, and was, upon the whole, undoubtedly less entertaining than the performance as originally planned would have been. In place of Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture there was given for the opening number the same author's overture to his early and unfinished opera, "Camacho's Wedding." This overture, based mainly upon a pretty and lively theme, which is pleasantly worked out in variations and imitations, belongs rather to that class which forms the repertory of good theatre orchestras. It has but little Mendelssohnian flavor about it, although it is simple and sincere enough, and it hardly merits, unless as a curiosity, a place on the programmes of a grand orchestra. Signor Leandro Campanari, a young Italian violinist, and the soloist of the evening, made his debut before a Music-hall audience, in the second number, which was Spohr's concerto in A,—number 8, opus 47. This concerto (written "after the fashion of a vocal scena") makes large demands upon a violinist. It embraces movements which pass from the allegro molto to the adagio, and not only is the rhythm of continuous song to be found in it, but also the broken and interrupted delivery of recitative is at least once imitated. To say that Signor Campanari did not fulfil all Spohr's requirements, is not great dispraise. He drew from his instrument a beautiful tone, his style seemed pure and good, and his execution was easy, clean-cut, and fluent, the intricate passages in double-stopping being remarkably well delivered. But his playing was rather that of a fine dilettante, fond of his art, indulging his own ear and fancy with the sweet sounds evoked by his bow, than of the artist anxious to awaken others to new thoughts and experiences. Therefore he exercised no magnetic effect upon his audience, but left much such an impression as it would be natural to expect from a woman's playing.

Next came the symphony,—Beethoven's second, in D. This work is not so much a favorite with the average concert-goer as with the student, and therefore it needed unusual care and taste in playing that it might give all possible intelligence and satisfaction. We are sorry to say that it was not so played. The adagio of the first movement was given with sufficient clearness and judgment, but the succeeding allegro was coarse, loud and heavy; if Mr. Henschel has any definite idea of what con brio means, he certainly has not success in making the orchestra carry out that idea. And the same criticism applies to the scherzo, which was driven along fast enough and plainly enough in all conscience, but without the fancy which is as much the one essential characteristic of a scherzo as hearty, jubilant life is the one definition of brio. The largo was well played as a whole, barring some queerish scrambling in the horns, but the final allegro molto was bad. It was an almost unvaried turbulence of fortissimi from beginning to end. Fire and force in playing are necessary qualities; but, used without just temper and discretion, they degenerate into rant as easily in the concert-room as in the theatre. We have praised Mr. Henschel freely for his vigor in dealing with musicians who had fallen into a "happy-go-lucky" way of playing, and admired the energy and unity he has imparted to them. But if the band are to be driven in such a rush and roar through the music which cost Beethoven such long study and such devotion of labor, and which is instinct with meaning expressed in the fine phrasing of responsive thoughts, it will be as useless to expect from them the pleasure and enlightenment which the great author meant to give as it was to attempt to recognize Hamlet in Edwin Forrest, or would be to try and make sense out of the confusion of Miss Mary Anderson's passionate outbursts.

The next number brought back Signor Campanari, who played a romance (opus 48) by Saint-Saëns. This composition might almost as well be called a revery or a mild rhapsody, for it flows on continuously from phrase to phrase of pleasing sound, but without much definiteness of thought or form. It is sweet and lulling, and in the playing of it Signor Campanari was at his best, filling the ear with a soft volume of sensuous tone, and gliding on as though he were repeating a romance of his own weaving. When he shall have gained a greater breadth of delivery and a sturdier sort of feeling he will certainly rank high among our violin virtuosi. The programme ended with the overture to "The Master-singers of Nuremberg"—that uproarious composition which once provoked a spirituelle lady to say in our hearing that the deaf, certainly, ought to be grateful to Wagner, inasmuch as he had written music which they could always hear. Through this difficult and seemingly chaotic work Mr. Henschel carried the orchestra with peculiar energy, leading with such determination and tenacity that a player could no more have held back than he could have resisted a whirlwind. Indeed we were almost afraid that so tremendous a clangor of brass and such strident strings might relegate us to that class for whom, as has just been said, this sort of music seems so felicitously provided. Mr. Henschel had put his players into their definite order upon the stage, setting half of the first violins on each hand, and arranging the other instruments that a line drawn from his desk to the organ would leave on each side almost a complete orchestra, the wind instruments, however, still stretching across the back. All but the three front rows are elevated, line by line, until the last must be some four feet above the stage level. This perching of the players on planks laid on trestles—little sounding-boards, as it were—gave apparently more sonority, but we could perceive no greater definiteness.

The next concert will present Beethoven's third symphony, and the overtures to "Feniska," by Cherubini, and to "Joseph and his Brethren," by Méhul. Mr. Toedru, the tenor, will sing an air from Méhul and songs by Rubinstein and Henschel. In view of the large attendance at the public rehearsals, it seems parsimonious—to put it mildly—to provide no programmes. The hall is filled by an excellent auditory, who pay all that is asked, and who are entitled to better information than they can get from an occasional slip pinned to a door-jamb.

And as we are upon minor topics, we may say that the hall on Saturday was preposterously hot, the registers sending up, even at the end of the evening, a heat ample for a bitterly cold night. The crush and jam of ears and earrings at the Tremont-street entrance was disgraceful and dangerous. There should have been provided at least a couple of officers to regulate the vehicles. The railway movement was at an absolute standstill for twenty minutes, and the confusion was extreme. Whoever is charged with the out-door management of the concerts must see that such thing does not occur again.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Four : Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fourth of the Saturday concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, following being the programme:

Overture, ("Camacho's Wedding.").....Mendelssohn
Op. 10.....
Concerto for violin in A. No. 8, Op. 47.....Spohr
Symphony in D. No. 2, Op. 38.....Beethoven
Romance for violin in C. Op. 48.....Saint-Saëns
Introduction. ("The Master Singers of Nuremberg.").....Wagner

The soloist of the evening, Sig. Leandro Campanari, though he has been heard here before, has never had such an opportunity as that given him last evening. The quiet, self-possessed appearance of this artist when he first came upon the platform quickly won the favor of the audience, and his interpretation of the Spohr concerto had so much of genuine merit in it that the applause which rewarded the effort was well deserved. Sig. Campanari is a careful, rather than a brilliant player, but the truthness of his tones, the purity and smoothness of his runs and trills and his graceful stage appearance, make his playing highly enjoyable. His second number, the Saint-Saëns romance, was given a very sympathetic rendering, and the singing tone produced by the player in some passages was exquisite in its quality. Sig. Campanari has evidently won his present excellent touch by hard work, as it has very largely improved since his first appearance here, and he will always be heard with pleasure. He was enthusiastically applauded after his second number, and bowed his thanks. There is little cause for extended comment upon the playing of the orchestra in this programme. Mr. Henschel is certainly rapidly achieving the end aimed at in the organization of this body of players, for there is evidently an esprit de corps being developed which may be relied upon to make it the model orchestra of America. Such a rendering of the symphony of the evening has not been heard since Theodore Thomas had his original orchestra, and was full of the enthusiasm of the days of his earlier efforts. Mr. Henschel appears to treat the standard composers of the past as if they were of the present day, and presents their works with the same freshness that he would the compositions of Wagner, Saint-Saëns or Brahms. The life and vitality which is thus infused into the compositions of the great masters give a new interpretation of their beauties, which cannot fail to make them attractive to the audience. The audiences now hearing them for the first time. The novelty of the evening was the "Meistersinger" introduction, it having been heard here but once before. The grandeur of the composition and the skill with which its four leading themes are treated, fill the listener with wonder, and the finale arouses the enthusiasm of audience and players to the highest pitch. The orchestra fairly surpassed all its efforts in the rendering given this great composition, and its interpretation fully equalled any given it by the orchestras of the continent, judging from comments made by those familiar with its performance in the German cities. The new seating of the orchestra, though not essentially different from the former arrangement, appeared to be an improvement, and the effects, as heard from the balconies especially, are said to be superior to those under the old arrangement of the players. The programme for next Saturday's concert will be found in the musical column.

Beethoven's Third Symphony.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

At the performance of Beethoven's third symphony by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday evening the critics seem to be particularly severe upon the tempo of the second movement, the funeral march, even though the time was indicated by the term adagio assai, and as one critic says it has been performed by Theodore Thomas's orchestra at even a slower tempo. We can hardly see the appropriateness of accelerating the time of a burial march without losing the very character intended by the composer. We noticed particularly the evenness of time which Mr. Henschel maintained throughout this movement, there being a slight acceleration through the major passages which added to the effect of the stately and dirge-like character of the minor, where the same slow time was rigidly adhered to.

As for the other movements we can only say that whereas an element of vigor may have been wanting throughout, yet the general effect was pleasing.

The greatest danger we think in the performance of Beethoven's works is an inclination to hurry, and it is a fault which troubled Beethoven himself when his works were produced by the conductors of his own day. As no metronomic signs can be a safe and unfailing guide, only the true musician can judge intuitively of the proper time which shall be maintained.

In Beethoven's works where any doubt arises it is better to err on the side of the slow rather than attempt orchestral effects by unduly hurrying. If the critics could only comprehend Mr. Henschel's intentions in conducting the symphonies perhaps they would do him more justice than some of them have shown, and instruct their readers as well.

Musical.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The most interesting phase of the fifth Boston symphony concert was by no means the programme. We should not have made use of the negation had it not been so generally expected of Mr. Henschel that his programmes should show a decided improvement on the character of those that were so frequently condemned at the Harvard concerts. Thus far the referred to expectations have failed of any adequate realization. We have conceded the remarkable popularity of the Boston symphony concerts. We have also noted that the programmes of the concerts are associated with little of the high order of novelty that was so freely heralded for them. It remains to be considered, then, whether the playing of the Boston symphony orchestra has been of such an extraordinary character as to account for a wide-spread popularity, and likewise compensate for the disappointment to which reference has been made. A negative answer is the natural response to our honest convictions. For example, the playing of the orchestra on Saturday evening last was of a very unsatisfactory character. Not a particle of improvement was shown, but the reverse was the case. Beethoven's Heroic Symphony was the principal selection of the evening, and it was subjected to a very uninteresting and objectionable performance. The tempi taken by Mr. Henschel were conspicuously at variance with everything we had experienced before, either in this country or in Europe. The Marcia funebre was played in such an unwarrantably slow tempo that the politeness of the audience in not leaving the hall before the conclusion of the performance is at least worthy of a slight degree of commendation. In the allegro movement the orchestra failed to play with anything like a unanimous degree of precision; the opening allegro was subjected to a tediously slow performance; and, in short, the entire rendering was dolefully void of anything like animation. Mehul's overture to "Joseph," which was also performed at this concert, is the typical work of a composer who at his best was but a successful and ingenious imitator of the contrapuntal science of Cherubini. It is a passionless and artificial specimen of musical form, inhering in the life and dash that might serve to rouse an audience. A recitative and aria, from this same work, followed on the programme. It was superbly rendered by Mr. Theodore J. Toedt. This gentleman has a tenor voice of excellent timbre. It lacks volume, but for refinements of accent and expression it is exceptionally good. He rendered with charming effect Rubinstein's song, "The Dream," and a very unique and pleasing selection composed by Mr. Henschel and entitled the "Gipsy Serenade." The concert concluded with a very good performance of Cherubini's "Faniska" overture.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 19TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. } (Joseph and his brethren.) MÉHUL.
RECITATIVE AND AIR. }

SYMPHONY in E flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, Op. 55. BEETHOVEN.

Allegro con brio.—Marcia funebre. (Adagio assai).—
Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.—

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a. THE DREAM. RUBINSTEIN.
b. GIPSY SERENADE. HENSCHEL.

(Violin obligato, Mr. Listemann.)

OVERTURE. (Faniska.) CHERUBINI.

SOLOIST:

MR. THEODORE J. TOEDT.

Recitative and Aria. (Joseph and his brethren.) MÉHUL.

(Break of dawn. The garden behind Joseph's palace. Joseph, pursued by dreams of his youth, steps from his chamber into the garden.)

TRANSLATION.

RECIT. Ah! In vain the eye of the king smiles graciously upon me! My wishes are fulfilled ere yet they are told; and yet—thinking of the days that are gone, my heart longs for the happiness I have lost.

AIR. (Adagio.) Land of my fathers, they tore me young from thee. Far from thee they have sold me that hated me. Little moves me the splendor which cannot rejoice my heart. Jacob surely longs to press me to his heart. Once only to see him again, the father—what delight! To wipe away his tears, to soothe his grief!

(Allegro.) Brethren, full of envy, jealousy and vengeance, the weak and helpless implored your pity—in vain! As a slave ye sold him. Could your father's tears not move you? Ye saw his pain, his solicitude, his anguish, and remained hard; ye deserve my hatred! And yet, bloodthirsty hyenas, I feel that my heart forgives you. Could it be, that ye repent—ah, then your tears would reconcile me!

TWO SONGS WITH PIANO.

a. The Dream. RUBINSTEIN.

'Twas in a meadow by the way
Where on the hay I slumbered,
A gentle dream upbore me, where
Float angel hosts unnumbered.
I wakened, and with sigh profound,
Looked sadly, vainly, all around.

Then came a song that way along,
A fair young minstrel singing;
And through the trees passed like a gleam.
While still the tones were ringing.
Ah! Were they those which from my dream
Still to my soul were clinging?

b. Gipsy Serenade. HENSCHEL.

Look, Maiden, from thy casement come
When the shadows darken;
Come when the stars are sparkling, come,
Thy gentle vigil keep.
Then through the fragrant darkness
A secret word I'll waft thee,
A gipsy spell I'll whisper.
Come, then, beneath the starlight,
Trust him who still implores thee,
Fly through the summer gloaming,
Thy lover's arm for guide.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. The fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall, Saturday night, endured the usual bad weather which we are accustomed to expect on these occasions, and enjoyed the large audience which attends these entertainments in spite of rain and mud. The programme consisted of Mehul's overture to "Joseph and his Brethren," Beethoven's symphony No. 3, "Eroica," and Cherubini's overture to "Fanciulla." The general work of the orchestra during the evening was characterized by a greater degree of smoothness than it has yet shown, although it must be confessed that much is still left to be desired in this respect. Mr. Henschel has developed the powers of his performers to a remarkable degree considering the time he has spent in the training, but they are not yet in full harmony with each other or en rapport with him, and he has still to gain the control which common expectation had granted him in advance. His decided and energetic method has had the good effect of breaking the fetters of routine and giving an occasion for liberty of action and thought, but whether he can now direct the newly-gained freedom into the channels of greatest effectiveness is still an open question. Mr. Henschel's defects as a leader in a new departure seem to be comprised in the one fact that he has not yet gained full control of himself. In almost no concert yet has he shown his ability to maintain a tempo with which he has once set out; if he is to express delicacy he drags in his beating, and if passion he accelerates, and, as a result, there is a timidity about the attacks of the players which, in intricate or difficult passages, seems to degenerate at times into absolute trepidation. The orchestra may rise superior to this fault of the conductor in time and play well in spite of it, but they will never do their best work until he is a unit with them, and acts as much with them as any two performers act together. An unusual feature in these concerts was noticed on Saturday night in a lack of spirit and vivacity. The symphony—which is, after all, the only one of the three instrumental selections worth discussing—was, on the whole, tamely performed, although, as we have above said, with great smoothness and finish. Being, as it is, the apotheosis of Bonaparte, one would at least expect in its performance a promptness and force suggesting militarism and conquest, but on this occasion it was very tame. The first—allegro—movement was taken in anything but a sprightly way, although, by being hastened as it progressed, it ended in good time. The orchestra also showed that it is possible even to add to the slowness of a dead march, and dragged through the grand music of the second part in a very sluggish manner. The scherzo was well played, but the trio again was very slow. To make a proper average in the tempi of the symphony the final presto was taken at such a rate that neither strings nor wind instruments could hold up to the baton or keep together, and scuttled along through the concluding bars in a slipshod and ridiculous way. Altogether, while the orchestra showed improvement over former efforts in some respects, it revealed great and unexpected faults in others.

The soloist of the evening was Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, who has an extremely sweet, pure voice, and a good fashion of using it, and who sang with rare taste, sentiment and expression. His singing was one of the pleasantest features of the evening. He sang "Rubenstein's Dream" and a Gipsy serenade by Henschel, and won a substantial and deserved success. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52, by Schumann; concerto in D for violin, op. 11, by Jos. Joachim; minuetto in A, by Boccherini; sinfonia in D (1760), by C. Ph. Emanuel Bach. The soloist will be Mr. Bernhard Listemann.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Features of the Fifth Concert, Saturday Evening—The Gerster Concert at the Globe Last Night—The Week's Attractions—Various Notes.

The large number of persons who were absent from the concert of last Saturday evening,—deterred, no doubt, by the pelting rain,—lost the great pleasure which was afforded by the singing of Mr. Theodore J. Toedt. During the past two years several attempts have been made by the Apollo club, and more lately still by the Handel and Haydn Society, to bring this gentleman before a Music-hall audience. But his engagements in New York have always interfered, and at the moment we do not recall his having sung in this city, except at a concert given by Miss Abell in the New Jerusalem church, when he took part in the "Stabat Mater." Mr. Toedt's voice is a tenor of not large volume nor dramatic type, but (better than that) of delightfully pure, even and beautiful quality. His manner is simply exquisite. Superlative as that word is, we have no other which can so well indicate the elegance of method and refinement of effect that characterize his singing, the charm of which is further enhanced by a modest intensity which indicated at once the artist-musician and the man of sensibility. These qualities were quickly recognized by the audience, which expressed its appreciative pleasure by a triple recall when his part of the evening's work was done. Mr. Toedt sang (in German) the often quoted tenor recitative and air from Mehul's "Joseph and his Brethren," and (in English) to a pianoforte accompaniment by Mr. Henschel, Rubinstein's "The Dream," and a "Gipsy Serenade." This last, written by Mr. Henschel, is an odd little song, and gains effect from a violin obligato (Mr. Listemann), although the subject of this does not seem to have much logical relation to the vocal theme. The first selection is not particularly enjoyable; but it proved not uninteresting, as its varying sentiment was so clearly defined and shaded by Mr. Toedt, with whom the orchestra might have been more gentle at times. We are not much in favor of including chamber music of any kind, and especially songs, in the programmes of grand concerts; but Mr. Toedt reconciled us to this for once. His rendering of Mr. Henschel's serenade was winning and sweet; but the Rubinstein song was, to our thinking, the gem of all, and shining with a poetry which many a singer attempting it after this hint of his, will try in vain to find in it. In all these selections Mr. Toedt's enunciation was so clear and correct that no reference to a printed text was needful, and a lesson never to be forgotten by those vocalists who would excuse their own indolence by the pretence that fine singing and plain pronunciation are incompatible.

But if the absentees lost a pleasure, they were also spared a pang. Such a performance of that grand symphony of Beethoven, the "Eroica," we hope not to hear again. As a heroic apotheosis it was almost unrecognizable, and we were absolutely at a loss to comprehend upon what plan Mr. Henschel had elaborated his reading, or whether to conclude that he was doing himself an injustice equal to that which the author was suffering at his hands. It almost seemed to us as if the conductor, tired of being blamed for his impetuosity, had decided to let things take their own way, contenting himself with that mechanical unity and strength which he has been so successful in obtaining. The tempi, even when properly taken at the beginning of the movement, fluctuated erratically, and the symphony as a whole must have seemed tedious even to many who applauded as heartily as if they thought they were doing a duty. The opening allegro con brio began, if not joyfully, at least cheerfully; but no sooner did the theme in E minor make its appearance, than the time relaxed, and the character changed to a kind of doloroso. Indeed, all through the symphony, there was that peculiar kind of coloring which is such a favorite with some vocalists, who are wont to give all major passages loudly and quickly, and all minor ones softly and slowly. The funeral march which constitutes the second movement suggested nothing of the hero's burial,—nothing of that stately processional mourning which Tennyson has worded in his ode on the Duke of Wellington. The sweeps up to their fundamental note for the basses were dull rather than solemn, and the major theme was unduly hurried. The lead of the hautboy was excellently marked, and the 'celli were often commendable. The scherzo promised well, beginning lightly and brightly, and rising to the short, sharp crescendos as it should, but no sooner did the horns enter with their theme, than all was lost. The time fell off, and sadness succeeded; instead of remembering that the minor mode can be as gay as the major, and is, perhaps, as often chosen for a lilting strain, Mr. Henschel cast a wholly unsuitable sentimental expression over the rest of the movement which ended in scarcely less melancholy than the preceding. The last movement presented such strange irregularities and alternations of time and coloring, that we may best, perhaps, refrain from criticizing it, lest we should seem unduly severe. But, as a summing up, we cannot help saying that this was decidedly Mr. Henschel's greatest unsucccess in symphony conducting.

The overtures of the evening associated the names of two composers, Cherubini and Méhul, whose lives and fields of labor lay close together, and of whom the former had a great influence upon the latter. Méhul had possibly a finer native talent than Cherubini, but he had no early training, and his learning and skill were always less. The personal example and the works of Cherubini were a stimulus to him, and the quantity and quality of his writing were undoubtedly thereby augmented and improved. The overture to "Joseph and his Brethren" is perhaps as fair a specimen of his orchestral writing as could be chosen, while the "Faniska" of Cherubini was a good enough selection if the "Wasserträger" was not available. The "Joseph" is of a flowing, simple character, not unlike Bellini in its melodiousness, although warmer in feeling and often earnest in expression. The "Faniska" has not a much larger basis, but its author's admirable treatment of the orchestra and his great contrapuntal skill give it an apparently higher value. Both overtures were played excellently, and that of Méhul must be specially commended for its uniform temperateness, and for the perfect smoothness of tone and unity of phrasing with which the strings began it.

The sixth concert will bring out for its solo player Mr. Listemann, who is to perform Joachim's elaborate Hungarian concerto in D, for violin. The orchestral selections represent the old masters by a minuet of Boccherini and a symphony of Emanuel Bach, while modern music is illustrated by Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," opus 52.

We must thank the business manager of the concerts, on behalf of the public, for so prompt an adhesion to the general desire which we expressed a week ago. The hall was cool and fresh for its occupants, and the crowd of carriages and cars was managed by a police detail with address and decision. If private vehicles could be made to set down and take up their passengers, all heading in one direction, and not allowed to turn about in front of the entrance, this part of the service would be perfect. A sufficient supply of programmes on Friday also added much to the pleasure of a large company, and we heard many expressions of satisfaction. These rehearsals—like those of the Philharmonic Society—have an individuality which derives from the changing light of the waning afternoon, and adds a peculiar character to the effect of the playing. The only artificial light is that over the stage, and as the grateful and harmonious tints of the hall pass to softer and deeper shades in the twilight, the music seems to have even more than its wonted meaning, and the listener thinks himself even farther than he really is from the noisy and bustling prose of the outer world. It is a sensation worth the experiencing even by those who are not lovers of music in the abstract.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The Boston Symphony orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, gave the fifth concert of the series in Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme consisting of Méhul's overture to "Joseph and his Brethren," Beethoven's Symphony No. 3, "Eroica," and Cherubini's overture to "Faniska" for the orchestra, and Rubinstein's "Dream" and Henschel's "Gypsy Serenade" for the soloist of the evening, Mr. Theodore J. Toedt. The playing of the orchestra was vigorous and spirited, the conductor ruling his forces as if with a hand of iron, but there were portions of the Symphony in which the musicians did not appear to be in full accord with Mr. Henschel's baton, and the result was that there was more carelessness manifested than usual. The remaining numbers were all fairly played, however, and Mr. Toedt's solos were a feature of the evening to be remembered with feelings of genuine pleasure. The programme for the next concert will comprise "Overture, Scherzo and Finale," op. 52, Schumann; "Concerto in D for violin," op. 11, Joachim; "Minuetto in A," Boccherini; and "Sinfonia in D," C. Ph. Emanuel Bach. Mr. Bernhard Listemann will be the soloist.

THE FIFTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

In following the course of Beethoven, as pictured in his symphonies, one finds a perfect history in the first three. The first shows the young master faithfully following the time-honored precepts that have been instilled into him by Haydn; but for all that, giving an inkling of the boldness that was to follow by the fiery development of the allegro movement. In the second symphony we find him breaking one of the chief fetters of antique music—the minuet, and substituting for it the scherzo, with its freer treatment. In the third symphony, the chief work of last night's programme, Beethoven is at last himself. The erica is the beginning of modern music, the keynote of the reformation. In the strong first two chords of this work, we hear the proclamation of musical freedom. It was an invocation in many ways. Firstly, it was in some sense intended for a tone picture. It was the picture of a great statesman, a warrior, a hero, as Beethoven at the time supposed Bonaparte to be. The funeral march, the burial of all these hopes, when Beethoven found his idol shattered, is still the finest of all tonepictures of grief. Secondly, its length and development are greater than had ever been attempted before; and thirdly, its treatment of themes, notably in the first movement, is something which no composer had dared to attempt before.

It was the demolition of musical commonplace, the opening of a new field for music which was to place it beside painting and literature among the greatest arts.

The performance of the work was marked by clearness and earnest force. At times a shade of sentimentality was discernable in an extra slow tempo. The Funeral March was an instance of this. The trio of the third movement would have been improved had it been taken in the same time in which Mr. Henschel began the scherzo. The presto at the end of the work was too rapid for either strings or horns to do full justice to. The shading was generally excellent, the horns did most of their important work well, and the strings were clear and emphatic, at times even too much so, in the staccato phrases of the march. Altogether, a good, but not phenomenal performance. There was an aberration of time in the wood wind during the first movement. The concert began and ended with more formal music than this iconoclastic work. The overture to Méhul's "Joseph" is pleasant to listen to and, excepting a startling atrocious trouble in the horns, was well played. How differently such a subject would have been treated by a modern composer. Mr. Toedt's singing was in the highest degree satisfactory. It was refined, purely toned, exquisitely shaded, and sweet, in spite of a huskiness which seemed to tell of a New England cold. Mr. Henschel's Gypsy Serenade was a characteristic work, which could have been condensed a little. Its opening theme is sad and weird, and is heightened by a wailing phrase on the violin. The singer was not able to do full justice to its more fiery portions. Cherubini's Faniska Overture, with its rapid melodies, symmetrical form and general reserve, was also a fine contrast to the more turbulent Eroica Symphony. The programmes are growing heavier very fast. The next one offers: the overture, op. 52, Schumann; concerto in D for violin, op. 11, Joachim; minuetto in A, Boccherini; sinfonia in D, (176), C. Ph. Emanuel Bach; Mr. B. Listemann being the soloist. Since Mr. Henschel is among the ancients, why not dig up some of the beauties of Lullu, Gretry Romeau and the old French School?

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The programme contained but three instrumental numbers: Méhul's Overture to "Joseph," Beethoven's Symphony, No. 3, "Eroica," and Cherubini's Overture to "Faniska." The orchestra did its work with much more smoothness than it has hitherto shown. There was also less rasping among the strings and a comparative moderation on the part of the conductor in his sweep of the baton. He has not yet, however, obtained full control of himself, as was evidenced by his propensity to grow excited and to hasten the tempo whenever the music became impassioned: and it still remains a decided fact that he appears unable to sustain and to finish a movement in the same pace at which he begins it. The Méhul overture was scarcely worth the reviving. It is by no means an example of the composer at his best. A more representative work would have been his "L'Irato," or his "La Chasse" overture. It was very well played, however, though it has but little value, and gave but little pleasure. In our previous notices of these concerts it has fallen to our lot to make complaint of the superabundant fire and the too rapid tempi that have distinguished the performances. On this occasion, strangely enough, we feel compelled to demur at the lack of fire and the dragging tempi that were the features of the interpretation of the symphony. In fact, the reading of the work throughout was the dulllest to which we have ever listened, and we must confess that for the first time we found the wonderful masterpiece wearisome. Of the "Eroica" element nothing was left, and the tameness of the whole was suggestive of the apotheosis of almost anybody but a military hero. The opening movement was taken at a very spiritless pace, but the propensity of Mr. Henschel to hurry worked it up to the proper point before it was half over. The slow movement was made too lifeless even for a dead march, and dragged its slow length along with distressing laziness. The scherzo was begun in the proper tempo, but the trio was taken with a slowness that was almost ludicrous, and the horns moaned out their phrases as solemnly as if they were assisting at the funeral in the preceding movement. The finale again was given with a slowness that robbed it of all life, and when it reached the poco andante there was nothing to be done but to drop almost into an adagio to make the necessary contrast, while, on the other hand, the concluding presto was lashed into such a breakneck pace that the performers could not play the notes set down for them, especially the wind instruments, whose scrambling and spluttering through the last thirty or forty bars was almost laughable. Such a flabby rendering of such a noble symphony is inexcusable, and shows either a lack of knowledge or a lack of taste on the part of the conductor who could so strangely misinterpret it. We have thus far watched Mr. Henschel's career as a conductor with deep interest. We are fully conscious of his talents and powers as a highly educated musician, and are ready now, as we have been in the past, to make all acknowledgment of them; but we begin to perceive that marked genius as a conductor is not among his best gifts. Whatever skill he may have in his closet as an interpreter of the scores of the old masters, he has made it but too evident that he cannot interpret them satisfactorily when he stands, baton in hand, before an orchestra. He may be "magnetic" and "exciting," but he certainly has not shown thus far that he has any greater strength as a conductor than to inspire his orchestra with his own fire. Not that we object to fire, but we would rather be gently warmed by it than roasted in a furious conflagration. One of the pleasing features of the concert was the singing of Mr. Theodore J. Toedt.

He has not a large voice, but it is a sweet one, and he has the skill and the power to make the most of it. He sings with exquisite taste and expressiveness, and with a refinement of style that is really fascinating in its delicacy and its purity. His intonation is faultless and his phrasing delightful to listen to. He won an instant success and the heartiest applause of his hearers. His singing of Rubinstein's "The Dream" was an artistic bit of work, as beautiful in sentiment as it was chaste in feeling. He also sang a "Gypsy Serenade" by Mr. Henschel, with accompaniment for piano and violin, a quaint and expressive composition, marked in character, and very effective. For the next concert the programme is Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52; Joachim's "Hungarian Concerto" for violin, to be played by Mr. Listemann; Boccherini's popular Minuet; and Emanuel Bach's Symphony in D.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Successful Rendition of Beethoven's Eroica at Music Hall. Slobe

The fifth concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra series in Music Hall last evening was enjoyed by the inevitable large audience. The public rehearsal on Friday afternoon was also similarly favored; and on that occasion, for the first time also, the management was thoughtful enough to provide programmes. This was a feature which was very deeply appreciated. The programme last evening had for its basis Beethoven's magnificent third symphony, commonly known as the Eroica. This symphony, which was originally written in celebration of Beethoven's ideal hero, Napoleon, and which was thrown away in disgust when that hero forfeited the great composer's respect, contains some of the master's finest work, and is full of passages which call for the very best work of the musician in order to make them presentable. To say that the orchestra last night was fully up to the requirements of the composition is approximately true, although of course they were not beyond criticism. The allegro con brio movement, and in fact most of the rapid tempi, were not hurried along at that breakneck speed which has blurred some of the former presentations. The shadings were fine, and in most instances all the directions in the score were carried out with something more than mere mechanical effort; and, taken altogether, the orchestra has done nothing finer this season than its production of this work. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist of the evening, and was very pleasing to most of his hearers. He appeared in a recitative and air from Méhul's "Joseph and his Brethren," the orchestra having previously played the overture to the same. He also sang two songs with the piano, the first of which was Rubinstein's "The Dream," and the second Mr. Henschel's "Gypsy Serenade." The violin obligato incident to the last was given by Mr. Listemann. Mr. Toedt was warmly applauded for his efforts. Cherubini's overture to "Faniska" concluded the programme. The following programme is announced for next Saturday evening:

Overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52.....Schumann.
Concerto in D for violin, op. 11.....Jos. Joachim.
(In the Hungarian style.)
Minuetto in A.....Boccherini.
Sinfonia in D. (1760.).....C. Ph. Emanuel Bach.
Soloist, Mr. Bernhard Listemann.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Transcript
Boston Symphony Orchestra. The fifth concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, brought a rather more "severe" programme than its predecessors:

Overture, recitative and air, from "Joseph and his Brethren".....Méhul
Symphony in E-flat (Eroica), No. 3.....Beethoven
Songs—a. "The Dream".....Rubinstein
b. "Gypsy Serenade".....Henschel
Overture to "Faniska".....Cherubini

Méhul's music is so very little heard here that the first number had all the charm of novelty. It belongs to the great, classic period of French opera, when the influence of Gluck was still the reigning one (indeed, Méhul was born early enough to be personally acquainted with the great master), when Cherubini was at the height of his fame, and Spontini was just about to conquer public admiration by the brilliancy of his genius. "Joseph" was brought out at the Feydeau, in Paris, in February, 1807, not quite a year before Spontini's "La Vestale." In the very beautiful overture, and the still more beautiful air, we feel at once the noble dignity of Gluck and the finely wrought style of Cherubini—that is, we feel how strongly the combined influence of the two great composers affected Méhul. Yet, even after this analysis, there remains a residuum of original strength and pathos which shows how well Méhul's genius was able to appropriate to himself what was worthy of reproduction in the style of his models, and make it wholly his own. We can only regret that Mr. Henschel gave us the abbreviated version of the overture, which does not give the themes that full development which one looks for in a symphonic composition. We sincerely hope that this is not the last that we shall hear of music of this sort. Beethoven's "Eroica" showed Mr. Henschel's orchestra in the most favorable light it has yet appeared in; barring some few slips, the performance was one which for general smoothness and faithfulness to the score must command sincere admiration. Yet we must confess to being surprised at Mr. Henschel's conception of the work. The first movement was the most to our liking, albeit even here a certain inconstancy of tempo made it difficult to detect exactly what the conductor's intentions really were. The noble theme was announced just right, with fine power and dignity; but the initial tempo was soon lost (through nervous hurrying) and nothing in the rest of the movement corresponded to this vigorous first impression. The second movement (funeral march) was taken at an inconceivably slow rate (albeit Mr. Thomas takes it even slower), and we do not hesitate to say that its whole character was distorted thereby. We can find nothing in the spirit of Beethoven's music—certainly not in the music of his first and second manners—which suggests such an entirely "modern" and over-sentimental, turgid expression of feeling as this movement becomes in Mr. Henschel's hands. To use an expression which, we hope, will be understood, it sounded as if Mr. Henschel were playing not only Beethoven, but Beethoven and all his commentators together. The march-like character of the movement was lost altogether; surely Beethoven, who was especially careful with his captions, did not write the words "marcia funebre" for nothing. With the tempo of the scherzo we have no inclination to quarrel; but the movement was played without spirit, and the slackened pace of the trio made it dreary enough to the listener, however comfortable it may have been to the horn players. The finale sounded much more "Beethovenish," except in the poco andante, which again was taken slow past belief. The term poco andante may be interpreted (according to musical terminology) "a little slow," or (literally) "a little fast," but in no case can it mean "very slow." The concluding presto, on the other hand, was taken at a break-neck pace, which made it simply impossible to play. It seems ridiculous to suppose that any composer in his senses should have written thirty-second notes to go to so rapid a beat. Yet here again it can be said that if Mr. Henschel had only stuck to the tempo of his first two or three measures, all would have been well. To sum up our impressions, it seemed as if Mr. Henschel (in the first movement) meant exactly right, but lost his self-command; in the scherzo we thought we could detect an honest, but overdone, protest against a too rapid tempo. In the slow movements we could see nothing but extravagance and bathos. Cherubini's overture to "Faniska" went capitably. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, the singer of the evening, sang delightfully, with the truest artistic expression and admirable technique. His voice is too light to be really effective in so large a hall, but his style is fine beyond all criticism. Mr. Henschel's little "Gypsy Serenade" (the very effective violin obligato to which was tastefully played by Mr. Listemann) is a charming composition, in which very telling use is made of the chromatic minor mode. The programme for the sixth concert will be—

Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.....Schumann
Concerto in D for Violin, op. 11.....Jos. Joachim
(In the Hungarian style.)
Minuetto in A.....Boccherini
Sinfonia in D (1760.).....C. Ph. Emanuel Bach
The solo player will be Mr. Bernhard Listemann.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, at Music Hall, last evening, was attended by a very large audience despite the rain, and the programme proved an eminently enjoyable one throughout, the numbers being as follows:

Overture } (Joseph and his brethren). Méhul
Recitative and air }
Symphony in E flat. (Eroica). No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Songs, with piano.
a. "The Dream".....Rubinstein
b. "Gypsy Serenade".....Henschel
(Violin obligato, Mr. Listemann.)
Overture, (Faniska).....Cherubini

Lack of space prevents any extended comment upon the performance. The event of the evening was the great success made by Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor, who appeared before a Boston audience for the first time. The sweetness and purity of his voice, throughout its range, his thoroughly artistic method, the intelligence, grace and beauty of his phrasing, his clear and distinct enunciation, and the quiet ease which characterized his stage presence, combined to win the most enthusiastic applause from the audience for each of his efforts, and he was recalled again and again, to bow his thanks after his charming rendering of the no less charming "Gypsy serenade," to which, as well as the Rubinstein selection, Mr. Henschel played the accompaniment. The melodious measures of the Méhul recitative and aria were rendered with equal success by Mr. Toedt, who will be welcomed by Boston audiences whenever he shall appear here. The orchestra has never been heard to better advantage than in this programme, and Mr. Henschel needs no better indorsement of his methods and readings of standard works than the applause spontaneously awarded him by such audiences as attend these concerts, made up as they are of the best elements of the resident musical public.

MR. HENSCHEL'S INTERPRETATION.

To the Editor of the Transcript: After reading several severely adverse criticisms of Mr. Henschel's performance of Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica," on Saturday last, and finding my own impressions to be in general the reverse of those, I would like to give them public expression through your columns. The rendering has been criticised as spiritless and tame; but it seemed to me to be replete with force, fire and dignity, in spite of a few objectionable details. The first movement was given with its due stateliness, without sacrificing the animated character of the motion; except that for the first few bars the tempo was a trifle too slow, perhaps in order to guard against the tendency to hurry, a frequent tendency of the players rather than of the conductor. The slower tempo at the theme in E-minor mentioned by one of the critics was merely a return to the proper degree of repose after the animation and excitement (quite essential, too,) of the long series of syncopated passages just preceding. And this very effect struck me as one of the most masterly things Mr. Henschel has done. The principal parts of the Funeral March were certainly played about a quarter-part too slow, but in the major portion and in the fugue the tempo was exactly right, and the latter was given with splendid accent and fire. The marvellous ending was made very impressive, and was listened to with breathless attention. In the scherzo the tempo was admirable; a tranquil but buoyant motion was steadily and evenly maintained throughout; the distinct pianissimo of the strings was delightful to listen to, and the crescendos were effectively made, without the least suspicion of hurrying. Unfortunately, however, the trio was taken much slower, probably for the sake of the horns, who did not seem to profit much by it. The very moderate tempo in the

He has not a large voice, but it is a sweet one, and he has the skill and the power to make the most of it. He sings with exquisite taste and expressiveness, and with a refinement of style that is really fascinating in its delicacy and its purity. His intonation is faultless and his phrasing delightful to listen to. He won an instant success and the heartiest applause of his hearers. His singing of Rubinstein's "The Dream" was an artistic bit of work, as beautiful in sentiment as it was chaste in feeling. He also sang a "Gypsy Serenade" by Mr. Henschel, with accompaniment for piano and violin, a quaint and expressive composition, marked in character, and very effective. For the next concert the programme is Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, op. 52; Joachim's "Hungarian Concerto" for violin, to be played by Mr. Listemann; Boccherini's popular Minuet; and Emanuel Bach's Symphony in D.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Successful Rendition of Beethoven's Eroica at Music Hall. Slobe

The fifth concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra series in Music Hall last evening was enjoyed by the inevitable large audience. The public rehearsal on Friday afternoon was also similarly favored; and on that occasion, for the first time also, the management was thoughtful enough to provide programmes. This was a feature which was very deeply appreciated. The programme last evening had for its basis Beethoven's magnificent third symphony, commonly known as the Eroica. This symphony, which was originally written in celebration of Beethoven's ideal hero, Napoleon, and which was thrown away in disgust when that hero forfeited the great composer's respect, contains some of the master's finest work, and is full of passages which call for the very best work of the musician in order to make them presentable. To say that the orchestra last night was fully up to the requirements of the composition is approximately true, although of course they were not beyond criticism. The allegro con brio movement, and in fact most of the rapid tempi, were not hurried along at that breakneck speed which has blurred some of the former presentations. The shadings were fine, and in most instances all the directions in the score were carried out with something more than mere mechanical effort; and, taken altogether, the orchestra has done nothing finer this season than its production of this work. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt was the soloist of the evening, and was very pleasing to most of his hearers. He appeared in a recitative and air from Méhul's "Joseph and his Brethren," the orchestra having previously played the overture to the same. He also sang two songs with the piano, the first of which was Rubinstein's "The Dream," and the second Mr. Henschel's "Gypsy Serenade." The violin obligato incident to the last was given by Mr. Listemann. Mr. Toedt was warmly applauded for his efforts. Cherubini's overture to "Faniska" concluded the programme. The following programme is announced for next Saturday evening:

Overture, scherzo and finale, op. 52.....Schumann.
Concerto in D for violin, op. 11.....Jos. Joachim.
(In the Hungarian style.)
Minuetto in A.....Boccherini.
Sinfonia in D. (1760.).....C. Ph. Emanuel Bach.
Soloist, Mr. Bernard Listemann.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The fifth concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, brought a rather more "severe" programme than its predecessors:

Overture, recitative and air, from "Joseph and his Brethren".....Méhul
Symphony in E-flat (Eroica), No. 3.....Beethoven
Songs—a. "The Dream".....Rubinstein
b. Gypsy Serenade.....Henschel
Overture to "Faniska".....Cherubini

Méhul's music is so very little heard here that the first number had all the charm of novelty. It belongs to the great, classic period of French opera, when the influence of Gluck was still the reigning one (indeed, Méhul was born early enough to be personally acquainted with the great master), when Cherubini was at the height of his fame, and Spontini was just about to conquer public admiration by the brilliancy of his genius. "Joseph" was brought out at the Feydeau, in Paris, in February, 1807, not quite a year before Spontini's "La Vestale." In the very beautiful overture, and the still more beautiful air, we feel at once the noble dignity of Gluck and the finely wrought style of Cherubini—that is, we feel how strongly the combined influence of the two great composers affected Méhul. Yet, even after this analysis, there remains a residuum of original strength and pathos which shows how well Méhul's genius was able to appropriate to himself what was worthy of reproduction in the style of his models, and make it wholly his own. We can only regret that Mr. Henschel gave us the abbreviated version of the overture, which does not give the themes that full development which one looks for in a symphonic composition. We sincerely hope that this is not the last that we shall hear of music of this sort. Beethoven's "Eroica" showed Mr. Henschel's orchestra in the most favorable light it has yet appeared in; barring some few slips, the performance was one which for general smoothness and faithfulness to the score must command sincere admiration. Yet we must confess to being surprised at Mr. Henschel's conception of the work. The first movement was the most to our liking, albeit even here a certain inconstancy of tempo made it difficult to detect exactly what the conductor's intentions really were. The noble theme was announced just right, with fine power and dignity; but the initial tempo was soon lost (through nervous hurrying) and nothing in the rest of the movement corresponded to this vigorous first impression. The second movement (funeral march) was taken at an inconceivably slow rate (albeit Mr. Thomas takes it even slower), and we do not hesitate to say that its whole character was distorted thereby. We can find nothing in the spirit of Beethoven's music—certainly not in the music of his first and second manners—which suggests such an entirely "modern" and over-sentimental, turgid expression of feeling as this movement becomes in Mr. Henschel's hands. To use an expression which, we hope, will be understood, it sounded as if Mr. Henschel were playing not only Beethoven, but Beethoven and all his commentators together. The march-like character of the movement was lost altogether; surely Beethoven, who was especially careful with his captions, did not write the words "marcia funebre" for nothing. With the tempo of the scherzo we have no inclination to quarrel; but the movement was played without spirit, and the slackened pace of the trio made it dreary enough to the listener, however comfortable it may have been to the horn players. The finale sounded much more "Beethovenish," except in the poco andante, which again was taken slow past belief. The term poco andante may be interpreted (according to musical terminology) "a little slow," or (literally) "a little fast," but in no case can it mean "very slow." The concluding presto, on the other hand, was taken at a break-neck pace, which made it simply impossible to play. It seems ridiculous to suppose that any composer in his senses should have written thirty-second notes to go to so rapid a beat. Yet here again it can be said that if Mr. Henschel had only stuck to the tempo of his first two or three measures, all would have been well. To sum up our impressions, it seemed as if Mr. Henschel (in the first movement) meant exactly right, but lost his self-command; in the scherzo we thought we could detect an honest, but overdone, protest against a too rapid tempo. In the slow movements we could see nothing but extravagance and bathos. Cherubini's overture to "Faniska" went capitally. Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, the singer of the evening, sang delightfully, with the truest artistic expression and admirable technique. His voice is too light to be really effective in so large a hall, but his style is fine beyond all criticism. Mr. Henschel's little "Gypsy Serenade" (the very effective violin obligato to which was tastefully played by Mr. Listemann) is a charming composition, in which very telling use is made of the chromatic minor mode. The programme for the sixth concert will be—

Overture, Scherzo and Finale, op. 52.....Schumann
Concerto in D for Violin, op. 11.....Jos. Joachim
(In the Hungarian style.)
Minuetto in A.....Boccherini
Sinfonia in D. (1760.).....C. Ph. Emanuel Bach
The solo player will be Mr. Bernhard Listemann.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Fifth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, at Music Hall, last evening, was attended by a very large audience despite the rain, and the programme proved an eminently enjoyable one throughout, the numbers being as follows:

Overture } (Joseph and his brethren). Méhul
Recitative and air }
Symphony in E-flat. (Eroica) No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Songs, with piano.
a. "The Dream".....Rubinstein
b. "Gypsy Serenade".....Henschel
(Violin obligato, Mr. Listemann.)
Overture, (Faniska).....Cherubini

Lack of space prevents any extended comment upon the performance. The event of the evening was the great success made by Mr. Theodore J. Toedt, tenor, who appeared before a Boston audience for the first time. The sweetness and purity of his voice, throughout its range, his thoroughly artistic method, the intelligence, grace and beauty of his phrasing, his clear and distinct enunciation, and the quiet ease which characterized his stage presence, combined to win the most enthusiastic applause from the audience for each of his efforts, and he was recalled again and again, to bow his thanks after his charming rendering of the no less charming "Gypsy serenade," to which, as well as the Rubinstein selection, Mr. Henschel played the accompaniment. The melodious measures of the Méhul recitative and aria were rendered with equal success by Mr. Toedt, who will be welcomed by Boston audiences whenever he shall appear here. The orchestra has never been heard to better advantage than in this programme, and Mr. Henschel needs no better indorsement of his methods and readings of standard works than the applause spontaneously awarded him by such audiences as attend these concerts, made up as they are of the best elements of the resident musical public.

MR. HENSCHEL'S INTERPRETATION.

To the Editor of the Transcript: After reading several severely adverse criticisms of Mr. Henschel's performance of Beethoven's third symphony, the "Eroica," on Saturday last, and finding my own impressions to be in general the reverse of those, I would like to give them public expression through your columns. The rendering has been criticised as spiritless and tame; but it seemed to me to be replete with force, fire and dignity, in spite of a few objectionable details. The first movement was given with its due stateliness, without sacrificing the animated character of the motion; except that for the first few bars the tempo was a trifle too slow, perhaps in order to guard against the tendency to hurry, a frequent tendency of the players rather than of the conductor. The slower tempo at the theme in E-minor mentioned by one of the critics was merely a return to the proper degree of repose after the animation and excitement (quite essential, too,) of the long series of syncopated passages just preceding. And this very effect struck me as one of the most masterly things Mr. Henschel has done. The principal parts of the Funeral March were certainly played about a quarter-part too slow, but in the major portion and in the fugue the tempo was exactly right, and the latter was given with splendid accent and fire. The marvellous ending was made very impressive, and was listened to with breathless attention. In the scherzo the tempo was admirable; a tranquil but buoyant motion was steadily and evenly maintained throughout; the distinct pianissimo of the strings was delightful to listen to, and the crescendos were effectively made, without the least suspicion of hurrying. Unfortunately, however, the trio was taken much slower, probably for the sake of the horns, who did not seem to profit much by it. The very moderate tempo in the finale produced a decidedly novel effect, but was very acceptable, and it added a dignity and importance to the principal theme and the earlier variations which I had not previously ascribed to them. The poco andante, however, suffered somewhat from being taken at the start as a true andante.

If the performance seemed tedious to many, it must have been that they were not in the right mood for listening to so large a work. I cannot think it was the fault of the conductor, who seemed to show a deep and earnest appreciation of the broad, majestic, heroic character of the great composition, the slow tempo in parts of the march being the only thing that could possibly be spoken of as a misconception on his part. And we cannot thank Mr. Henschel too much for having thus far given us all the repeats, which in Beethoven's symphonic movements are quite essential if the grand proportions of the whole are not to be disturbed. It is earnestly to be hoped that the remaining symphonies of the master will be presented with the same breadth and dignity which characterized the performance of the "Eroica" last week. Trans. News. WILLIAM S. FENOLLOSA.

Saville Musical Notes.

Mr. William S. Fenollosa has been impelled by a sense of his great responsibility as a leader in the musical world to give the public the benefit of his valuable opinion upon the subject of Mr. Henschel's recent rendering of Beethoven's "Eroica" symphony. It will be remembered that the newspaper criticisms censured Mr. Henschel's interpretation of the work with remarkable unanimity, and Mr. Fenollosa rushes into print over his own signature, in Friday's Transcript, to set them right. The signature certainly lends a great weight to the opinions it endorses, for without it the general public would not be cognizant of the deep authority to which it is indebted for the priceless information imparted. In order that Mr. Fenollosa's rebuke of the critics may be made more apparent to our readers, we will state in brief the points upon which they agreed in condemning Mr. Henschel's reading. In the first place they found the first movement taken too slowly at the outset. Mr. Fenollosa agrees that "for the first few bars the tempo was a trifle too slow." They objected that the Funeral March was played at too sluggish a pace. Mr. Fenollosa admits that the "principal parts of the Funeral March were certainly played about a quarter too slow." They complained that the Trio in the Scherzo was also taken at too moderate a tempo. Mr. Fenollosa asserts that "unfortunately, however, the Trio was taken much slower." The critics found the poco andante in the finale given much too lazily. Mr. Fenollosa says: "The poco andante, however, suffered somewhat from being taken at the start as a true andante." As these were the chief errors of which the critics complained, and as Mr. Fenollosa, as will be seen admits them, we cannot see the point of his letter, or how he can claim that a performance which contained, according to his own showing, so much unnecessary and faulty dragging of the tempi, seemed to him "to be replete with force, fire and dignity." After having conceded that the opening bars of the first movement, the Trio of the scherzo, and the poco andante in the finale were taken too slowly, we are puzzled by the contradiction he afterwards makes in saying that "The slow tempo in parts of the march was the only thing that could possibly be spoken of as a misconception on his part." Of the concluding presto, which was hurried along with such senseless rapidity that the players could not bring out the notes set down for them, Mr. Fenollosa discreetly says nothing. It is very evident that he liked the reading, but we cannot see upon what ground he finds it obligatory upon him to say so in print. Besides, he has placed himself somewhat in the position of the injured juror who had the other eleven obstinate jurors against him, except that he admits all of the crucial points in the indictment yet refuses to agree to a verdict of guilty. The pith of the letter after all, apart from its aspect as a very tender and touching puff for Mr. Henschel, would seem to be, that, though the reading was wrong it was right; that, though conceded by Mr. Fenollosa to be erratic in important essentials, he was delighted with it nevertheless; that if the concert seemed tedious to many it was not the conductor's fault; and, finally and most expressive of all, that he wanted to put his influential opinion on record. Now that we have it, we are sure that the critics at least have no reason to find fault. We did not expect so great a favor; but we are glad to know what the young gentleman thinks.

Mr. Georg Henschel's Critics Criticized.

To the Editor of the Herald: It appears to me, as a regular subscriber and constant attendant upon the symphony concerts of the present season, under both the leaders now so prominently before the public, that some facts concerning the concerts, the conductors, the critics and their so-called criticisms should be put plainly before your readers. As the HERALD has shown a disposition to treat these concerts fairly, and a desire to aid in cultivating an honest appreciation of orchestral music, I naturally ask of you the space to present my views, feeling assured that certain facts, known only to a limited number of persons, will assist in the furtherance of the end so much desired, if they are known by all the true friends of music in this city. It is only necessary to recall the condition of orchestral music in Boston three seasons ago to realize how great was the demand for some radical change in the methods pursued to encourage it. This necessity was fully appreciated by Bernhard Listemann, the violinist, and by his personal efforts the first movement was made toward a revival of interest in this class of music. The Harvard association at that time was fast losing its hold upon the public, and its orchestra, under Mr. Zerrahn, was unquestionably getting into an unsatisfactory condition. Little interest was shown in its concerts, the musicians felt secure of retaining the limited amount of work, because there was nothing to enter into competition for it, and an air of mild decay was fast gathering about orchestral performances, so that it became necessary to send to New York for Theodore Thon and his orchestra every time any important musical work was to be presented to our cultured citizens. Realizing the importance of some decided action to recover our former standard as a musical centre, Mr. Listemann gathered around him a number of our best resident musicians, and, in the month of June, 1879, announced the organization of the Boston Philharmonic orchestra, a co-operative association, which gave a series of concerts the following season. They were conducted at a pecuniary loss to the musicians, but, nevertheless, largely by Mr. Listemann's efforts, a second series was given during the early part of the season of 1880-81, also at a financial loss. In these concerts, however, Mr. Listemann achieved commendable results, by arousing an interest in orchestral music in that class of our musical public which had been re-vented from attending the afternoon concerts of the Harvard association, and had from other causes lost all active interest in instrumental music. This element was rallied by a number of gentlemen, who organized the espoused the cause of Mr. Listemann, made him their director, and, by the club system, sustained profitably a series of five orchestral concerts last spring. Mr. Listemann was warmly praised and highly spoken of as a successful conductor, and the two critics of the city press, who were his most hearty and enthusiastic supporters, were equally active in the society's affairs as members. Toward the close of this series of concerts some discussion arose as to the tempi taken by Mr. Listemann, and he committed the unpardonable crime of asserting his own independence and manhood, and assuming the right to conduct the orchestra according to his own ripened judgment, as long as he stood at its head as the appointed leader. The result is well known. Mr. Louis Maas, the pianist, was chosen in his place, and the society organized expressly to support Mr. Listemann stands on record as having not only defrauded him of the name selected by himself for his own orchestra, but of placing him, to those not familiar with his masterly abilities, in the light of a defeated musician who had assumed a position for which he was not qualified.

BOSTON PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY,

On the 30th of March last appeared the quiet, unostentatious announcement by Mr. H. L. Higginson that he intended to establish the Boston symphony orchestra for the season of 1881-82, with Georg Henschel as conductor, and, from that day to this, certain critics, who have been identified with the dishonorable record of the Boston Philharmonic society, have found no words too contemptible to fill columns with, in their criticism of Mr. Higginson's plans and the conductor selected by him to direct the orchestra, of which he is the financial patron to the tune of from $12,000 to $20,000 for a course of 20 concerts.

I respect the impersonality of the press, but it seems to me that, in justice to Mr. Henschel, the general public should know something of the critics who, with so much brazen assurance, have set themselves up as his judge and censor. Had these men kept within the bounds of decency, and expressed their opinions honestly and in a courteous way, there might be some cause to refrain from pointing out the animus of their absurd pretensions. Let me begin with the Gazette critic, who has been the most virulent in his

ABUSE OF MR. HENSCHEL.

As the chairman of the music committee of the Philharmonic society, his tone of criticism seems to imply that he considers the Boston symphony orchestra's concerts those of a rival organization and that he must therefore use his editorial pen to defend his position in the society as a partisan of Mr. Maas. He dare not find fault with the musicians because the same men are members of both orchestras, excepting that the Philharmonic has not so many of them, nor are they the best ones; he therefore wails and moans because Mr. Higginson has furnished Mr. Henschel with eight double-basses, while his society cannot afford to supply Mr. Maas with more than six. As a musician, this critic never rose above the ranks of an orchestral violinist, and he has never shown such marked abilities as a writer upon musical subjects as to make his fame known beyond the circle of his Sunday readers. Neither is he a student of music, his talents having been cultivated more toward literature since his withdrawal from the competition for musical honors. And yet, forsooth, he takes upon himself the right of criticising Mr. Henschel's abilities as though he was his peer. The mischief such a man can do is beyond measure, for his writings have an air of conviction and are calculated to mislead and prejudice the thousands who may read them without having the opportunity to correct their statements by a personal hearing of the work of Mr. Henschel's orchestra.

The critic of our ponderous, but respectable, morning paper has emerged from his retirement in the classic shades of Harvard, and, having buckled on his rusty armor, has renewed the efforts of his old-time experience in the same position. There is no evidence to show that this gentleman has had any special training for the responsible duty of pointing out Mr. Henschel's defects and shortcomings as a conductor, and yet, save that he found the police arrangements for the care of carriage patrons and the air of the hall satisfactory at a recent Saturday evening, there has been little in the concert scheme thus far which has met his entire approbation. This gentleman has not been openly discourteous in his language, but, as the intimation conveyed by some of his remarks is that Mr. Georg Henschel is a born idiot upon musical subjects, his choice English is not altogether commendable. It is a matter of extreme regret that Mr. Higginson did not consult this gentleman before selecting a conductor for his orchestra.

A third critic, who, by training and theoretical knowledge, should be able to furnish the readers of his capably conducted tea-table sheet with upon such concerts as those of the Boston Symphony orchestra, appears to sit down for the deliberate purpose of picking flaws in each programme. Nothing that has been presented thus far has been just right, and, as for Mr. Henschel's ideas in the arrangement of his orchestra and general conduct of these concerts—oh, dear! it's all wrong, and the 2000 or more persons who have really enjoyed each one of the programmes have shown very poor judgment, and deserve condemnation for such a lack of discrimination in musical affairs. His remarks show an amount of self-conceit that is positively appalling, and it is quite evident that, if Mr. Henschel would only "step down and out" and give this aspiring genius an opportunity to distinguish himself, Hans Richter and all his fellow-conductors on the continent would have to take a back seat. And yet this critic is allowed to air his views by the column, and why? His editor-in-chief is one of the pillars of the Philharmonic society.

FAIR AND IMPARTIAL CRITIQUES

Now, without using further space, although it may be said that another less prominent critic is unhappy, because Mr. Henschel declines to accept Mr. N. Lothian's style as that proper for the handling of the baton, let me ask, is it fair, just, honorable or even decent for the managers of these papers to permit such critics to vilify, malign, abuse and ridicule a gentleman of Mr. Henschel's abilities, a born musician, a student of orchestra music for years, an artist, who has appeared before the public, under the leadership of no less than 80 different conductors, in various parts of the world, and who has passed all his time when not professionally engaged in the great musical event of the last decade in watching the methods of the master musicians of Great Britain and the continent; a man who is recognized as a brother musician and peer by the leading composers of Europe, and, withal, a simple, earnest, devoted worker for the highest and best in music at all times? Is it courteous, to say no more, to permit such criticisms upon concerts given under circumstances never known before in the world's history, concerts given to the people of Boston, as an educational institution, through the public spirit and liberality of a single private citizen, and he a man so modest and unassuming that he selects the name, Boston Symphony orchestra, for the organization which, but for his own efforts and generous expenditure, would never have existed?

If the gentlemen of the press desire to organize a clamor against Mr. Henschel, they will find his friends quite ready to meet them. The fact has been established that Mr. Henschel is a success as a conductor. He has had serious difficulties to overcome on account of the indifferent and demoralized condition of his men. He has not yet been able to prevent some of the old fiddlers from doubling their backs like a cobbler, and drawing their bows as they would so many wax-ends; but he has, nevertheless, added new blood, and imparted much of his own enthusiasm, ardor and life into the mechanical old stagers, so that the result has been an agreeable surprise to all of us, and which has never been seen under the baton of any other conductor. As a whole, the orchestra is certainly equal to any one we have ever had in Boston, and, if it is not already by the end of the season, I doubt not it will be the best one of its class in America.

PRO BONO PUBLICO.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The gratifying success which has attended the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra thus far this season has been a full refutation of the plea that there was no live interest in orchestral music in this city, and the placing of such opportunities within the reach of all lovers of music has resulted, as it was hoped it would, in making this scheme an aid in the musical education of the community. The large attendance at the public rehearsals has been notable as indicating an earnest desire to become familiar with the works presented, and the thorough preparatory work done by Mr. Henschel has made these performances equal in point of excellence to many concert presentations of the works in former years. Some further details as to the works selected for the present season can now be stated, and they indicate that the interest in the balance of the series will be quite as great as in those already heard. The following works will, with possibly a few changes, be heard before the end of the season: Beethoven—The six remaining symphonies, overture "Leonore" No. 3, "Egmont," "Triple Concerto" op. 56, "Concerto G Major," for piano. Mozart—"Masonic Funeral Music," "Jupiter" symphony. Mendelssohn—"Reformation" symphony. Schumann—"Symphonies in B flat and C." Brahms—"Symphonies in C minor and D." "Academic" overture. J. O. Grimm—"Symphony in D minor." J. S. Bach—"Tocatta in F." Wagner—"Introduction 3d act 'Meistersinger,'" "Kaiser March," "Wotan's Farewell" ("Walküre"); "Lohengrin's Tale and Farewell." Louis Maas—Concerto for piano. Henschel—Concerto for piano. Saint-Saëns—Concerto for violoncello. Goldmark—Overture "Sakuntala."

(4060.) I have carefully read the various comments on Mr. Henschel's interpretation of Beethoven's "Eroica," some in the main complimentary, others not. From the authoritative manner in which all these writers express themselves, giving their views as facts and not as opinions, I am led to infer that there is some absolute standard, some unanswerable authority, for interpreting such a symphony. If there is, I should like to know where it can be found. I am bewildered by the variety of authoritative statements as to tempi, etc., which ought not to exist if there is a final standard and test. Very many, yes, the most, in the audience enjoyed this symphony as interpreted by Mr. Henschel, but they found, by the light of these writers, that they ought not to have enjoyed it. Will they reveal to us the law and crucial judgment?

ONE OF THE AUDIENCE.

Programme Making.

The art of programme making is little understood in this country, and to the lack of care taken to develop the rare ability to prepare intelligent statements of the musical attractions at public entertainments, much of the general ignorance of the patrons of concerts and other performances must be attributed. The programmes of the Boston, New York and Cincinnati festivals are exceptions to the general rule, and, while they are often too elaborate in their descriptions of the works to be presented, they are safe models to follow. The programmes prepared with so much accuracy during the last few years for the Handel and Haydn oratorio performances are more in the style desired for ordinary concerts, and the brief statements as to the date of former presentations, etc., are often of great interest to the audiences in attendance. The revival of interest in orchestral music seems to call for some further painstaking in the preparation of the programmes for the various symphony concerts of the season. Many new or unfamiliar works are to be presented, full scores of these compositions are very costly, and yet, without a previous examination of such scores, many of their beauties are lost upon the first and often only hearing of them in local concert halls. A brief summary of the characteristics of each number of the programme, the date of the composition or some other definite bit of information as to the composer or the composition, would add largely to the interest of the audience in the performance, and be an educational aid which would produce valuable results. To those made familiar with the announced numbers of any given programme, by presence at or participation in the rehearsals, such statements would come with ease, while the musical student might search weary hours for full scores and correct editions to gain the facts ready at the hand of the limited few having this previous acquaintance with the works. There is, however, one very simple reform which would be an important step in the right direction—that is the abolition of the use of anything but plain English words upon all programmes. If the foreign names to selections have become familiar, they might be tolerated, if a plain translation be added. There is no reason either, founded upon common sense, for printing the distinctive names of the movements of concerts, symphonies, etc., in Italian. True, such terms are familiar to musical students at a glance, but concert audiences are not made up exclusively of musical students. Many concert patrons are left in partial ignorance of desired knowledge from this absurd custom, and there seems no cause for its longer continuance. All the symphony programmes are models, so far as they go, plain type of a fair size being used, rattling paper avoided and no useless expenditure for style indulged in. The additional expense involved by the changes suggested would hardly be such an appreciable one that it could not be saved in some other way, and it is, without doubt, an expense that would do much toward popularizing good music.

The sixth concert by the Boston symphony orchestra will be given at Music Hall this evening, with Bernhard Listemann, violinist, as soloist. It is requested that the audience be seated at 7:55, that the concert may begin promptly. The doors will be closed at 8 o'clock.

Home Journal
BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—Last Saturday evening was "dark and cold and dreary; it rained and the wind was never weary," and what was worse for Mr. Henschel's public, some of the most classical music was to be performed by his Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall. Yet then and there the hall was crowded by one of those fashionable audiences, such as might possibly take a great delight in an Opera Bouffe performance. We do not deny that our friend of the Transcript is quite right in terming it an "oratorio audience." A striking resemblance between the two publics has long been recognized, regret it as one may. Mr. Henschel's programme was one of excellent parts, and he himself appeared to be in one of his most profound moods. The audience seemed to feel it "in their bones" that such was the case; and when we say that an enthusiastic interest was taken in every movement of his baton, especially when some of the movements were exceedingly intricate, we have every intention of according Mr. Henschel the fullest justice. Here is the programme: Overture to "Camacho's Wedding," op. 10, Mendelssohn; Concerto for violin in A (No. 8), op. 47, Spohr; Symphony in D (No. 2), op. 36, Beethoven; Romance for violin in C, op. 48, Saint-Saëns; Introduction to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner. The music of the "Camacho" overture sounded new to us. We only had a faint recollection of having heard it before. Mendelssohn wrote it when he was quite a youth. His pupil, Arthur Sullivan, in his characteristic imitations of Mendelssohn's style of writing, has failed to equal its standard; but it is not a great work. It is the laborious attempt of a prodigy in music to create a sensation. The bizarre effects noticeable in the orchestration are very marked; and there is a conspicuous void of the refined and lofty sentiment of Mendelssohn's later music.

We noticed among the audience at this concert a well-known gentleman whose fond habit it has been for many a year to write and talk about the "affection of piety" in Beethoven's music. While the symphony in D major was being played we watched him with more than an ordinary degree of interest, for the performance was a strange and an exciting one. We will not attempt to interpret the impressions that our conservative friend may have entertained; but it seemed to us as though the music of Beethoven was ringing in his ears for the first time to confuse and startle him. The rant and rave of the Count Johannes, when he once undertook to read in public some of the sublimest chapters of Holy Writ, could not have effected a greater shock than did this latest treatment of the "pious" music of Beethoven. But if the work in the estimation of a few was being desecrated to the level of a novelty, if to others the shock was an æsthetic one, there were no doubt those present who listened to it calmly and who could judge the performance without giving undue weight to its effect upon the feelings. In ex cathedra language, then, the perfection noticeable in the orchestral technique of the rendering was of a grade that we have rarely known surpassed. In the allegro movements there was a buoyancy, promptness of attack, and general accuracy in respect to note-playing, that elicited our warmest approval; but on the other hand we must again complain that Mr. Henschel's individuality asserted itself in a treatment of the music that was unfaithful in spirit and sensuous in its effect. It was a noisy performance, and (making all due allowance for its merit in other directions) if a perfect orchestral machine is ever constructed to play in like manner, we might expect Mr. Henschel to be the very man who would most admire it. And just here we feel in duty bound to again criticize his methods as a conductor. He is accustoming this orchestra to extravagant batonisms that are not simply hideous to the eye, but that almost effect the ear by the rapid vibrating effects of a nervous, vacillating "sweep and swing" of the baton at his command. An orchestra conducted in such a manner will be apt to play spiritedly, but when subjected to the quiet artistic repose of an experienced conductor it will inevitably rebel. It will then, as by habit, seek for the baton at various points and angles somewhere between the floor and the ceiling, and it will fail to find it. The beauty of good conducting is to produce the greatest possible effects with the least conspicuous effort. Mr. Henschel unfortunately fails to do this. He is a good musician, we tire of repeating this, but his lead of an orchestra is contrary to the extreme of the best precedents that we have had occasion to observe both abroad and in this country. We were surprised to see him lead so quietly while Signor Leandro Campanari was performing Spohr's concerto for the violin; but though there was less splurge than usual in his conducting, yet the allegro con brio and allegro molto movements of the work were taken by Mr. Henschel in tempi that must have prevented the soloist from asserting to a full extent any broad idea of the work that he may have entertained. But it seems a pity to refer in terms of discrimination to anything so generally free from flaw, as was Signor Campanari's performance of the Spohr concerto. In it he not only displayed a well schooled mastery of the violin, but musical qualities of a most captivating order. The concerto, properly regarded as belonging to the classic school, was introduced in the programme in order that the audience should at the start become assured of the power of the violinist. He played it with wonderful charm and exquisite feeling. His whole being seemed centered in the work in hand. We have not previously heard such a refined and poetic rendering of the concerto as Signor Campanari contributed, while in breadth of treatment there would have been naught to complain of had the conductor of the orchestra properly sustained him by taking his tempi at a reasonable rate of speed. Later in the evening the Signor made another admirable impression by a pure and beautiful rendering of a romance by Saint Saëns. The concert concluded with a performance of Wagner's overture to the Meisterzinger.

GEORG HENSCHEL
1881-1884

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 26TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE, SCHERZO AND FINALE, op. 52. SCHUMANN.

Andante con moto; Allegro.—Scherzo. (Vivo.)—Allegro molto vivace.—

CONCERTO in D for Violin, op. 11. JOS. JOACHIM.
(In the Hungarian style.)

Allegro un poco maestoso.—Romance. (Andante; Più moto, poco Allegretto; Allegretto.)—
Finale alla Zingara. (Allegro; Presto.)—

MINUETTO in A. BOCCHERINI.

SINFONIA in D. (1760.) C. PH. EMANUEL BACH.

Allegro di molto; Largo; Presto.—

SOLOIST:

MR. BERNHARD LISTEMANN.

THE SIXTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme last night was a heavy one. Four works only were presented, but of these three were of considerable length, and of a rather learned character. A commendable reform was inaugurated in beginning the concert promptly at eight o'clock, and hereafter the doors will be closed at that hour, thus preventing interruption of the first piece, and also allowing the programmes to finish by quarter before ten at the latest. The promised novelties are also beginning to make their appearance on the programmes. We do not mean altogether new pieces of recent composition, but works which are not often heard in our concerts. The Schumann Overture, Scherzo and Finale, which began the programme may be classed as one of these. The Scherzo is not in Schumann's usual vein; it is lighter and dancier than one expects to find in the earnest, broad style of this master. The imitations of the strings, and the bright character of the chief theme are full of grace and symmetry. In this movement there were one or two slips of individual violinists that probably came from an excess of zeal; they attacked the phrases too soon. In the finale we have the massive, intellectual Schumann again. A very strong and impressive theme is worked up from the string quartette, bowing with all imaginable emphasis to a lofty chorale-like climax of full orchestra. The strings in this played as one man, and the only fault was the raspiness of the contrabasses. The great Violin Concerto in D, by Joachim, is probably as difficult as any violin work in existence. Its every phrase is almost a cadenza, and its cadenzas proper bristle with technical intricacies. It is laid out on a large plan and may almost be called a symphony for the violin. But this very intricacy falls flat upon the general public. Its long first movement does not sustain the interest of the musical laity, and even its finale—Alla Zingara—is not of the light gypsy character to which Sarasate and Bazzini have accustomed the public. Few violinists dare attempt the work and to say that Mr. Bernhard Listemann accomplished its execution without a notable flaw, is equivalent to saying that he is a great artist. The cadenzas and flourishes of the first movement were pure in intonation and brilliant in execution; the variation of the Romanza, against the tender and simple original theme in the 'cellos was free from all scratchiness even in the passages of bridge tones; but the last movement suffered through aberrations of time between the soloist and orchestra,—which should have been avoided, even though the fact may be acknowledged that these meteor like scintillations are difficult to keep pace with. With this exception, the performance was a great triumph, and Mr. Listemann's work may be classed as one of the most notable events of the season thus far. Boccherini's well known Minuet was given by the orchestra with much light and shade, (it was even overshadowed,) and with just the stately swing necessary for the graceful old dance. Thoroughly interesting, and in its two last movements even beautiful, was Philip Em. Bach's Sinfonia in D.

Mr. Henschel took the tempo of the first movement somewhat quick for a last century Allegro di Molto. The movements of the old vocabulary have been quickened since those days, and the modern Allegro di Molto is even quicker than the antique Presto. We feel sure that Bach never intended the rapid violin figures which were given. But the short Largo was most clearly phrased and in good time. The final Presto is a neat piece of musicianly work, especially in its quaint finale. The tempi of the concert, with the exceptions noted above, were justly conceived and well carried out. The shading was generally very good, and the concert most enjoyable. The little work which is beginning to arise about this conductor seems to have its origin partly in the fact that injudicious friends have by showering especial advantages upon him, and by inaugurating a craze concerning him, endeavored to make popular acknowledge him a perfect conductor, which he is not, and the result has been that the more sceptical are disposed to deny him qualities which are sure eventually to bring him to that goal.

More novelties are upon the next programme, which is to consist of the Overture, to Magic Flute, Mozart; air, Mittrane, 1686, Rossi; Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 69, Beethoven; ballet music, three numbers, Gluck; air, Abu Hassan, Weber; overture, La dame blanche, Boieldieu.

Sarasate The Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixth Boston Symphony Concert took place at Music Hall last night. The programme was the least interesting of the series thus far. There is not much to be said of the performances either in the way of warm praise or of severe censure. The opening number was Schumann's Overture, Scherzo, and Finale, which was effectively, if somewhat coarsely interpreted. The other orchestral selections were Boccherini's Minuet in A, and Emanuel Bach's Sinfonia in D. The former, which has been made familiar here by Mr. Thomas, was delicately played as a rule, though we could have wished the crescendo and diminuendo in the Trio had had more grace and less of the cut and dried formality that were given them. But this is a minor blemish, and scarcely worth the mentioning. The Sinfonia was very interesting. The first movement is in the style of the overtures of the time, and is full of spirit and remarkable free from the learned stiffness that prevailed in the serious music of the period. The slow movement is very brief, and leads into a sprightly presto bearing a startling resemblance in style to the finales of many of Haydn's symphonies. It certainly may be considered an anticipation of that master. The work was vigorously performed. The soloist was Mr. Bernhard Listemann, who played Joachim's Hungarian Concerto. The work is very long, the first allegro almost tiresomely so, and can never prove wholly interesting, except to musicians and violin virtuosos. It bristles with the most formidable difficulties and calls for exceptional skill on the part of the interpreter. Mr. Listemann met all of the technical requirements fully. It was a wonderful performance from this point of view. With a technique of such extraordinary scope it is, to be regretted that Mr. Listemann does not produce a better tone than he does from the violin. But his powers of execution call for the warmest acknowledgments, and the most unstinted praise. The orchestra was greatly at odds with him throughout, and it was but rarely that it was in time with him in the more brilliant passages. However there was no disaster though there was much confusion. Mr. Listemann was enthusiastically and deservedly applauded for his effort.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

To Mr. Bernhard Listemann belong the honors of last Saturday evening's very pleasant concert, as indeed to him, as leading violinist, must always redound at every concert much credit for the spirit and unity of the first violins, at least. On this occasion he added to the duties of his regular position the responsibility of a soloist, in which capacity he was well received and heartily applauded by both audience and orchestra. Mr. Listemann played that amazingly difficult Hungarian concerto, by Josef Joachim, in D, opus 11. This great and extended work is one which it always seems to us that Paganini might have delighted to play, so peculiar is it in its character, and so full of wildness and strangeness. It begins with an allegro un poco maestoso, and we should be inclined to add molto misterioso, in which the fancy might well have leave to find the spirit of a great wind in desolate forests, and which gradually softens and subsides as the wooden-wind instruments enter the harmony and the solo voice separates itself from the others. The second movement is a romance by itself, that passes from a tender andante to a lighter and quicker, but still poetic measure. The last movement, alla Zingara, hastens on in wilder and wilder strains from an allegro to a presto, which might almost be characterized as indiviolato. In all this range the player's abilities are constantly taxed, and any technique but the best must fail almost at the beginning. That Mr. Listemann bore himself with unflagging vitality, goes without saying, and that he displayed a certainty and celerity of execution which could hardly be exceeded by men of greater name. The involved cadence of the first part and the bewildering figures of the last were superlatively well rendered. Mr. Listemann's nervous temperament, of course, detracts something from the ease and repose of manner which are looked for in a solo player, but it would be ungracious to count this against him. If he could give a fuller and richer tone—the strength of his leading with a gentler voicing—there would be little left to desire. In passages full of technical difficulty, when a player is intent upon his execution, a perfect body of tone is hardly to be expected, but in more sustained moments it is needed. Mr. Listemann almost satisfied us in this respect in the andante of the romance, which he played gently and suggestively. The orchestra was uneven in its part of the concerto. The strong beginning was well given, but the succeeding movements were often weak and hesitating. The composer has so treated the subordinate instruments that long study and complete familiarity are necessary to give his work a clear presentation. There are many passages in which single instruments come creeping in below the main theme without any assistance from a full harmony, and which can only take their exact place and give their true effect when the individual players are absolutely sure of themselves. Mr. Listemann was not to be shaken by these irregularities, however, and so the "effect defective" was rather as of a consonance just missed, than of a dissonance accomplished, while it resulted from no lack of patience or pains on the conductor's part.

The rest of the programme, which was wholly orchestral, was well played. The concert began with Schumann's opus 52, an overture, scherzo and finale. Of these movements, the second, which has a fairy fashion about it that might illustrate the gathering of sprites in the "Midsummer Night's Dream," was fresh and bright, and the third—allegro molto vivace—was marked with great, though not unpleasant, positiveness of rhythm, and ended with finely jubilant sonority. The favorite Boccherini minuet, so delightful in the turning of its simple and oft-repeated phrase that one is always sorry when it stops, occupied the third place, and was dainty and lucid in reading. A company of Italians would probably have given it a more elastic and more song-like swing, but it was very good as it was. The last number was C. Ph. Emanuel Bach's sinfonia in D, a melodious and enjoyable work, which seemed to us to receive less than proper favor from the audience. Written as what would generally be called an overture,—indeed, sinfonia is still the Italian name for overture,—it subdivides into three connected movements, an allegro di molto, a largo, and a concluding presto. The allegro is full and free in expression, and among its earlier phrases has one figure which rises rapidly upon itself, so to speak, until an admirable little climax is reached; in the same movement the bassoon contributes many pleasant effects as it wanders across the web of the harmony with quaint, old-fashioned little figurings. The largo, which is of quite a religious cast, was sweetly played throughout, the wooden wind and the lower strings being noticeably delicate and neat, and the short, quick finale was carried through with animation and good temper.

If the selections have been made with intent to show what considerable and various effects may be produced without recourse to the heavier brass instruments, they could hardly have been better chosen,—a curious and interesting coincidence. And when, as in the last movements of the Schumann and Bach numbers, the trumpets and trombones entered fully, after long silences or great subordination, the tone-coloring they added gave, by contrast, an admirable brilliance to the general effect. Whether this unusual circumstance had anything to do with it or not we cannot say, but it must have been apparent to all that there was more softness in the strings than usual, while there was no less unanimity, as was plain, in the instances we have already cited, and in the first Schumann movement, where any roughness in the unsupported strings would have been immediately felt.

The programme of next week's concert will include Beethoven's fourth symphony, and the overtures to the "Magic Flute" and the "White Lady." Miss Emily Winant will sing an air from Rossi and one from Weber. Particular attention is called to the fact that hereafter no time of grace will be accorded to the tardy. The concerts will begin promptly at eight o'clock, and the doors will be closed then instead of at ten minutes past eight. It therefore behooves the audience to adjust their movements to this change, which is made in order that all persons who wish to leave the city by ten o'clock trains may be able to hear the whole programme.

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. The programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday evening comprised the Overture, Scherzo and Finale, opus 52 of Schumann, Joachim's Concerto in D for violin, opus 11, Boccherini's minuet in A, and Bach's symphony in D. With the exception of the minuet, the selections were long and heavy, but all were interesting and important. Schumann's work was in general played in excellent style, and the only fault that could well be found with its performance was an occasional and momentary irregularity in the strings, which confused some of the lighter passages in the first part, and considerably obscured their gracefulness and beauty. The contrast in motive between the Scherzo and Finale was carefully and sympathetically marked, the playing was vigorous, intellectual and unisonous, and in the deep and emotional chord-like effects of the strings the orchestra showed some of the best work it has yet done. The concerto for the violin was performed by Mr. Bernhard Listemann, the soloist of the evening, supported by the orchestra. This extremely difficult work was well interpreted—indeed, quite perfectly so, when it is considered that it is a composition whose difficulties of execution are so great that neither composer nor performer could have strength left after presenting or surmounting its manipulative exactions to consider the added grace of sentiment. It is a cold-blooded composition, and chiefly of interest to violin virtuosi, who can appreciate its performance with only the light of professional enthusiasm to inspire them. To the public, and to a considerable degree, also, musicians generally, it appears dry and uninteresting. It is tediously long, also, requiring more than half an hour in its performance, which is quite too long a time to look with pleasure at any sort of physical skill. Mr. Listemann's playing, however, was very brilliant, just and true, although there now and then crept into his tones a note which was harsh and displeasing. The orchestra, in the interjected accompaniment which fell to it, was not always in time with the soloist, although it must be admitted that the rapid and intricate trippings of the Finale are difficult to keep up with. Boccherini's beautiful minuet was played with great delicacy and grace, although those who are familiar with the skillful diminuendo with which Mr. Thomas's orchestra is accustomed to terminate it must have felt that something was lacking in the present instance. The symphony of Bach was well given, the bright spirit of the first movement and the earnest beauty of the Largo being especially satisfactory in their careful and free description.

Mr. Henschel's manner of conducting on Saturday night seemed to show that he has very nearly attained the golden mean between excessive coldness and too-ardent fire. His style was more reserved than it has before appeared, yet it seemed to retain all of the real magnetism which his system holds, and to give it a proper and sufficient exercise. One was not attracted to the movements of the conductor at the expense of observation of the orchestra, and when one can sit through a performance in this mood, and go away without noticing just how the musicians are controlled, yet feeling that they have been under thorough discipline, it is evident that the conductor has neither stepped beyond his proper sphere nor been lax in his work, and that he has almost exactly brought into equipoise his duties and those of the players. That these concerts are improving is not to be doubted. Indeed, considering the briefness of time in which the orchestra has played together and their lack of acquaintance with each other and their leader, it is fair matter for surprise that they have attained their present success. Much still remains to be done, but much may also be expected in view of triumphs already attained.

The next concert will offer the following programme: Overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; air, "Mitrane," 1686, Rossi; Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's "Suites de danses célèbres," Gluck; air, "Abu Hassan," Weber; overture, "La dame blanche," Boieldieu. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist on this occasion.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Soloist, Bernhard Listemann, Gets an Enthusiastic Reception.

The programme chosen for the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, included: Overture, Scherzo and finale, op. 52, Schumann; concerto in D for violin, op. 11, Joseph Joachim (in the Hungarian style); Minuetto in A, Boccherini; Sinfonia in D (1760), C. Ph. Emanuel Bach. Mr. Bernhard Listemann was the soloist of the evening. The nucleus of the concert was, of course, the violin concerto. Mr. Listemann's method and style are well known to the musical public. The difficult passages of his number last evening were executed with his accustomed vigor and precision. He was received with a warmth and enthusiasm which showed how great a favorite he is among the lovers of the divine art in this city. The chief disadvantage under which this composition labors is its extreme length, but those of the audience who had fallen asleep during the "allegro un poco maestoso" and the "andante, più moto, poco allegretto and allegretto" movements were thoroughly aroused by the vigorous and dashing playing of the Finale. Among the other numbers of the evening none were more fittingly and delicately rendered and thoroughly appreciated than Boccherini's minuetto in A, a pleasing bit of composition, exceedingly well played. Schumann's overture, which opened the programme, was done well, with one exception. The violins scraped harshly and disagreeably whenever any emphasis was required, as they always have done. This is indeed the chief fault of the orchestra, and it is one which it would seem among so fine a body of musicians ought to be overcome. We might even spare a shade or two of the emphasis and precision which they secure so well, if we could gain in smoothness thereby. The symphony does not call for any special mention. Mr. Henschel was peculiarly happy in the tempo, which is a great achievement for him, and everybody went away pleased. Next Saturday Miss Emily Winant appears as soloist, and the following programme will be presented:

Overture, "Magic Flute".....Mozart
Air, Mitrane, 1686.....Rossi
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....Beethoven
Ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses célèbres.....Gluck Danse des Athlètes—Elena e Paride; Iphigénie en Aulide. Menuet—Iphigénie en Aulide. Passacaille—Elena e Paride; Iphigénie en Aulide.
Air, "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Overture, "La Dame Blanche".....Boieldieu

This is a programme of rare excellence, and there is little doubt that Mr. Henschel is equal to it.

TIGHT BINDING

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sixth concert drew the usual large audience last Saturday evening. The programme was the most "severe" of the season, so far. There was no symphony, properly so called, but three of the four numbers on the programme were compositions comprising three movements each, and two of them were thoroughly symphonic in character. The list was—

Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52.....Schumann
Concerto in the Hungarian style, in D, for violin, Op. 11.....Joachim
Minuetto in A.....Boccherini
Sinfonia in D.....C. Ph. Emanuel Bach

Schumann's Opus 52, which only needs the addition of a slow movement to enable it to pass for a short symphony, has not been heard here for some years. It is one of the composer's thoroughly genial works, reminding one, by the character of its themes and the manner in which they are treated, more of some of Schumann's larger pianoforte works than of any of his orchestral compositions we can call to mind. The last two movements especially recall certain parts of the "Kreisleriana" and the "Humoreske" very vividly. In the overture and the Scherzo the orchestra was by no means at its best; the attack was often uncertain and the general rhythmic effect marred by a want of simultaneous accent on the part of all the players. But the orchestra turned over a new leaf in the Finale, which was played with both fire and precision. Indeed, there was a peculiar quality in the performance of this movement which seems to us to call for especial notice. A strong and distinctly marked musical idea, well conceived and as well realized, is not so common a phenomenon that one feels like passing it by unnoticed when one has the good luck to fall in with it. The persistent energy with which Mr. Henschel (and his orchestra) attacked, we had almost said hammered and battered away at the strongly-accented theme of this movement showed a singularly keen appreciation of a very Schumannesque trait in the music—a trait which Schumann has rarely exhibited more prominently than just here. A musical theme or figure seems at times to have so wholly gained possession of Schumann's mind as to partake of the nature of a fixed idea; this fixed idea, instead of suggesting musical development, often seems as if it stood before the composer as an obstacle to musical development, as an obstacle which must be overcome at all costs; so Schumann pounds and hammers away at it in the grimest earnest, as if he would force the recalcitrant theme to do his bidding by dint of sheer will; we constantly feel a sense of effort and struggle on the part of the composer, and when, at last, the victory is won, nothing more remains for him to do; the movement is completed. Joachim's famous "Hungarian" concerto has, we believe, never been played entire here before. Mr. Listemann once played the first movement at a Harvard concert, some years ago, but the whole concerto has generally been looked upon as a task beyond the endurance of both performer and audience. True, much can be said against the concerto; its great and unnecessary length, the moody gloominess, and wild, fitful savagery of its themes, its almost constantly sombre orchestral coloring, and its well-nigh unparalleled difficulty are serious considerations, which both violinists and conductors incline to estimate at their full value. Yet, in spite of these drawbacks, the work is one which commands both sincere respect and admiration. With the possible exception of the Max Bruch concerto, we know of no work of its class since Mendelssohn's E-minor concerto which can begin to be ranked with it. (The Brahms concerto we do not yet know, so we cannot bring it forward as an example.) Notwithstanding the difficulties upon difficulties with which the leading part bristles, the work cannot for a moment be called a mere show piece. Joachim evidently had nothing but the highest musical aim in view, and he has followed his ideal with great earnestness of purpose. The work is full of beauties of a very high order; the themes have character, and the construction is often masterly. A truly musical spirit pervades the whole work. The orchestral introduction is really grandiose, and the leading violin part very rarely seems an unwelcome interloper, as it too often does in modern concertos, in which one is impelled to feel that the composer would far rather have left it out, and let the orchestra do its work undisturbed. The very full scoring, however, will always be considered a drawback to the effectiveness of the leading part, unless the latter be played by an artist who can draw such a volume of tone from his instrument as Wilhelmj, or Joachim himself can. Mr. Listemann's performance was a positive triumph, and was rewarded, as it should have been, by a perfect ovation. To say that he made light of all the terrible difficulties of his part would imply that a man of Mr. Listemann's fierce earnestness of purpose could be conceived of as making light of anything. But he faced them manfully and overcame them with unerring certainty and apparent ease. We can say heartily that neither Mr. Listemann's astounding technique, nor his sustained power and energetic vigor of style, have ever shown themselves in quite so admirable a light. Mr. Listemann plays with that fiery earnestness which is born of enthusiasm and conviction; his power of commanding the listener's attention and interest through so long and intricate a composition bespeaks not only intrinsic personal magnetism, but a thorough and devoted intellectual study of his task. He has one besetting artistic fault, and one misfortune; his fault is a vicious tendency to crowd strong accents to an extent which ends in making them unrecognizable as accents at all; to borrow a simile from printing, all his phrases, nay, almost every note in every phrase, is in large capitals. This perpetual emphasis becomes monotonous after a while, and is foiled of its purpose. His misfortune is a thin and unpleasant quality of tone, except in cantilena passages on the higher strings; yet this shortcoming is calculated to prejudice his playing far less in the eyes of musicians than of the general public, with whom the purely sensuous side of music is a matter of more preponderant importance. But

DRAMATIC AND MUSICAL

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT. The programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday evening comprised the Overture, Scherzo and Finale, opus 52 of Schumann, Joachim's Concerto in D for violin, opus 11, Boccherini's minuet in A, and Bach's symphony in D. With the exception of the minuet, the selections were long and heavy, but all were interesting and important. Schumann's work was in general played in excellent style, and the only fault that could well be found with its performance was an occasional and momentary irregularity in the strings, which confused some of the lighter passages in the first part, and considerably obscured their gracefulness and beauty. The contrast in motive between the scherzo and finale was carefully and sympathetically marked, the playing was vigorous, intellectual and unisonous, and in the deep and emotional chord-like effects of the strings the orchestra showed some of the best work it has yet done. The concerto for the violin was performed by Mr. Bernhard Listemann, the soloist of the evening, supported by the orchestra. This extremely difficult work was well interpreted—indeed, quite perfectly so, when it is considered that it is a composition whose difficulties of execution are so great that neither composer nor performer could have strength left after presenting or surmounting its manipulative exactions to consider the added grace of sentiment. It is a cold-blooded composition, and chiefly of interest to violin virtuosos, who can appreciate its performance with only the light of professional enthusiasm to inspire them. To the public, and to a considerable degree, also, musicians generally, it appears dry and uninteresting. It is tediously long, also, requiring more than half an hour in its performance, which is quite too long a time to look with pleasure at any sort of physical skill. Mr. Listemann's playing, however, was very brilliant, just and true, although there now and then crept into his tones a note which was harsh and displeasing. The orchestra, in the interjected accompaniment which fell to it, was not always in time with the soloist, although it must be admitted that the rapid and intricate trippings of the finale are difficult to keep up with. Boccherini's beautiful minuet was played with great delicacy and grace, although those who are familiar with the skillful diminuendo with which Mr. Thomas's orchestra is accustomed to terminate it must have felt that something was lacking in the present instance. The symphony of Bach was well given, the bright spirit of the first movement and the earnest beauty of the Largo being especially satisfactory in their careful and free description.

Mr. Henschel's manner of conducting on Saturday night seemed to show that he has very nearly attained the golden mean between excessive coldness and too-ardent fire. His style was more reserved than it has before appeared, yet it seemed to retain all of the real magnetism which his system holds, and to give it a proper and sufficient exercise. One was not attracted to the movements of the conductor at the expense of observation of the orchestra, and when one can sit through a performance in this mood, and go away without noticing just how the musicians are controlled, yet feeling that they have been under thorough discipline, it is evident that the conductor has neither stepped beyond his proper sphere nor been lax in his work, and that he has almost exactly brought into equipoise his duties and those of the players. That these concerts are improving is not to be doubted. Indeed, considering the briefness of time in which the orchestra has played together and their lack of acquaintance with each other and their leader, it is fair matter for surprise that they have attained their present success. Much still remains to be done, but much may also be expected in view of triumphs already attained.

The next concert will offer the following programme: Overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; air, "Mitrane," 1686, Rossi; Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's "Suites de danses célèbres," Gluck; air, "Abu Hassan," Weber; overture, "La dame blanche," Boieldieu. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist on this occasion.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Soloist, Bernhard Listemann, Gets an Enthusiastic Reception.

The programme chosen for the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, included: Overture, Scherzo and finale, op. 52, Schumann; concerto in D for violin, op. 11, Joseph Joachim (in the Hungarian style); Minuetto in A, Boccherini; Sinfonia in D (1760), C. Ph. Emanuel Bach. Mr. Bernhard Listemann was the soloist of the evening. The nucleus of the concert was, of course, the violin concerto. Mr. Listemann's method and style are well known to the musical public. The difficult passages of his number last evening were executed with his accustomed vigor and precision. He was received with a warmth and enthusiasm which showed how great a favorite he is among the lovers of the divine art in this city. The chief disadvantage under which this composition labors is its extreme length, but those of the audience who had fallen asleep during the "allegro un poco maestoso" and the "andante, più moto, poco allegretto and allegretto" movements were thoroughly aroused by the vigorous and dashing playing of the finale. Among the other numbers of the evening none were more fittingly and delicately rendered and thoroughly appreciated than Boccherini's minuetto in A, a pleasing bit of composition, exceedingly well played. Schumann's overture, which opened the programme, was done well, with one exception. The violins scraped harshly and disagreeably whenever any emphasis was required, as they always have done. This is indeed the chief fault of the orchestra, and it is one which it would seem among so fine a body of musicians ought to be overcome. We might even spare a shade or two of the emphasis and precision which they secure so well, if we could gain in smoothness thereby. The symphony does not call for any special mention. Mr. Henschel was peculiarly happy in the tempo, which is a great achievement for him, and everybody went away pleased. Next Saturday Miss Emily Winant appears as soloist, and the following programme will be presented:

Overture, "Magic Flute".....Mozart
Air, Mitrane, 1686.....Rossi
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....Beethoven
Ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses célèbres.....Gluck Danse des Athlètes—Elena e Paride; Iphigénie en Aulide. Menuet—Iphigénie en Aulide.
Passacaille—Elena e Paride; Iphigénie en Aulide.

Air, "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Overture, "La Dame Blanche".....Boieldieu

This is a programme of rare excellence, and there is little doubt that Mr. Henschel is equal to it.

TIGHT BINDING

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sixth concert drew the usual large audience last Saturday evening. The programme was the most "severe" of the season, so far. There was no symphony, properly so called, but three of the four numbers on the programme were compositions comprising three movements each, and two of them were thoroughly symphonic in character. The list was—

Overture, Scherzo and Finale, Op. 52.....Schumann
Concerto in the Hungarian style, in D, for violin, Op. 11.....Joachim
Minuetto in A.....Boccherini
Sinfonia in D.....C. Ph. Emanuel Bach

Schumann's Opus 52, which only needs the addition of a slow movement to enable it to pass for a short symphony, has not been heard here for some years. It is one of the composer's thoroughly genial works, reminding one, by the character of its themes and the manner in which they are treated, more of some of Schumann's larger pianoforte works than of any of his orchestral compositions we can call to mind. The last two movements especially recall certain parts of the "Kreisleriana" and the "Humoreske" very vividly. In the overture and the scherzo the orchestra was by no means at its best; the attack was often uncertain and the general rhythmic effect marred by a want of simultaneous accent on the part of all the players. But the orchestra turned over a new leaf in the finale, which was played with both fire and precision. Indeed, there was a peculiar quality in the performance of this movement which seems to us to call for especial notice. A strong and distinctly marked musical idea, well conceived and as well realized, is not so common a phenomenon that one feels like passing it by unnoticed when one has the good luck to fall in with it. The persistent energy with which Mr. Henschel (and his orchestra) attacked, we had almost said hammered and battered away at the strongly-accented theme of this movement showed a singularly keen appreciation of a very Schumannesque trait in the music—a trait which Schumann has rarely exhibited more prominently than just here. A musical theme or figure seems at times to have so wholly gained possession of Schumann's mind as to partake of the nature of a fixed idea; this fixed idea, instead of suggesting musical development, often seems as if it stood before the composer as an obstacle to musical development, as an obstacle which must be overcome at all costs; so Schumann pounds and hammers away at it in the grimmest earnest, as if he would force the recalcitrant theme to do his bidding by dint of sheer will; we constantly feel a sense of effort and struggle on the part of the composer, and when, at last, the victory is won, nothing more remains for him to do; the movement is completed. Joachim's famous "Hungarian" concerto has, we believe, never been played entire here before. Mr. Listemann once played the first movement at a Harvard concert, some years ago, but the whole concerto has generally been looked upon as a task beyond the endurance of both performer and audience. True, much can be said against the concerto; its great and unnecessary length, the moody gloominess, and wild, fitful savagery of its themes, its almost constantly sombre orchestral coloring, and its well-nigh unparalleled difficulty are serious considerations, which both violinists and conductors incline to estimate at their full value. Yet, in spite of these drawbacks, the work is one which commands both sincere respect and admiration. With the possible exception of the Max Bruch concerto, we know of no work of its class since Mendelssohn's E-minor concerto which can begin to be ranked with it. (The Brahms concerto we do not yet know, so we cannot bring it forward as an example.) Notwithstanding the difficulties upon difficulties with which the leading part bristles, the work cannot for a moment be called a mere show piece. Joachim evidently had nothing but the highest musical aim in view, and he has followed his ideal with great earnestness of purpose. The work is full of beauties of a very high order; the themes have character, and the construction is often masterly. A truly musical spirit pervades the whole work. The orchestral introduction is really grandiose, and the leading violin part very rarely seems an unwelcome interloper, as it too often does in modern concertos, in which one is impelled to feel that the composer would far rather have left it out, and let the orchestra do its work undisturbed. The very full scoring, however, will always be considered a drawback to the effectiveness of the leading part, unless the latter be played by an artist who can draw such a volume of tone from his instrument as Wilhelmj, or Joachim himself can. Mr. Listemann's performance was a positive triumph, and was rewarded, as it should have been, by a perfect ovation. To say that he made light of all the terrible difficulties of his part would imply that a man of Mr. Listemann's fierce earnestness of purpose could be conceived of as making light of anything. But he faced them manfully and overcame them with unerring certainty and apparent ease. We can say heartily that neither Mr. Listemann's astounding technique, nor his sustained power and energetic vigor of style, have ever shown themselves in quite so admirable a light. Mr. Listemann plays with that fiery earnestness which is born of enthusiasm and conviction; his power of commanding the listener's attention and interest through so long and intricate a composition bespeaks not only intrinsic personal magnetism, but a thorough and devoted intellectual study of his task. He has one besetting artistic fault, and one misfortune: his fault is a vicious tendency to crowd strong accents to an extent which ends in making them unrecognizable as accents at all; to borrow a simile from printing, all his phrases, nay, almost every note in every phrase, is in large capitals. This perpetual emphasis becomes monotonous after a while, and is foiled of its purpose. His misfortune is a thin and unpleasant quality of tone, except in cantilena passages on the higher strings; yet this shortcoming is calculated to prejudice his playing far less in the eyes of musicians than of the general public, with whom the purely sensuous side of music is a matter of more preponderant importance. But

In spite of these defects, his performance of Joachim's concerto must be called phenomenal; such manifestations of artistic power are "events" in any musical season. Mr. Henschel's orchestra performed the very difficult task of accompanying the concerto, if not to perfection, far better than was reasonably to have been expected, considering the small opportunity for rehearsal they had had. The tutti passages were superbly played. Boccherini's familiar minuet was charmingly given, and the playing of the Bach sinfonia was equally delightful. This pleasing little work, which was first introduced to our public some twenty years ago by Mr. Zerrahn, at the old Philharmonic concerts would astonish us by the modern melodiousness of its themes, and the occasional richness of its orchestral coloring, did we not reflect that the composer was a contemporary of Gluck, and the immediate precursor of Haydn. At the next concert the programme will be:

Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Air from "Mitrane".....Rossi
Symphony in B-flat, No. 4, Op. 60.....Beethoven
Ballet music. (No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses célèbres).....Gluck
Air from "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Overture to "La dame blanche".....Boieldieu
Miss Emily Winant will be the singer.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The sixth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening, before the customary brilliant and appreciative audience. Of the numbers on the programme, Josef Joachim's Hungarian Concerto in D, Op. 11, attracted the greatest attention, and served to introduce Mr. Bernard Listemann as the violin soloist. The composition is one which fairly bristles with the most marvellous technical difficulties, the abilities of the player are taxed to their utmost at almost every point, and a less skilful and thorough musician would have succumbed at the outset. Mr. Listemann's playing, however, calls for our hearty and unstinted praise, but the work, allow us to remark here, is one which will not find pronounced favor with the average listener, but to the student will ever be welcomed as a treat, although its extreme length will forbid a presentation on the ordinary programmes. The remainder of the selections included Schumann's Overture, scherzo and finale, op 52; Boccherini's minuet in A, and Bach's Sinfonia in D, all played with that artistic elegance which Mr. Henschel has inspired his band and which has been made such a prominent and enjoyable feature at all of the Boston Symphony Concerts. The next concert will take place in Music Hall on Saturday evening with the following programme: Overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; air, "Mitrane," 1686, Rossi; Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's "Suites de danses célèbres," Gluck; air, "Abu Hassan," Weber; overture, "La dame Blanche," Boieldieu. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist on this occasion.

FASHIONABLE CONCERT-GOERS.

We surmise that it is not strictly an art motive which brings the general public to classical concerts. It has often seemed to us that the musical interest at large generally tends in the direction of a single focus, and that it is an indication of the whims and caprices of fashion rather than the evidence of any wide spread understanding of classical music. With an extensive reputation for culture, now, more than ever before, and for enterprise in much that has to do with culture, Boston has long been noted for its patronization of music and the fine arts. But we sometimes doubt whether there exists here, more than in New York, or Cincinnati, or Chicago, a large number of the class who are, so to speak, sincere patrons of classical concerts.

We are not unmindful of the encouraging interest that is being taken in the Higginson concerts, or in the good work of the Philharmonic society, when we say that no musical organization seems destined to flourish for any length of time in this city having for its object the production of the purest and highest forms of instrumental music. Everything in this direction in the past has been subjected to the tyranny of fashion. On the average local musical taste is sufficiently far advanced to appreciate a good comic opera, or a respectable order of dance music. The half-professionals in every city seem bound to run through everything that bears the slightest semblance to musical organization; and this class of haut ton amateurs remind one of the habitual reader of novels who is never at rest until the last new novel is in his hands. Music, though it is making a wonderful progress in this country, has yet to develop that high standard of concert audiences which, for many eyes, has been the crowning element of German civilization. Until the classical concert is no longer patronized simply as a fashionable pastime, the art can make no such progress with us as shall adequately satisfy the demands of artist and musician. At present it is the complacency and delight of listening to music of the higher sort that is often mistaken for a higher appreciation of it. We admit that to fully appreciate the nature of a Bach fugue or a Beethoven symphony, or to derive ideal enjoyment from the performance of classical music, requires not only the power of concentrated attention, but also a special education which of course cannot be expected of any large public, either here or in Germany. But what may be objected to is the hypocrisy displayed by the average concert patron. The "divine, enchanting ravishment" which the cultivated musician feels while listening to music cannot be appreciated by the mere hypocrite in art who is naturally incapacitated for the enjoyment of it. The fashionable concert goer is one of the greatest bugbears of the day. He would take no interest in art did it not afford him the means of airing his own sapience and stilted wisdom. It would be impossible to tell how much of the natural sweetness and beauty of music is wasted on this aristocrat of the concert room. Certain it is that classical music often affects him as melancholily as would the dismal "drone of a Lancashire bagpipe." In thus stigmatizing the musical pretender who of all others is the abomination of the true and conscientious lovers of music, we in no way reflect upon those who honestly enjoy a classical work without, in the highest sense, appreciating it; but there are still but a comparatively small number belonging to this class.

THE SIXTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

—We remember a time when such a concert as was given in Music Hall last Saturday evening could safely have been termed a very stupid affair. It was one of the most uninteresting symphony concerts ever given in Boston. This is the simple truth in regard to it. The first selection in the badly arranged programme was Schumann's overture, scherzo, op. 52. Schumann was crazy when he wrote the work, and shortly after completing it he was compelled to go to the insane hospital in Bonn, his place of residence. It affords but the feeblest suggestions of the great composer's genius. Its thematic net-work in certain widely-separated parts is clear and interesting enough to admit of a passing compliment; but it is introduced in scanty proportions, and nowhere does it appear to have been profoundly prepared and elaborated. The Scherzo is a neat, delicate and pretty specimen of musical conception; but to discover an effeminate quality of prettiness in any of Schumann's music is to have one's attention called to a notable exception. The performance of the work had nothing to commend it to special mention; it was acceptably accurate in respect to mere note playing; though it lacked the refinement of style that should undoubtedly have been accorded it. Then followed on the programme Jos. Joachim's concerto in D, for violin. It was the first time we had heard the work, and we are in no haste to pass our opinion upon it other than it appeared a marvellously well scored production, replete with themes that are carefully developed in the Hungarian style. But for all this it was impossible at a single hearing to find the concerto an attractive one. Mr. Listemann performed it in a manner that excited an unqualified admiration of his ability as an executant. He seemed to know no difficulty, even when his execution was being submitted to the severest tests imaginable. The clearness and fluency of his performance were not its only merits. His expression was praiseworthy for its intensity and breadth, and the only blemish in the effect of his playing was manifestly due to the weak and unmusical tone of a violin that seemed altogether too poor an instrument to be in the hands of so able a master. He was enthusiastically applauded. The final number of the programme was a Sinfonia in D, composed in 1760, by C. Ph. Emanuel Bach. It would no doubt have been regarded as an "old fogey" contrapuntist in the time in which it was written, and despite the science displayed in the working-out of his Sinfonia, it is an extremely unattractive work. The concert this evening promises to be a delightful one; at all events a decided improvement on the one we have referred to. This is the programme: Overture (Magic Flute), Mozart; Air (Mitrane, 1686), Rossi; Symphony in B flat, No. 4, Op. 60, Beethoven, Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—Allegro vivace; Un poco meno Allegro; Allegro vivace.—Allegro ma non troppo; Ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses célèbres), Gluck, Danse des Athlètes (Elena e Paride; Iphigénie en Aulide), Menuet (Iphigénie en Aulide), Passacaille (Elena e Paride; Iphigénie en Aulide); Air (Abu Hassan), Weber; Overture (La dame blanche), Boieldieu. Soloist, Miss Emily Winant.

Home Journal

FASHIONABLE CONCERT-GOERS.

We surmise that it is not strictly an art motive which brings the general public to classical concerts. It has often seemed to us that the musical interest at large generally tends in the direction of a single focus, and that it is an indication of the whims and caprices of fashion rather than the evidence of any wide spread understanding of classical music. With an extensive reputation for culture, now, more than ever before, and for enterprise in much that has to do with culture, Boston has long been noted for its patronization of music and the fine arts. But we sometimes doubt whether there exists here, more than in New York, or Cincinnati, or Chicago, a large number of the class who are, so to speak, sincere patrons of classical concerts.

We are not unmindful of the encouraging interest that is being taken in the Higginson concerts, or in the good work of the Philharmonic society, when we say that no musical organization seems destined to flourish for any length of time in this city having for its object the production of the purest and highest forms of instrumental music. Everything in this direction in the past has been subjected to the tyranny of fashion. On the average local musical taste is sufficiently far advanced to appreciate a good comic opera, or a respectable order of dance music. The half-professionals in every city seem bound to run through everything that bears the slightest semblance to musical organization; and this class of haut ton amateurs remind one of the habitual reader of novels who is never at rest until the last new novel is in his hands. Music, though it is making a wonderful progress in this country, has yet to develop that high standard of concert audiences which, for many eyes, has been the crowning element of German civilization. Until the classical concert is no longer patronized simply as a fashionable pastime, the art can make no such progress with us as shall adequately satisfy the demands of artist and musician. At present it is the complacency and delight of listening to music of the higher sort that is often mistaken for a higher appreciation of it. We admit that to fully appreciate the nature of a Bach fugue or a Beethoven symphony, or to derive ideal enjoyment from the performance of classical music, requires not only the power of concentrated attention, but also a special education which of course cannot be expected of any large public, either here or in Germany. But what may be objected to is the hypocrisy displayed by the average concert patron. The "divine, enchanting ravishment" which the cultivated musician feels while listening to music cannot be appreciated by the mere hypocrite in art who is naturally incapacitated for the enjoyment of it. The fashionable concert goer is one of the greatest bugbears of the day. He would take no interest in art did it not afford him the means of airing his own sapience and stilted wisdom. It would be impossible to tell how much of the natural sweetness and beauty of music is wasted on this aristocrat of the concert room. Certain it is that classical music often affects him as melancholily as would the dismal "drone of a Lancashire bagpipe." In thus stigmatizing the musical pretender who of all others is the abomination of the true and conscientious lovers of music, we in no way reflect upon those who honestly enjoy a classical work without, in the highest sense, appreciating it; but there are still but a comparatively small number belonging to this class.

In spite of these defects, his performance of Joachim's concerto must be called phenomenal; such manifestations of artistic power are "events" in any musical season. Mr. Henschel's orchestra performed the very difficult task of accompanying the concerto, if not to perfection, far better than was reasonably to have been expected, considering the small opportunity for rehearsal they had had. The tutti passages were superbly played. Boccherini's familiar minuet was charmingly given, and the playing of the Bach sinfonia was equally delightful. This pleasing little work, which was first introduced to our public some twenty years ago by Mr. Zerrahn, at the old Philharmonic concerts would astonish us by the modern melodiousness of its themes, and the occasional richness of its orchestral coloring, did we not reflect that the composer was a contemporary of Gluck, and the immediate precursor of Haydn. At the next concert the programme will be:

Overture to "The Magic Flute".....Mozart
Air, from "Mitrane".....Rossi
Symphony in B-flat, No. 4, Op. 60.....Beethoven
Ballet music, (No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses célèbres).....Gluck
Air, from "Abu Hassan".....Weber
Overture to "La dame blanche".....Boieldieu
Miss Emily Winant will be the singer.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The sixth of the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening, before the customary brilliant and appreciative audience. Of the numbers on the programme, Josef Joachim's Hungarian Concerto in D, Op. 11, attracted the greatest attention, and served to introduce Mr. Bernard Listemann as the violin soloist. The composition is one which fairly bristles with the most marvellous technical difficulties, the abilities of the player are taxed to their utmost at almost every point, and a less skilful and thorough musician would have succumbed at the outset. Mr. Listemann's playing, however, calls for our hearty and unstinted praise, but the work, allow us to remark here, is one which will not find pronounced favor with the average listener, but to the student will ever be welcomed as a treat, although its extreme length will forbid a presentation on the ordinary programmes. The remainder of the selections included Schumann's Overture, scherzo and finale, op 52; Boccherini's minuet in A, and Bach's Sinfonia in D, all played with that artistic elegance which Mr. Henschel has inspired his band and which has been made such a prominent and enjoyable feature at all of the Boston Symphony Concerts. The next concert will take place in Music Hall on Saturday evening with the following programme: Overture, "Magic Flute," Mozart; air, "Mitrane," 1686, Rossi; Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's "Suites de danses célèbres," Gluck; air, "Abu Hassan," Weber; overture, "La dame Blanche," Boieldieu. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist on this occasion.

THE SIXTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

—We remember a time when such a concert as was given in Music Hall last Saturday evening could safely have been termed a very stupid affair. It was one of the most uninteresting symphony concerts ever given in Boston. This is the simple truth in regard to it. The first selection in the badly arranged programme was Schumann's overture, scherzo, op. 52. Schumann was crazy when he wrote the work, and shortly after completing it he was compelled to go to the insane hospital in Bonn, his place of residence. It affords but the feeblest suggestions of the great composer's genius. Its thematic net-work in certain widely-separated parts is clear and interesting enough to admit of a passing compliment; but it is introduced in scanty proportions, and nowhere does it appear to have been profoundly prepared and elaborated. The Scherzo is a neat, delicate and pretty specimen of musical conception; but to discover an effeminate quality of prettiness in any of Schumann's music is to have one's attention called to a notable exception. The performance of the work had nothing to commend it to special mention; it was acceptably accurate in respect to mere note playing; though it lacked the refinement of style that should undoubtedly have been accorded it. Then followed on the programme Jos. Joachim's concerto in D, for violin. It was the first time we had heard the work, and we are in no haste to pass our opinion upon it other than it appeared a marvellously well scored production, replete with themes that are carefully developed in the Hungarian style. But for all this it was impossible at a single hearing to find the concerto an attractive one. Mr. Listemann performed it in a manner that excited an unqualified admiration of his ability as an executant. He seemed to know no difficulty, even when his execution was being submitted to the severest tests imaginable. The clearness and fluency of his performance were not its only merits. His expression was praiseworthy for its intensity and breadth, and the only blemish in the effect of his playing was manifestly due to the weak and unmusical tone of a violin that seemed altogether too poor an instrument to be in the hands of so able a master. He was enthusiastically applauded. The final number of the programme was a Sinfonia in D, composed in 1760, by C. Ph. Emanuel Bach. It would no doubt have been regarded as an "old fogey" contrapuntist in the time in which it was written, and despite the science displayed in the working-out of his Sinfonia, it is an extremely unattractive work. The concert this evening promises to be a delightful one; at all events a decided improvement on the one we have referred to. This is the programme: Overture (Magic Flute), Mozart; Air (Mitrane, 1686), Rossi; Symphony in B flat, No. 4, Op. 60, Beethoven, Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—Allegro vivace; Un poco meno Allegro; Allegro vivace.—Allegro ma non troppo; Ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses célèbres), Gluck, Danse des Athlètes (Elena e Paride; Iphigénie en Aulide), Menuet (Iphigénie en Aulide), Passacaille (Elena e Paride; Iphigénie en Aulide); Air (Abu Hassan), Weber; Overture (La dame blanche), Boieldieu. Soloist, Miss Emily Winant. Home Journal

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 3, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Magic Flute.) MOZART.

AIR. (Mitrane. 1686.) ROSSI.

SYMPHONY in B flat. No. 4, Op. 60. BEETHOVEN.

Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—

Allegro vivace; Un poco meno Allegro; Allegro vivace.—Allegro ma non troppo.—

BALLET MUSIC. (No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses célèbres.) GLUCK.

Danse des Athlètes. (Elena e Paride; Iphigénie en Aulide.)

Mennet. (Iphigénie en Aulide.)

Passacaille. (Elena e Paride; Iphigénie en Aulide.)

AIR. (Abu Hassan.) WEBER.

OVERTURE. (La dame blanche.) BOIELDIEU.

SOLOIST:

MISS EMILY WINANT.

AIR. (Mitrane. 1686.)

ROSSI.

Ah! Rendimi quel core
 Rendimi quell' amore
 A me ispirato!
 Il tuo fu il mio pensiero,
 Tuo sempre il mio volere,
 Ed or crudel, perchè m'hai tu lasciato?
 Abandonato?
 Ma qual così sarà
 Quella felicità,
 Che, nell' unirmi a te,
 M'hai rivelato?
 Tu m'hai promesso?

AIR. (Abu Hassan.)

WEBER.

O Fatima, etereo dono
 Che sì dolce parli al cor,
 Credi del liuto il suono
 Non può esprimere il mio amor.
 Saldo Aerno l'amor mio,
 Nel mio sen saprò nutrir;
 Per te sol viver vogl'io
 Sol per te vogl'io morir.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—SEVENTH
Admission CONCERT.

There is a wide distinction to be drawn, especially in art, between questions of taste and questions of truth, and the asserted experience of pleasant sensations is no refutation of definite criticism. We could name an American painter, whose Italian pictures gratify today the eyes of thousands, and find ready sale because of their skilful workmanship, while they are yet utterly untrue not only to small details, but also to great geographical features of the cities and harbors they purport to represent. Is the pretty effect of these pictures to controvert the just censure of the traveller who says that they are imaginations rather than representations? So is it in music also. Everybody has a right to his own likings, and these are further to be respected in so much as they rest of knowledge and not on mere caprice. If two people or two thousand enjoy what they hear, that is their inalienable idiosyncrasy and privilege; but the analyst and the critic have the same privilege—and the right, besides—to discuss, upon its own intrinsic merits, that which moved the others to pleasure and applause; while in any true metaphysical scale their philosophy is worth more than stimulated fancy.

It is perfectly plain, of course, that there can be in art no absolute, unvarying standard of expression; else Corot must paint with Turner's palette. But truth and common sense exist for all that, and must be insisted upon. When in its days of popularity the "Priests' March," from the "Prophet," was played by dashing organists as the liveliest of quicksteps, or when the "Funeral March" of the "Eroica" symphony falls far behind any processional possibility, it stands to reason that the hilarity or the depression aroused by such performances is ignorantly irrelevant when cited as a reply to the criticism which rebukes alike the preposterous haste and the drawling delay. While, then, there is no law, as of Medes and Persians, to govern the playing of symphonic music, there are yet some principles of interpretation which cannot be violated without making "the judicious grieve," however much meantime "the unskilful laugh." There is, to be sure, no absolute andante or allegro, to be measured by just so many beats to so many seconds of time, and the metronome markings, even of the greatest composers, cannot be always or blindly followed; there is even a disagreement in the workings and the rates of various metronomes themselves. But the liberty which a player or conductor may take has nevertheless limits; and even where tradition and practical familiarity fail to guide him, there is an internal evidence in the structure of a composition as related to the general meaning of the prescribed tempo, which cannot be disregarded with impunity nor allowed so pass unchallenged. When Beethoven marks the movement of his fourth symphony allegro, ma non troppo, what does that "not too fast" mean? Is it not apparent, that it means that the pace must not exceed the possibility of giving clear and coherent expression to his musical thoughts? And if in the score, to difficult and sluggishly-responding instruments, like bassoons and double-basses, are assigned phrases in which the fundamental unit of the measure is subdivided into petty fractions, each to be individually spoken, is it not further apparent that the conductor is going "too fast" when his rate will not permit those phrases to be clearly articulated, much less expressively delivered? It is precisely this temperate consideration in which the conductor of the Boston symphony concerts is deficient. It is astonishing to us that any person who is sensitive to the effects of time—especially if he can beat a few measures himself—can fail to observe the accelerando which so often accompanies a crescendo in the directing of these concerts. As a movement grows louder, it generally grows faster, and vice versa. This is a direct and inexcusable confounding of two different fashions of emphasis, although it is common enough to inexperienced and nervous performers. Mr. Listemann, Mr. Allen, and a few others of the first violins, as well as some of the best instrumentalists in the other departments of the orchestra, can follow their conductor at almost any pace, and he therefore seems to gauge the capacities of his whole band by theirs. The effect may be exciting to all the audience, and vastly enjoyed by many; but as art, it is false and bad. And this, no variety of knowledge, no personal prestige or attraction, no excellence in other respects, can explain away or justify. To the bumpkin scorched under a noon-day sun or wondering at the brilliance of a winter moon, spots in the one and dead abysses in the other, are, together with the scholar who declares them, food for unbelief and derision; but they exist nevertheless.

The symphony selected for last Saturday evening's concert was Beethoven's fourth, in B flat, whose free and direct melody and lighter use of the rhetoric, so to speak, of composition, make it so firm a favorite. The performance was marred by the inconsistencies and fluctuations which characterize the director's treatment of such music, and the stronger parts of the last movement were too weak in tone because the lower and middle instruments could not give body to notes which they could barely crowd into the time allowed them. But the work of the band was done very well as a whole, and there were admirable points in their delivery. The organ-like adagio of the first movement was rich and full and smooth in tone, and the entrances of the wooden wind instruments were clearly and neatly brought out. The general temper of the second movement, adagio, was gratifying, as being quite equable, and the short crisp chords were broken off with noticeable exactness; here too, when the principal theme reached the flute, it was tastefully and almost touchingly turned. The other movements call for no other comment than derives from our general judgment of the orchestra's symphony work. The overtures were those good old stand-by's, the "Zauberflöte" and the "Dame Blanche," the latter of which carries one back to the time when Tom Comer used to play it and the "Caliph of Bagdad" with his little band in the old Museum. Both were given with freedom and good color; the full harmonies of the brass in the former were nobly sustained, and the ear-tickling theme on which Boieldieu built up the latter was very vivaciously and lightly played. The orchestra also performed three specimens of Gluck's ballet music,—an "Athlete's Dance," a minuet and a passacaglia. It seemed to us that the first of these was read with more positiveness than befits so fluent and mild a composer as Gluck; but if the intention of the conductor were to give a dramatic character to his reading, we admit the force and suggestiveness of his idea. The lighter measures, particularly the last, were very nicely done.

The rich voice and simple singing of Miss Emily Winant added much to the general enjoyment. Although thoroughly genuine, she is not impassioned in her work, and it seemed odd that her selections should have been two love-songs,—Rossi's plaint, from "Mitrane" (now nearly two centuries old), and Weber's declaration, from "Abu Hassan." But as Miss Winant reached the second part of Rossi's unsophisticated melody, in which no antiquated flavor is discernible, her manner grew warmer, and the song left a sweet and tender impression on the ear and mind.

The audience had evidently not all understood that the exact hour of eight would henceforward be adhered to, and a great many therefore lost the "Magic Flute" overture and even Miss Winant's first song. There was again a great confusion in Tremont street after the concert. The one special officer had no control over the mass of struggling hacks that filled the street, blocked the circulation and endangered that larger portion of the public which walks or desires to reach a horse-car. Even in disorderly Naples, where are the most troublesome cabmen in the world, such a state of things would not be permitted for fifteen seconds.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Manuscript
Boston Symphony Orchestra. The seventh concert, last Saturday evening, opened gloriously with Mozart's great overture to "The Magic Flute." A more brilliant and artistic performance of this wonderful overture could hardly be wished. The grand trombone chords (suggestive, as certain authorities have surmised, of a Masonic ceremony) were struck with noble decision, and the brilliant fugued allegro was played with just the right accent, and in just the right tempo; deliberately enough to avoid all sense of hurry and flurry, yet fast enough to maintain the vivacious character of the movement. In a word, it was admirable. Beethoven's B-flat symphony, fourth of the immortal nine, was capably played in its first three movements. In one or two places Mr. Henschel's tendency to accelerate his beat in crescendo passages was noticeable, not disagreeably in the first movement, but less pleasantly in one passage in the adagio (where the basses, violas and second violins play the figure in thirty-second notes); here the acceleration did sound weak and pointless. The Scherzo was admirably played throughout. Concerning the tempo of the Finale, however, we find ourselves again forced to differ with Mr. Henschel. We are perfectly willing to admit that his conception of this movement would be fully warranted by the notes alone, and that it is, moreover, a conception which, when enforced with the vigorous decision that it was on Saturday evening, makes its artistic reason of being very patent to the listener. Even the very evident fact that, whereas the violins feel themselves easily at home in this rapid tempo, the less flexible instruments, such as the double-basses and bassoons, are physically unable to play their notes, might possibly be overlooked. One feels for the moment that, if they cannot play so fast, they ought to be able to; that Beethoven, under the excitement of composition, may have done his own discretion the injustice of writing impracticable passages. But, unfortunately for Mr. Henschel, as it seems to us, the notes of this movement are not all that Beethoven has given us; he also wrote, in perfectly plain Italian, the heading "allegro ma non troppo" (fast, but not too fast). Of course there can be a difference of opinion as to what "too fast" may be. To our mind, the "ma non troppo" in this caption has the same force as the "nicht zu geschwind" in the heading of the last movement of the E-minor sonata, op. 90, which Von Bülow very discerningly interprets as a caution, equivalent to "not so fast as you would naturally think at first sight that it ought to be played." By the light of this interpretation we can see that Beethoven foresaw the temptation conductors would feel to play the movement very fast, appreciated how brilliantly it would sound at a very rapid tempo, and how easily his intentions might be misconceived, and so did his best to guard against a very natural misunderstanding. As it is inconceivable that any one could possibly wish to take the movement faster than Mr. Henschel did, it seems as if his tempo were just what the composer intended to deprecate in his caption. It is, moreover, easily to be seen that our interpretation absolves Beethoven from the folly of writing passages for double basses which those ponderous instruments cannot play without a very exceptional putting forth of virtuosity. The set of dances, culled by Gevaert from the ballet music of two of Gluck's operas, was most interesting and enjoyable. The splendid, majestic fire of the opening dance of athletes, with its trenchant dialogue between basses and violins, is something so impressive, so exciting (even in a physical sense), that one is fain to look upon this style of composition as a lost art, the regaining of which would be worth almost any sacrifice. It was superbly played. The charmingly graceful minuet, on the other hand, struck us as being unduly hurried. Remember that this minuet is not a movement in a symphony, but in a ballet; that it is, therefore, a minuet in the exact, not merely in the ideal sense; a minuet to be danced as a minuet. The Passacaille, with its fascinating interpolated gavotte (which has become familiar to our public through Brahms's pianoforte transcription), was capably given. If we should have liked the gavotte to go just a thought slower, we admit that this is a pure matter of taste. Boïeldieu's sunny (if, at times, almost too ingenuously infantine) overture to "La Dame Blanche," brought the concert to a delightful close. Miss Emily Winant sang an air from Rossi's opera of "Mitrane" (written in 1686) with great expression. This beautiful composition shows plainly enough that all fine, flowing melody is not confined to the eighteenth century, as all strong dramatic effect is not confined to the nineteenth. Weber's delicious "O Fatima!" from "Abu Hassan," was beautifully sung. At the next concert the programme will be—

Overture to "Athalia," op. 74 Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello in A-minor, op.

33 Saint-Saëns
Symphony in C-minor, No. 1, op. 68 Brahms
Adagio for violoncello in G, op. 38 Bargiel
Symphonic Poem (Les Préludes) Liszt

Mr. Carl Bayrhofer will be the solo player.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Seventh Concert in the Series a Brilliant Success. She

The seventh concert in the Boston Symphony orchestral series was given last evening before a splendid audience. The attendance at the public rehearsal Friday afternoon was something phenomenal, the crowd about the ticket office near the hour of commencement reminding one of the opening sale of tickets for some coming "rage" rather than the regular performance of a home organization. But then twenty-five cents is an astonishingly nominal price for such a wealth of music; and that portion of the public which did not at first remark this is beginning to find it out. The programme of last evening, taken as a whole, was—we were almost going to say the most enjoyable of the season so far. It included Mozart's characteristic overture to the "Magic Flute" and Boïeldieu's graceful and captivating overture to the "White Lady," Beethoven's grand Fourth Symphony, Gluck's "Ballet Music," and last, but not least, vocal selections (Rossi's air "Mitrane" and an air from Weber's Abu Hassan), by Miss Emily Winant. The plan of giving so many of the opera overtures in this series of concerts is most excellent and commendable. Some of these compositions are of rare excellence, and, notwithstanding the fact they are so often played, they are really but seldom heard. Custom has brought our opera audiences to consider an overture in the light of a pardonable though utterly useless formality, to be talked through and waited through and never listened to. Such being the custom of the majority, or of the minority, either (whichever it may be), nobody ever is allowed the enjoyment of the introductory themes at the opera house. To some, certainly, such a reading, for instance, of "La Dame Blanche" or of "Il Flauto Magico" as was heard last evening must have been a revelation. Such it must have been, anyway, considering the superiority of Mr. Henschel's orchestra over that of the ordinary heterogeneous collection which composes the average opera orchestra. As for the symphony, the great work certainly had an artistic and painstaking interpretation last evening. In the opinion of some people Beethoven's Fourth Symphony will ever remain his greatest, his crowning work, beyond which there remains nothing finer to be done in the realm of instrumental music. And who, in listening to the familiar "adagio" movement can help pardoning the enthusiast who declared that Beethoven's music was fit to be played in heaven? Mr. Henschel showed his complete familiarity with the score by directing the whole work with scarcely a glance at the music. The presentation of the work was a credit to him, as it was to the individuals composing the orchestra. The steady, good work throughout the evening was another proof of the increasing perfection of the orchestra. The members are indeed having such a deal of hard practice now, first under one leader and then under another whose style and method are entirely different, that it is not to be wondered at that they improve. As for Miss Winant's singing, it was one of the very satisfactory features of the evening. She displayed her splendid voice to great advantage in both her numbers, and her efforts were warmly rewarded. The programme for next week is as follows:

Overture (Athalia), op. 74 Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 33 Saint-Saëns
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68 Brahms
Adagio for violoncello in G, op. 38 Bargiel
Symphonic poem (Les Préludes) Liszt
Soloist Mr. Carl Bayrhofer

MR. HENSCHEL AND HIS CRITICS.

Suzette Dery, 81

Some of Mr. Henschel's friends and admirers are evidently determined that no criticism of their idol shall pass unchallenged, unless it be favorable criticism of the most fulsome description; and, in pursuit of their plan to stifle just censure of his faults, they are prepared to sacrifice decency and dignity even to the extent of cowardly vituperation from behind the safe shelter of a pseudonym. It does not seem to have occurred to these shallow persons that throwing mud at Mr. Henschel's critics is not exactly a logical way of proving them wrong in their judgments, or of establishing his capacity as a competent conductor to be an incontrovertible fact. One of these anonymous champions found it necessary to attack nearly the whole fraternity of musical critics last week in the columns of a contemporary. The only one who escaped, if we are not mistaken, was the single wholly ignorant member of the guild, who, because of his very ignorance, had persistently praised everything Mr. Henschel had done. Of course, we have not the remotest intention of replying to the ill-mannered scurrilities of a poltroon who sneaked into print and into malicious misrepresentation under a false name. The only real injury he has done has been to Mr. Henschel, who may exclaim, "Save me from such friends as this!" No gentleman can afford to be defended by the coarse indiscretions of a super-serviceable touter, who, on the familiar principle of the lawyer with a bad cause, exclaims, "No case; abuse the plaintiffs." That species of argument may be illustrated by imagining the friends of Walt Whitman going about with a tar-brush and bespattering his critics in order to prove that his poetry is cleanly in tone.

Mr. Henschel has not been treated unjustly by his critics, unless, indeed, to comment upon his only too-apparent faults be to do him injustice. It is rare indeed that there has been so marked a unanimity of opinion among the musical editors of our journals as has distinguished their critiques upon Mr. Henschel. Let us examine the facts of the case somewhat closer. Because Mr. Higginson, with princely liberality and something of indiscretion, intrusted the leading of his orchestra to a vocalist who never had an orchestra under his control before, we are asked by some misguided and unreasonable people to believe that Mr. Henschel necessarily radiates with the genius for conducting that burns within him, and is able to leap at once to proficiency in one of the most difficult of arts. We are told, as a proof of his gift for handling an orchestra that he has sung under eighty different conductors, when the real point to demonstrate should have been how many orchestras he had himself conducted. That he is a good musician goes for nothing in this connection, for some of the greatest composers—Beethoven, Schumann, and Meyerbeer among the rest—have been found incapable of conducting. All that was known here—or anywhere else, for that matter—of Mr. Henschel before this season was that he is a fairly-gifted and well educated artist, with a decided talent for composition in a certain vein, and, in addition, a highly interesting and exciting singer with an unpleasant voice and a bad method. Only this and nothing more! Moreover, instead of conducting, he has always been conducted, and that, too, not as an orchestral player, but as a singer. The fact that he has never been the chief of an orchestra before is sufficient proof of his lack of experience; and this inexperience is of itself quite enough to account for the crudeness and the errors that his critics have found in his readings and his leading. No novice can stand up before an orchestra with a baton in his hand, and, without training, blossom at once into the great conductor Mr. Henschel's gushing sycophants claim him to be. We have always protested against incapacity in high places in art, and shall continue so to protest whenever a sham comes within the modest circle of our usefulness. We have long ago passed by the era in which such conducting as that of Mr. Henschel can be forced upon us without complaining. That he has fine social qualities, that he is a favorite in society, that he is sought out by fashion as its current musical josa, may be freely admitted; but these facts cannot be pleaded in mitigation of his shortcomings as a conductor. He has music,—an "Athlete's Dance," a minuet and a passacaglia. It seemed to us that the first of these was read with more positiveness than befits so fluent and mild a composer as Gluck; but if the intention of the conductor were to give a dramatic character to his reading, we admit the force and suggestiveness of his idea. The lighter measures, particularly the last, were very nicely done.

The rich voice and simple singing of Miss Emily Winant added much to the general enjoyment. Although thoroughly genuine, she is not impassioned in her work, and it seemed odd that her selections should have been two love-songs,—Rossi's plaint, from "Mitrane" (now nearly two centuries old), and Weber's declaration, from "Abu Hassan." But as Miss Winant reached the second part of Rossi's unsophisticated melody, in which no antiquated flavor is discernible, her manner grew warmer, and the song left a sweet and tender impression on the ear and mind.

The audience had evidently not all understood that the exact hour of eight would henceforward be adhered to, and a great many therefore lost the "Magic Flute" overture and even Miss Winant's first song. There was again a great confusion in Tremont street after the concert. The one special officer had no control over the mass of struggling hacks that filled the street, blocked the circulation and endangered that larger portion of the public which walks or desires to reach a horse-car. Even in disorderly Naples, where are the most troublesome cabmen in the world, such a state of things would not be permitted for fifteen seconds.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Manuscript
Boston Symphony Orchestra. The seventh concert, last Saturday evening, opened gloriously with Mozart's great overture to "The Magic Flute." A more brilliant and artistic performance of this wonderful overture could hardly be wished. The grand trombone chords (suggestive, as certain authorities have surmised, of a Masonic ceremony) were struck with noble decision, and the brilliant fugged allegro was played with just the right accent, and in just the right tempo; deliberately enough to avoid all sense of hurry and flurry, yet fast enough to maintain the vivacious character of the movement. In a word, it was admirable. Beethoven's B-flat symphony, fourth of the immortal nine, was capitally played in its first three movements. In one or two places Mr. Henschel's tendency to accelerate his beat in crescendo passages was noticeable, not disagreeably in the first movement, but less pleasantly in one passage in the adagio (where the basses, violas and second violins play the figure in thirty-second notes); here the acceleration did sound weak and pointless. The Scherzo was admirably played throughout. Concerning the tempo of the Finale, however, we find ourselves again forced to differ with Mr. Henschel. We are perfectly willing to admit that his conception of this movement would be fully warranted by the notes alone, and that it is, moreover, a conception which, when enforced with the vigorous decision that it was on Saturday evening, makes its artistic reason of being very patent to the listener. Even the very evident fact that, whereas the violins feel themselves easily at home in this rapid tempo, the less flexible instruments, such as the double-basses and bassoons, are physically unable to play their notes, might possibly be overlooked. One feels for the moment that, if they cannot play so fast, they ought to be able to; that Beethoven, under the excitement of composition, may have done his own discretion the injustice of writing impracticable passages. But, unfortunately for Mr. Henschel, as it seems to us, the notes of this movement are not all that Beethoven has given us; he also wrote, in perfectly plain Italian, the heading "allegro ma non troppo" (fast, but not too fast). Of course there can be a difference of opinion as to what "too fast" may be. To our mind, the "ma non troppo" in this caption has the same force as the "nicht zu geschwind" in the heading of the last movement of the E-minor sonata, op. 90, which Von Bülow very discerningly interprets as a caution, equivalent to "not so fast as you would naturally think at first sight that it ought to be played." By the light of this interpretation we can see that Beethoven foresaw the temptation conductors would feel to play the movement very fast, appreciated how brilliantly it would sound at a very rapid tempo, and how easily his intentions might be misconceived, and so did his best to guard against a very natural misunderstanding. As it is inconceivable that any one could possibly wish to take the movement faster than Mr. Henschel did, it seems as if his tempo were just what the composer intended to deprecate in his caption. It is, moreover, easily to be seen that our interpretation absolves Beethoven from the folly of writing passages for double basses which those ponderous instruments cannot play without a very exceptional putting forth of virtuosity. The set of dances, culled by Gevaert from the ballet music of two of Gluck's operas, was most interesting and enjoyable. The splendid, majestic fire of the opening dance of athletes, with its trenchant dialogue between basses and violins, is something so impressive, so exciting (even in a physical sense), that one is fain to look upon this style of composition as a lost art, the regaining of which would be worth almost any sacrifice. It was superbly played. The charmingly graceful minuet, on the other hand, struck us as being unduly hurried. Remember that this minuet is not a movement in a symphony, but in a ballet; that it is, therefore, a minuet to be danced as a minuet. The Passacaille, with its fascinating interpolated gavotte (which has become familiar to our public through Brahms's pianoforte transcription), was capitally given. If we should have liked the gavotte to go just a thought slower, we admit that this is a pure matter of taste. Boieldieu's sunny (if, at times, almost too ingenuously infantine) overture to "La Dame Blanche," brought the concert to a delightful close. Miss Emily Winant sang an air from Rossi's opera of "Mitrane" (written in 1686) with great expression. This beautiful composition shows plainly enough that all fine, flowing melody is not confined to the eighteenth century, as all strong dramatic effect is not confined to the nineteenth. Weber's delicious "O Fatima!" from "Abu Hassan," was beautifully sung. At the next concert the programme will be—

Overture to "Athalie," op. 74 Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello in A-minor, op. 33 Saint-Saëns
Symphony in C-minor, No. 1, op. 68 Brahms
Adagio for violoncello in G, op. 38 Bargiel
Symphonic Poem (Les Préludes) Liszt
Mr. Carl Bayrhaoffer will be the solo player.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Seventh Concert in the Series a Brilliant Success.

The seventh concert in the Boston Symphony orchestral series was given last evening before a splendid audience. The attendance at the public rehearsal Friday afternoon was something phenomenal, the crowd about the ticket office near the hour of commencement reminding one of the opening sale of tickets for some coming "rage" rather than the regular performance of a home organization. But then twenty-five cents is an astonishingly nominal price for such a wealth of music; and that portion of the public which did not at first remark this is beginning to find it out. The programme of last evening, taken as a whole, was—we were almost going to say the most enjoyable of the season so far. It included Mozart's characteristic overture to the "Magic Flute" and Boieldieu's graceful and captivating overture to the "White Lady," Beethoven's grand Fourth Symphony, Gluck's "Ballet Music," and last, but not least, vocal selections (Rossi's air "Mitrane" and an air from Weber's Abu Hassan), by Miss Emily Winant. The plan of giving so many of the opera overtures in this series of concerts is most excellent and commendable. Some of these compositions are of rare excellence, and, notwithstanding the fact they are so often played, they are really but seldom heard. Custom has brought our opera audiences to consider an overture in the light of a pardonable though utterly useless formality, to be talked through and waited through and never listened to. Such being the custom of the majority, or of the minority, either (whichever it may be), nobody ever is allowed the enjoyment of the introductory themes at the opera house. To some, certainly, such a reading, for instance, of "La Dame Blanche" or of "Il Fluto Magico" as was heard last evening must have been a revelation. Such it must have been, anyway, considering the superiority of Mr. Henschel's orchestra over that of the ordinary heterogeneous collection which composes the average opera orchestra. As for the symphony, the great work certainly had an artistic and painstaking interpretation last evening. In the opinion of some people Beethoven's Fourth Symphony will ever remain his greatest, his crowning work, beyond which there remains nothing finer to be done in the realm of instrumental music. And who, in listening to the familiar "adagio" movement can help pardoning the enthusiast who declared that Beethoven's music was fit to be played in heaven? Mr. Henschel showed his complete familiarity with the score by directing the whole work with scarcely a glance at the music. The presentation of the work was a credit to him, as it was to the individuals composing the orchestra. The steady, good work throughout the evening was another proof of the increasing perfection of the orchestra. The members are indeed having such a deal of hard practice now, first under one leader and then under another whose style and method are entirely different, that it is not to be wondered at that they improve. As for Miss Winant's singing, it was one of the very satisfactory features of the evening. She displayed her splendid voice to great advantage in both her numbers, and her efforts were warmly rewarded. The programme for next week is as follows:

Overture (Athalie), op. 74 Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 33 Saint-Saëns
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68 Brahms
Adagio for violoncello in G, op. 38 Bargiel
Symphonic poem (Les Préludes) Liszt
Soloist Mr. Carl Bayrhaoffer

MR. HENSCHEL AND HIS CRITICS.

Gazette Dec 4, 81

Some of Mr. Henschel's friends and admirers are evidently determined that no criticism of their idol shall pass unchallenged, unless it be favorable criticism of the most fulsome description; and, in pursuit of their plan to stifle just censure of his faults, they are prepared to sacrifice decency and dignity even to the extent of cowardly vituperation from behind the safe shelter of a pseudonym. It does not seem to have occurred to these shallow persons that throwing mud at Mr. Henschel's critics is not exactly a logical way of proving them wrong in their judgments, or of establishing his capacity as a competent conductor to be an incontrovertible fact. One of these anonymous champions found it necessary to attack nearly the whole fraternity of musical critics last week in the columns of a contemporary. The only one who escaped, if we are not mistaken, was the single wholly ignorant member of the guild, who, because of his very ignorance, had persistently praised everything Mr. Henschel had done. Of course, we have not the remotest intention of replying to the ill-mannered scurrilities of a poltroon who sneaked into print and into malicious misrepresentation under a false name. The only real injury he has done has been to Mr. Henschel, who may exclaim, "Save me from such friends as this!" No gentleman can afford to be defended by the coarse indiscretions of a super-serviceable touter, who, on the familiar principle of the lawyer with a bad cause, exclaims, "No case; abuse the plaintiffs." That species of argument may be illustrated by imagining the friends of Walt Whitman going about with a tar-brush and bespattering his critics in order to prove that his poetry is cleanly in tone.

Mr. Henschel has not been treated unjustly by his critics, unless, indeed, to comment upon his only too apparent faults be to do him injustice. It is rare indeed that there has been so marked a unanimity of opinion among the musical editors of our journals as has distinguished their critiques upon Mr. Henschel. Let us examine the facts of the case somewhat closer. Because Mr. Higginson, with princely liberality and something of indiscretion, intrusted the leading of his orchestra to a vocalist who never had an orchestra under his control before, we are asked by some misguided and unreasonable people to believe that Mr. Henschel necessarily radiates with the genius for conducting that burns within him, and is able to leap at once to proficiency in one of the most difficult of arts. We are told, as a proof of his gift for handling an orchestra that he has sung under eighty different conductors, when the real point to demonstrate should have been how many orchestras he had himself conducted. That he is a good musician goes for nothing in this connection, for some of the greatest composers—Beethoven, Schumann, and Meyerbeer among the rest—have been found incapable of conducting. All that was known here—or anywhere else, for that matter—of Mr. Henschel before this season was that he is a fairly gifted and well educated artist, with a decided talent for composition in a certain vein, and, in addition, a highly interesting and exciting singer with an unpleasant voice and a bad method. Only this; and nothing more! Moreover, instead of conducting, he has always been conducted, and that, too, not as an orchestral player, but as a singer. The fact that he has never been the chief of an orchestra before is sufficient proof of his lack of experience; and this inexperience is of itself quite enough to account for the crudeness and the errors that his critics have found in his readings and his leading. No novice can stand up before an orchestra with a baton in his hand, and, without training, blossom at once into the great conductor Mr. Henschel's gushing sycophants claim him to be. We have always protested against incapacity in high places in art, and shall continue so to protest whenever a sham comes within the modest circle of our usefulness. We have long ago passed by the era in which such conducting as that of Mr. Henschel can be forced upon us without complaining. That he has fine social qualities, that he is a favorite in society, that he is sought out by fashion as its current musical joss, may be freely admitted; but these facts cannot be pleaded in mitigation of his shortcomings as a conductor. He has almost everything to learn of his new calling, and that he will learn it eventually is very probable. But at present he is a pupil, and not a master; a tyro, and not an expert. The cry of a cap against him is ingenious, but absurd. The indisputable fact that he is a thorough novice in an exacting position he never before occupied, is all potent to account for the many mistakes with which he has been charged without seeking farther. It would have been surprising indeed if he had not blundered under the circumstances, for conducting is not an art to be attained intuitively. Abusing the critics who have pointed out these errors does not establish the fact that Mr. Henschel was guiltless of them; and it is, moreover, ridiculous to attempt to establish the fact that he is a competent conductor merely because he has not succeeded in offending that large portion of the inexpert public which hears with its eyes.

We think that Mr. Henschel may possibly have fallen into the error committed by so many foreigners who come here with the belief that we are yet in our musical swaddling clothes, and are incapable of distinguishing the good from the bad. Otherwise, he never could have imagined that we should be content to receive the rough efforts of a beginner without complaining. We have been made too well acquainted with the symphonies he has given to remain silent under his gross misreadings of them. Thus far, the only censures with which he has been made acquainted are those which have been printed. Could he and his uncompromising followers be made cognizant in how far our best professional musicians agree with the critics, they would doubtless be as much dismayed as edified. The determination to make his coming here a boon of indescribable value to the musical interests of the city has moved his friends to make all kinds of absurd claims for him. We hear of the superior manner in which he has trained the strings, while the facts are that the strings were already trained, and admirably, by Mr. Listemann, for three years before Mr. Henschel's virgin accession to the conductor's stand. Instead of improving under his violent methods, they have degenerated in the direction of coarseness. But by and by he may improve, for he has an opportunity that has rarely fallen to a musician. Surely, never before was a vocalist taken from the concert room and without the slightest preparation placed at the head of one of the most complete orchestras ever organized in this musical centre. Not only this, but he begins to learn how to lead under a princely patron, and without any necessity to consider either pecuniary success or pecuniary failure, or whether he is capable or incapable, and with the exceptional advantages of the éclat attending the enterprise. He has a carte-blanche in every respect. That his friends are elated is not surprising; but they must not run away with the belief that Mr. Henschel is an able leader because he has been so phenomenally fortunate; nor must they look uncharitably upon him who does not see with their eyes or hear with their ears.

As far as we are personally concerned, we have no unkindly feelings whatever towards Mr. Henschel. Our record in connection with him in the past will amply illustrate that. We were the first to bespeak for him an impartial hearing when his remarkable promotion began to be commented upon with astonishment and asperity. He was certainly not prejudged by us. It would have been an unalloyed pleasure to have written nothing but praise of him; but the fates gave us no option to do so with justice to ourselves and to those others far less favorably situated than himself, who have fallen under our critical censure. From a somewhat extensive experience in our journalistic capacity, we have observed with something of grim curiosity that artists and their friends never questioned our integrity or the justice of our comments when our notices turned in the direction of praise. On the other hand, it is only when our conscience and the facts impel us to condemn, that we are assailed with charges of personal motives, prejudice, cabals, ignorance, and, worst of all, of the crime of violin-playing! And just here the curious reflection arises that when a non-player wants to say something particularly crushing to a violinist he invariably twits him with his violin. We have never heard a drummer, a fife, a clarinetist, a contrabassist, a bagpiper, or even an organgrinder, outlawed for performing on his special instrument, and this circumstance unmistakably indicates something inherently disgraceful in association with the violin, which, when called by its proper English name, "fiddle," sinks to a depth of shame and ignominy which language has no power to describe.

In conclusion, we have only to state that none will be quicker or more happy than ourselves to make the most cordial acknowledgment in these columns of every good point that Mr. Henschel's leading may develop; but, on the other hand, we shall continue to write of his faults as we find them, undeterred by anonymous letter-writers lacking the courage to father their malevolent detractions, and with a hearty contempt for all insinuations from any quarter which impugn the sincerity of our course or the honesty of our motives.

It may not be out of place here to make a few comments on the subject of the Philharmonic Society in connection with Bernhard Listemann. Fault has been found with it for having dispensed with Mr. Listemann's services as conductor, and much has been said in the way of sympathy for the wrongs he is presumed to have sustained. He is generally supposed to have been crushed in his efforts to establish a permanent orchestra here, and by the Philharmonic Society. The facts of the case are simply that Mr. Listemann also had his Mr. Higginson, whose name is Mr. A. P. Peck, and whatever credit is due to the conception of the enterprise that passed under Mr. Listemann's name belongs to Mr. Peck, who for two years acted the part of patron towards him, meeting the expenses and providing the necessary means to carry on the undertaking. The concert failed to attract the public or to prove remunerative, and not being a Cresus, Mr. Peck, after bearing as great a loss as he felt he could sustain, retired from the contest. About this time the Philharmonic Society was founded, and Mr. Listemann being the most available conductor in the field, was empowered to engage a large orchestra and to conduct it. That the society was organized in his interests is not borne out by the facts. At the outset there were some consultations having a bearing in that direction; but as the undertaking progressed it assumed larger proportions, based on the design of establishing a permanent musical society here. No delay was made in correcting the first opinion that had gone abroad, and the society was formed on the improved and more comprehensive plan. Mr. Listemann was employed to conduct the orchestra, and received the salary he demanded for performing that duty. As the season progressed he was found to be impracticable, and by the time the first series of concerts was over the question of a change for next season was agitated, excited somewhat by the fact that Mr. Listemann had engaged himself to be the leading violin of the new Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was argued by some that his duties in his subordinate place would be so exacting as to absorb too much of his attention from his more important task as conductor of the Philharmonic Society; and by others, that he had compromised the dignity of the conductorship of one orchestra by accepting a less prominent place in another. These facts, taken together with what were considered other causes for discontent, bore their fruits. It is unnecessary to go into a discussion of the details in which Mr. Listemann failed to prove satisfactory to the government of the society. It is sufficient that there were grounds for complaint, perhaps on both sides. At a meeting called for the special consideration of a conductor for the ensuing season, at which nineteen out of twenty-five members of the Board of Directors were present, the question was discussed. Then a written ballot was taken, resulting in a scattering vote for four gentlemen, Mr. Listemann not receiving a single vote. The subject was then recommitted to the Music Committee, who reported two other names. At a subsequent meeting, held for a consideration of this report, Mr. Maas was elected. Now, to accuse the Board of Directors, which includes the names of some of our most influential and respected business men, with baseness and dishonorable dealing because they acted in what they considered the best interests of the society is as malicious, as unreasonable, and as paltry a piece of partisanship as can well be imagined, even when perpetrated under the protection of an incognito. We hope we have done for good and all with these unpleasant subjects, and we take leave of them with the reflection that incompetency cannot be railed into competency, though it may be into popularity.

THE SEVENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last night was certainly a varied one, in which every auditor must have found something to his taste. It was, as a whole, excellently carried out, very few flaws of performance being perceptible and but few faults of direction. It began with the ever charming and, for Mozart, audacious Magic Flute overture. It was bright, crisp and clear throughout. Miss Winant's songs were an aria by Rossi, and a selection from Weber's Abu Hassan. Both were of the legato order of vocalism, the former being chiefly in the very deepest register, and containing the usual single contrast and reprise of the old Italian school. In this Miss Winant did not force the lower tones and the result was a very fine rendering. In the other number her enunciation was of the clearest and her phrasing admirable, but the pronunciation of the Italian was variable. This, however, is a minor fault and was forgotten in the great beauty and tenderness with which she invested the love song. The symphony was Beethoven's Fourth (B flat), and as far as execution went, was admirable. The opening adagio, with its stationary tone in the horns and wind, and shifting string harmonies, was finely shaded; the abrupt violin scales which lead into the allegro were vigorous and clear; the second theme, of the bassoons, was admirable; the shading of the strings at the return to the first theme was beautifully done, and the questionable F sharp avoided. In the third movement, the graceful violin figure which daintily answers the woodwind was clear and effective; evidently the conductor had seized the salient points of the work and made all the work of the rehearsals tell, where it would do the most good. But the adagio seemed to us taken at too slow a pace, and the final allegro ma non troppo seemed to have lost the non troppo. It could not have been taken at a quicker pace. This tendency to exaggerate, and to individualize classical works, has led to the numerous varying opinions about Mr. Henschel. It is always hazardous to attack the idol of an art-craze or an admiration society, and to reject the simple creed,—"I believe in Henschel and all his works," or to disagree with one of his conceptions, is to evoke a storm of uneducated hostility. Even were these tendencies absent, it is folly to suppose that a perfect conductor could spring, Minerva-like, without previous preparation, from—the scheme of a wealthy art-patron. Mr. Henschel has already done good work for Boston; so have Mr. Listemann, Mr. Lang, and Mr. Zerrahn; and their readings have a title to equal respect with those of this highly-gifted innovator, who, by the thorough use of exceptional advantages, has given Boston, in some respects, better performances than it was able to obtain with regularity before. The Gluck Ballet Music, which followed the symphony, was of the arrangement of Pere Gevaert, and gave an opportunity to the strings to display some broad and heavy (sometimes raspy) bowing. It was of that square cut order of counterpoint, which is so easily followed, and which consists largely in imitations between the high and deep strings. The overture to La Dame Blanche, with its jovial themes and flute tootings, was excellently played, and sent everybody home in a good humor. The next concert presents Overture (Athalie), Op. 74, Mendelssohn; Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, Op. 33, Saint-Saens; Mr. Bayrhafer. Symphony in C minor, No. 1, Op. 68, Brahms; Adagio for Violoncello in G, Op. 38, Bargiel; Mr. Bayrhafer. Symphonic Poem (Les Preludes), Liszt.

—There is nothing so well calculated to arouse mingled feelings in the mind of an attendant upon a concert as to have two musically learned young women sit directly behind him and give their views about the selections before they are performed. They criticise with great confidence and acumen, saying that this Beethoven Symphony is grand, and that selection from Gluck or Boieldieu uninteresting and trivial. So they listen intently and quietly to the former, and during the performance of the latter relax their minds and chatter about the fashions or the last party. And yet some persons, utterly failing to appreciate the advantages of hearing the music and their innocent prattle at the same time, look at them icily and with wicked thoughts of homicide in their hearts, and seem to think that the orchestra should have their entire attention. How absurd some people are!—they even appear to believe that instrumental music is to be listened to silently, and not to be considered as an accompaniment for school-girl gabble. It is difficult to speak with patience of persons with such extraordinary views.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its seventh concert in Music hall on Saturday evening. Miss Emily Winant was the soloist, and the programme was as follows:

Overture. (Magic Flute).....	Mozart
Air. (Mitane , 1886).....	Rossi
Symphony in B flat. No. 4. op. 60.....	Beethoven
Ballet music. No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses celebres.....	Gluck
Air. (Abu Hassan).....	Weber
Overture. (La Dame Blanche).....	Boieldieu

Miss Winant possesses a voice, the good qualities of which are as yet scarcely appreciated by the average concert audience of this city, although she has sung here quite a number of times during the past three or four years. A fine contralto is indeed a rarity, and in many respects Miss Winant is unequalled, Miss Cary alone excepted. Her singing was one of the best features of the programme, especially her interpretation of Weber's air. The work of the orchestra was, in general, remarkably fine.

almost everything to learn of his new calling, and that he will learn it eventually is very probable. But at present he is a pupil, and not a master; a tyro, and not an expert. The cry of a cabal against him is ingenious, but absurd. The indisputable fact that he is a thorough novice in an exacting position he never before occupied, is all potent to account for the many mistakes with which he has been charged without seeking farther. It would have been surprising indeed if he had not blundered under the circumstances, for conducting is not an art to be attained intuitively. Abusing the critics who have pointed out these errors does not establish the fact that Mr. Henschel was guiltless of them; and it is, moreover, ridiculous to attempt to establish the fact that he is a competent conductor merely because he has not succeeded in offending that large portion of the inexpert public which hears with its eyes.

We think that Mr. Henschel may possibly have fallen into the error committed by so many foreigners who come here with the belief that we are yet in our musical swaddling clothes, and are incapable of distinguishing the good from the bad. Otherwise, he never could have imagined that we should be content to receive the rough efforts of a beginner without complaining. We have been made too well acquainted with the symphonies he has given to remain silent under his gross misreadings of them. Thus far, the only censures with which he has been made acquainted are those which have been printed. Could he and his uncompromising followers be made cognizant in how far our best professional musicians agree with the critics, they would doubtless be as much dismayed as edified. The determination to make his coming here a boon of indescribable value to the musical interests of the city has moved his friends to make all kinds of absurd claims for him. We hear of the superior manner in which he has trained the strings, while the facts are that the strings were already trained, and admirably, by Mr. Listemann, for three years before Mr. Henschel's virgin accession to the conductor's stand. Instead of improving under his violent methods, they have degenerated in the direction of coarseness. But by and by he may improve, for he has an opportunity that has rarely fallen to a musician. Surely, never before was a vocalist taken from the concert room and without the slightest preparation placed at the head of one of the most complete orchestras ever organized in this musical centre. Not only this, but he begins to learn how to lead under a princely patron, and without any necessity to consider either pecuniary success or pecuniary failure, or whether he is capable or incapable, and with the exceptional advantages of the éclat attending the enterprise. He has a carte-blanche in every respect. That his friends are elated is not surprising; but they must not run away with the belief that Mr. Henschel is an able leader because he has been so phenomenally fortunate; nor must they look uncharitably upon him who does not see with their eyes or hear with their ears.

As far as we are personally concerned, we have no unkindly feelings whatever towards Mr. Henschel. Our record in connection with him in the past will amply illustrate that. We were the first to bespeak for him an impartial hearing when his remarkable promotion began to be commented upon with astonishment and asperity. He was certainly not prejudged by us. It would have been an unalloyed pleasure to have written nothing but praise of him; but the fates gave us no option to do so with justice to ourselves and to those others far less favorably situated than himself, who have fallen under our critical censure. From a somewhat extensive experience in our journalistic capacity, we have observed with something of grim curiosity that artists and their friends never questioned our integrity or the justice of our comments when our notices turned in the direction of praise. On the other hand, it is only when our conscience and the facts impel us to condemn, that we are assailed with charges of personal motives, prejudice, cabals, ignorance, and, worst of all, of the crime of violin-playing! And just here the curious reflection arises that when a non-player wants to say something particularly crushing to a violinist he invariably twits him with his violin. We have never heard a drummer, a fifer, a clarinetist, a contrabassist, a bagpiper, or even an organgrinder, outlawed for performing on his special instrument, and this circumstance unmistakably indicates something inherently disgraceful in association with the violin, which, when called by its proper English name, "fiddle," sinks to a depth of shame and ignominy which language has no power to describe.

In conclusion, we have only to state that none will be quicker or more happy than ourselves to make the most cordial acknowledgment in these columns of every good point that Mr. Henschel's leading may develop; but, on the other hand, we shall continue to write of his faults as we find them, undeterred by anonymous letter-writers lacking the courage to father their malevolent detractions, and with a hearty contempt for all insinuations from any quarter which impugn the sincerity of our course or the honesty of our motives.

It may not be out of place here to make a few comments on the subject of the Philharmonic Society in connection with Bernhard Listemann. Fault has been found with it for having dispensed with Mr. Listemann's services as conductor, and much has been said in the way of sympathy for the wrongs he is presumed to have sustained. He is generally supposed to have been crushed in his efforts to establish a permanent orchestra here, and by the Philharmonic Society. The facts of the case are simply that Mr. Listemann also had his Mr. Higginson, whose name is Mr. A. P. Peck, and whatever credit is due to the conception of the enterprise that passed under Mr. Listemann's name belongs to Mr. Peck, who for two years acted the part of patron towards him, meeting the expenses and providing the necessary means to carry on the undertaking. The concert failed to attract the public or to prove remunerative, and not being a Cresus, Mr. Peck, after bearing as great a loss as he felt he could sustain, retired from the contest. About this time the Philharmonic Society was founded, and Mr. Listemann being the most available conductor in the field, was empowered to engage a large orchestra and to conduct it. That the society was organized in his interests is not borne out by the facts. At the outset there were some consultations having a bearing in that direction; but as the undertaking progressed it assumed larger proportions, based on the design of establishing a permanent musical society here. No delay was made in correcting the first opinion that had gone abroad, and the society was formed on the improved and more comprehensive plan. Mr. Listemann was employed to conduct the orchestra, and received the salary he demanded for performing that duty. As the season progressed he was found to be impracticable, and by the time the first series of concerts was over the question of a change for next season was agitated, excited somewhat by the fact that Mr. Listemann had engaged himself to be the leading violin of the new Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was argued by some that his duties in his subordinate place would be so exacting as to absorb too much of his attention from his more important task as conductor of the Philharmonic Society; and by others, that he had compromised the dignity of the conductorship of one orchestra by accepting a less prominent place in another. These facts, taken together with what were considered other causes for discontent, bore their fruits. It is unnecessary to go into a discussion of the details in which Mr. Listemann failed to prove satisfactory to the government of the society. It is sufficient that there were grounds for complaint, perhaps on both sides. At a meeting called for the special consideration of a conductor for the ensuing season, at which nineteen out of twenty-five members of the Board of Directors were present, the question was discussed. Then a written ballot was taken, resulting in a scattering vote for four gentlemen, Mr. Listemann not receiving a single vote. The subject was then recommitted to the Music Committee, who reported two other names. At a subsequent meeting, held for a consideration of this report, Mr. Maas was elected. Now, to accuse the Board of Directors, which includes the names of some of our most influential and respected business men, with baseness and dishonorable dealing because they acted in what they considered the best interests of the society is as malicious, as unreasonable, and as paltry a piece of partisanship as can well be imagined, even when perpetrated under the protection of an incognito. We hope we have done for good and all with these unpleasant subjects, and we take leave of them with the reflection that incompetency cannot be rallied into competency, though it may be into popularity.

THE SEVENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last night was certainly a varied one, in which every auditor must have found something to his taste. It was, as a whole, excellently carried out, very few flaws of performance being perceptible and but few faults of direction. It began with the ever charming and, for Mozart, audacious Magic Flute overture. It was bright, crisp and clear throughout. Miss Winant's songs were an aria by Rossi, and a selection from Weber's Abu Hassan. Both were of the legato order of vocalism, the former being chiefly in the very deepest register, and containing the usual single contrast and reprise of the old Italian school. In this Miss Winant did not force the lower tones and the result was a very fine rendering. In the other number her enunciation was of the clearest and her phrasing admirable, but the pronunciation of the Italian was variable. This, however, is a minor fault and was forgotten in the great beauty and tenderness with which she invested the love song. The symphony was Beethoven's Fourth (B flat), and as far as execution went, was admirable. The opening adagio, with its stationary tone in the horns and wind, and shifting string harmonies, was finely shaded; the abrupt violin scales which lead into the allegro were vigorous and clear; the second theme, of the bassoons, was admirable; the shading of the strings at the return to the first theme was beautifully done, and the questionable F sharp avoided. In the third movement, the graceful violin figure which daintily answers the woodwind was clear and effective; evidently the conductor had seized the salient points of the work and made all the work of the rehearsals tell, where it would do the most good. But the adagio seemed to us taken at too slow a pace, and the final allegro ma non troppo seemed to have lost the non troppo. It could not have been taken at a quicker pace. This tendency to exaggerate, and to individualize classical works, has led to the numerous varying opinions about Mr. Henschel. It is always hazardous to attack the idol of an art-craze or an admiration society, and to reject the simple creed,—"I believe in Henschel and all his works," or to disagree with one of his conceptions, is to evoke a storm of uneducated hostility. Even were these tendencies absent, it is folly to suppose that a perfect conductor could spring, Minerva-like, without previous preparation, from—the scheme of a wealthy art-patron. Mr. Henschel has already done good work for Boston; so have Mr. Listemann, Mr. Lang, and Mr. Zerrahn; and their readings have a title to equal respect with those of this highly-gifted innovator, who, by the thorough use of exceptional advantages, has given Boston, in some respects, better performances than it was able to obtain with regularity before. The Gluck Ballet Music, which followed the symphony, was of the arrangement of Pere Gevaert, and gave an opportunity to the strings to display some broad and heavy (sometimes raspy) bowing. It was of that square cut order of counterpoint, which is so easily followed, and which consists largely in imitations between the high and deep strings. The overture to La Dame Blanche, with its jovial themes and flute tootings, was excellently played, and sent everybody home in a good humor. The next concert presents Overture (Athalie), Op. 74, Mendelssohn; Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, Op. 33, Saint-Saens; Mr. Bayrhafer. Symphony in C minor, No. 1, Op. 68, Brahms; Adagio for Violoncello in G, Op. 38, Bargiel; Mr. Bayrhafer. Symphonic Poem (Les Preludes), Liszt.

—There is nothing so well calculated to arouse mingled feelings in the mind of an attendant upon a concert as to have two musically learned young women sit directly behind him and give their views about the selections before they are performed. They criticise with great confidence and acumen, saying that this Beethoven Symphony is grand, and that selection from Gluck or Boieldieu uninteresting and trivial. So they listen intently and quietly to the former, and during the performance of the latter relax their minds and chatter about the fashions or the last party. And yet some persons, utterly failing to appreciate the advantages of hearing the music and their innocent prattle at the same time, look at them icily and with wicked thoughts of homicide in their hearts, and seem to think that the orchestra should have their entire attention. How absurd some people are!—they even appear to believe that instrumental music is to be listened to silently, and not to be considered as an accompaniment for school-girl gabble. It is difficult to speak with patience of persons with such extraordinary views.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert.

The Boston Symphony orchestra gave its seventh concert in Music hall on Saturday evening. Miss Emily Winant was the soloist, and the programme was as follows:

Post

Overture. (Magic Flute).....	Mozart
Air. (Mitane , 1826).....	Rossi
Symphony in B flat. No. 4. op. 60.....	Beethoven
Ballet music. No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses celebres	Gluck
Air. (Abu Hassan).....	Weber
Overture. (La Dame Blanche).....	Boieldieu

Miss Winant possesses a voice, the good qualities of which are as yet scarcely appreciated by the average concert audience of this city, although she has sung here quite a number of times during the past three or four years. A fine contralto is indeed a rarity, and in many respects Miss Winant is unequalled. Miss Cary alone excepted. Her singing was one of the best features of the programme, especially her interpretation of Weber's air. The work of the orchestra was, in general, remarkably fine.

The programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday evening was varied and of a high degree of excellence. It comprised Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute," Beethoven's fourth symphony in B flat, Gluck's ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's "Suites des danses celebres," and Boieldieu's overture to "La Dame Blanche." Miss Emily Winant, the soloist of the evening, also sang an air by Rossi, and a selection from Weber's, "Abu Hassan." The concert as a whole was extremely interesting, and was marked by some of the best work the orchestra has yet performed. The opening notes of Mozart's overture were agreeably suggestive of the pleasures of the evening. They were taken with great confidence and in perfect style and unison, and the entire performance of this selection left almost no room for any but favorable comment. A lack of perfect unanimity by the brasses in the strong passage allotted to them was the only suggestion of harshness in the performance, and this is hardly to be mentioned in view of the general excellence of the work. The perfect accord of the strings in the overture was indicative of careful training and practice, and was most agreeable. The performance of the symphony showed fine execution and an excellent interpretation of the composer's thought, and the exquisite work of the violins—particularly in the rich crescendo and diminuendo passages in the second movement, with the sustained strong and soft measures which succeed each respectively—was worthy of all praise. The third movement was also beautifully played, but the conclusion of the symphony was given considerably faster than the directions of allegro ma non troppo would seem to countenance. Indeed, during a large part of the symphony there were evidently several different interpretations of measures whose character should have been the same. As a whole, however, this symphony had a more satisfactory performance than any others of the series that have already been given. The improved work of the orchestra in the production of these grand tone-poems suggests that many attendants upon the concerts would be gratified if they could have more than one performance of the best of them. The demand of lovers of music is not for great variety, but for excellent performances, and they would find more pleasure in improved repetitions of a few representative compositions than in all the miscellaneous selections of an entire season's programmes. It is impossible to exhaust the beauties of these great works, and equally impossible to offer more than a suggestion of their wealth to those whose slight musical knowledge has not given them a large acquaintance with the truly excellent in this department of art. Thus it would seem well, both to please the learned in music and to educate those who desire to know better of it, to give repetitions of some of these works at convenient times in the future. The ballet music of Gluck gave opportunities for good work which were well improved, especially by the strings, both high and deep. The composition, however, was not particularly interesting, and the same may be said of the closing overture, although it gave occasion for soloistic notes in the strings and presented some sweet and agreeable harmonies. Miss Winant sang her selections with grace and skill, but rather coldly and uninterestingly. The selections chosen by her were similar in style, and afforded her little opportunity to show variety in her method, and displayed her voice in its lower register chiefly. She was several times recalled after her last song. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Athalia," op. 74, Mendelssohn; Concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 33, Saint-Saens; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Adagio for violoncello in G, op. 38, Bargiel; Symphonic Poem, "Les Preudes," Liszt. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Bayrhafer.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening, with Mr. Georg Henschel as the conductor and Miss Emily Winant as the soloist. The orchestral programme included the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute"; Beethoven's "Symphony in B flat, No. 4, Op. 60"; Ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's suites de danses celebres, Gluck; and Boieldieu's overture to "La Dame Blanche." The treatment of the orchestra was broad and catholic, and the interpretations under the conductor's baton were marked with vigor, smoothness and clearness. Miss Winant sang Rossi's air for "Mitrane," composed in 1686, and an air from Weber's "Abu Hassan," with the same artistic elegance which is always a prominent feature of her renditions.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The seventh concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening with the following programme:

Overture. (Magic flute).....	Mozart
Air. (Mitrane, 1686).....	Rossi
Symphony in B flat. No. 4, op. 60.....	Beethoven
Ballet music. No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses celebres.....	Gluck
Air. (Abu Hassan).....	Weber
Overture. (La dame blanche).....	Boieldieu

Miss Emily Winant was the soloist, and the lady surpassed all her previous efforts here in the two numbers assigned her. The Weber air was sung in an almost faultless manner, the phrasing of the graceful measures commanding the highest praise, and every note being given with a truthfulness and purity of intonation that left no cause for criticism. The programme of orchestral selections was the most enjoyable of the series yet heard, and it is unnecessary to use further space to speak in detail of the merits of the several numbers, where all were so admirably well played.

Home Journal

Musical.

2nd 10 1881

"A DANIEL COME TO JUDGMENT!"

In the Sunday issue of the Boston Herald of Nov. 27th, appeared an article headed, "Mr. Henschel's Critics Criticized"; an article of such great ability, stamping its writer as possessed of such a powerful mind, that it ought not to be allowed to pass unnoticed by such as may have been deprived of a reading of its profound wisdom. The writer in the very beginning gives so good and thorough a reason for "rushing into print," that none can gainsay its power. The gentleman is a "regular subscriber" (doubtless to the unlimited extent of ten dollars), and a "constant attendant upon the symphony concerts of the present season." Could anything give him a stronger right or more decided ability for unbiased, genuine criticism of the people known to the public in general as "musical critics," but to the unprejudiced mind of this lover of "public good" as "Mr. Henschel's critics," all other personalities and abilities being forever overshadowed by the greatness of that gentleman's abilities as basso, composer and conductor? To be sure there are still persons who think that a fair review of the various criticisms of the critics in question; a text and letter proof of their falseness, and an undoubted proof of the ability which places Mr. Henschel beyond the possibility of criticism, might be more satisfactory; but such people fail to appreciate the greatness of this piece of journalism. Gentlemen of the press, do we fully realize the magnanimity of this powerful mind, which has spared us so much? Just review the article in question. How powerfully true are its deductions; how plainly has he proved that there is not one among us who "has had any special training for the responsible duty of pointing out Mr. Henschel's defects and short comings as a conductor." And until this time our own gross ignorance has blinded us to the fact that any "special training" was necessary, and we have supposed that Mr. Henschel was to be judged and criticised by the same rules and musical laws as others who have stood in the place of conductor to previous symphony concerts. Oh, lamentable ignorance! The wisdom of argument, the power of special deduction from assorted facts, the evident musical knowledge of the article, and above all the "journalistic courtesy" which in all cases provides that as a gentleman the writer avoids all personalities not bearing obviously on the case in question; is so plain in a single reading, that it seems hardly worth while to pause and point out their evidences. It is rarely that we have an opportunity to read such a fair, unbiased article. From beginning to end we can but feel that the signature, "Pro Bono Publico," is no mistake. The writer is evidently a lover and friend of the public good, most certainly unacquainted with Mr. Henschel personally, and most unbiased in all his assertions. The evident propriety of the signature, "Pro Bono Publico," instead of "Pro Bono" Henschel, is undoubted. This great and good man who has issued from his modest retirement for the public good, has kindly given us some knowledge of Mr. Henschel which may prove most valuable to those who will occupy our places when we step "down and out," as we necessarily must after this full exposure of our lack of ability. Mr. Henschel is a "born musician," and is "recognized as a peer and brother by the greatest composers of Europe." We did not realize that the position of conductor entitled him, not only to the extortionate sum of ten thousand dollars for twenty concerts, but also to utter exemption from criticism. We have labored under the false idea that Mr. Henschel was to win his spurs before he wore them. Gentlemen of the press, it was a gross mistake! These concerts given "under circumstances never before known in the world's history" we ignorantly supposed were to present Mr. Henschel to us in the light of a new conductor in all senses of that word, and that as such we were at liberty to criticize, in as far as our limited abilities would permit; and we have objected to his tempi in various cases; we have suggested the ridiculous possibility that the various composers may have had distinct ideas of the tempi in which their various compositions were to be taken; we have vainly thought that less sweep of baton, which attracted so much attention and seemed to interfere with the full enjoyment of the music, would be an improvement; and in all these, and other assertions we forget that it was not the music, but Mr. Henschel's unequalled conductorship, which called for attention, admiration and entire absence of criticism. We know better now! We feel that Mr. Higginson's money has been put to far better use than simply to please and educate the public, and place orchestral concerts at such low rates as to be to the advantage of all. It has caused us to see and know Mr. Henschel, a musician and conductor so great that the pen of the critic must rust unless employed in his laudation. Gentlemen of the musical press, we are to day subdued, quenched! Let us, with whatever of dignity we can assume, advance to our respective newspaper offices and collect what may be due to us before we retire to oblivion forever. We stand to-day in the Valley of Humiliation, but our lives are spared! This blast of Jove-like wisdom has subdued us; another such would mean total annihilation! So let us be wise in time and withdraw. We shall not be entirely without company. Such a powerful article will not fail in being copied over the civilized world, and we shall be joined by the great army of those who in other lands have ventured on the same self-destructive course and criticised Mr. Henschel. English critics, who have been considered as lights in the musical world, have ventured on this course, little knowing what they did. To be sure they did not venture to speak of his abilities as a conductor, for so dense was their ignorance that they did not know he possessed such. Sir Julius Benedict laid down the baton of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, and the directors, instead of instantly and unanimously placing it in the hands of Georg Henschel, absolutely remained ignorant that such a person existed, and in connection with the vacancy thought of only two persons who could by any possibility fill that place, and one of the two was almost a unanimous choice. But as an oratorio singer, English critics spoke in their ignorance words that will, when the light of "Pro Bono Publico's" wisdom is shed on them, cause them to meet us where we stand to-day, and in the depths of humility we shall clasp hands. Even as late as Sept. 10th, 1881, a well known and supposed competent English critic failed to acknowledge Mr. Henschel's superiority, and this after the American Eagle had screamed and flapped its wings for nearly a year (in the form of at least one Boston paper) in favor of Mr. Henschel as the greatest living exponent of oratorio music. This daring critic says:

"Of Mr. Henschel we cannot speak in a complimentary manner. Herr Henschel has been received with favor in London concert rooms, but there is a wide difference between rendering a song of Schumann or Brahms, and sustaining such arduous labor as that of giving adequate effect to the music Mendelssohn has composed for Elijah. There was not the dignity, not the tone, not the religious fervor required to do justice to the music of the Prophet, and it was generally regretted that a vocalist of higher powers had not been intrusted with it. When we remember what Mr. Santley used to accomplish as Elijah, we cannot but wonder that Herr Henschel appeared to represent so important a part, especially as we have a number of Eng-

Seventh Symphony Concert. Journal

The programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday evening was varied and of a high degree of excellence. It comprised Mozart's overture to the "Magic Flute," Beethoven's fourth symphony in B flat, Gluck's ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's "Suites des danses celebres," and Boieldieu's overture to "La Dame Blanche." Miss Emily Winant, the soloist of the evening, also sang an air by Rossi, and a selection from Weber's, "Abu Hassan." The concert as a whole was extremely interesting, and was marked by some of the best work the orchestra has yet performed. The opening notes of Mozart's overture were agreeably suggestive of the pleasures of the evening. They were taken with great confidence and in perfect style and unison, and the entire performance of this selection left almost no room for any but favorable comment. A lack of perfect unanimity by the brasses in the strong passage allotted to them was the only suggestion of harshness in the performance, and this is hardly to be mentioned in view of the general excellence of the work. The perfect accord of the strings in the overture was indicative of careful training and practice, and was most agreeable. The performance of the symphony showed fine execution and an excellent interpretation of the composer's thought, and the exquisite work of the violins—particularly in the rich crescendo and diminuendo passages in the second movement, with the sustained strong and soft measures which succeed each respectively—was worthy of all praise. The third movement was also beautifully played, but the conclusion of the symphony was given considerably faster than the directions of allegro ma non troppo would seem to countenance. Indeed, during a large part of the symphony there were evidently several different interpretations of measures whose character should have been the same. As a whole, however, this symphony had a more satisfactory performance than any others of the series that have already been given. The improved work of the orchestra in the production of these grand tone-poems suggests that many attendants upon the concerts would be gratified if they could have more than one performance of the best of them. The demand of lovers of music is not for great variety, but for excellent performances, and they would find more pleasure in improved repetitions of a few representative compositions than in all the miscellaneous selections of an entire season's programmes. It is impossible to exhaust the beauties of these great works, and equally impossible to offer more than a suggestion of their wealth to those whose slight musical knowledge has not given them a large acquaintance with the truly excellent in this department of art. Thus it would seem well, both to please those who desire to know better of it, to give repetitions of some of these works at convenient times in the future. The ballet music of Gluck gave opportunities for good work which were well improved, especially by the strings, both high and deep. The composition, however, was not particularly interesting, and the same may be said of the closing overture, although it gave occasion for sonorous notes in the strings and presented some sweet and agreeable harmonies. Miss Winant sang her selections with grace and skill, but rather coldly and uninterestingly. The selections chosen by her were similar in style, and afforded her little opportunity to show variety in her method, and displayed her voice in its lower register chiefly. She was several times recalled after her last song. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Athalie," op. 74, Mendelssohn; Concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 33, Saint-Saens; Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Adagio for violoncello in G, op. 38, Bargiel; Symphonic Poem, "Les Preñades," Liszt. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Bayrthoffer.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra series took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening, with Mr. Georg Henschel as the conductor and Miss Emily Winant as the soloist. The orchestral programme included the overture to Mozart's "Magic Flute"; Beethoven's "Symphony in B flat, No. 4, Op. 60"; Ballet music, No. 1 of Gevaert's suites de danses celebres, Gluck; and Boieldieu's overture to "La Dame Blanche." The treatment of the orchestra was broad and catholic, and the interpretations under the conductor's baton were marked with vigor, smoothness and clearness. Miss Winant sang Rossi's air for "Mitrane," composed in 1686, and an air from Weber's "Abu Hassan," with the same artistic elegance which is always a prominent feature of her renditions.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concerts.

The seventh concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening with the following programme:

Overture. (Magic flute).....	Mozart
Air. (Mitrane, 1686).....	Rossi
Symphony in B flat. No. 4, op. 60.....	Beethoven
Ballet music. No. 1 of Gevaert's Suites de danses celebres.....	Gluck
Air. (Abu Hassan).....	Weber
Overture. (La dame blanche).....	Boieldieu

Miss Emily Winant was the soloist, and the lady surpassed all her previous efforts here in the two numbers assigned her. The Weber air was sung in an almost faultless manner, the phrasing of the graceful measures commanding the highest praise, and every note being given with a truthfulness and purity of intonation that left no cause for criticism. The programme of orchestral selections was the most enjoyable of the series yet heard, and it is unnecessary to use further space to speak in detail of the merits of the several numbers, where all were so admirably well played.

Musical.

"A DANIEL COME TO JUDGMENT!"

In the Sunday issue of the Boston Herald of Nov. 27th, appeared an article headed, "Mr. Henschel's Critics Criticized"; an article of such great ability, stamping its writer as possessed of such a powerful mind, that it ought not to be allowed to pass unnoticed by such as may have been deprived of a reading of its profound wisdom. The writer in the very beginning gives so good and thorough a reason for "rushing into print," that none can gainsay its power. The gentleman is a "regular subscriber" (doubtless to the unlimited extent of ten dollars), and a "constant attendant upon the symphony concerts of the present season." Could anything give him a stronger right or more decided ability for unbiased, genuine criticism of the people known to the public in general as "musical critics," but to the unprejudiced mind of this lover of "public good" as "Mr. Henschel's critics," all other personalities and abilities being forever overshadowed by the greatness of that gentleman's abilities as basso, composer and conductor? To be sure there are still persons who think that a fair review of the various criticisms of the critics in question; a text and letter proof of their falseness, and an undoubted proof of the ability which places Mr. Henschel beyond the possibility of criticism, might be more satisfactory; but such people fail to appreciate the greatness of this piece of journalism. Gentlemen of the press, do we fully realize the magnanimity of this powerful mind, which has spared us so much? Just review the article in question. How powerfully true are its deductions; how plainly has he proved that there is not one among us who "has had any special training for the responsible duty of pointing out Mr. Henschel's defects and shortcomings as a conductor." And until this time our own gross ignorance has blinded us to the fact that any "special training" was necessary, and we have supposed that Mr. Henschel was to be judged and criticized by the same rules and musical laws as others who have stood in the place of conductor to previous symphony concerts. Oh, lamentable ignorance! The wisdom of argument, the power of special deduction from assorted facts, the evident musical knowledge of the article, and above all the "journalistic courtesy" which in all cases provides that as a gentleman the writer avoids all personalities not bearing obviously on the case in question; is so plain in a single reading, that it seems hardly worth while to pause and point out their evidences. It is rarely that we have an opportunity to read such a fair, unbiased article. From beginning to end we can but feel that the signature, "Pro Bono Publico," is no mistake. The writer is evidently a lover and friend of the public good, most certainly unacquainted with Mr. Henschel personally, and most unbiassed in all his assertions. The evident propriety of the signature, "Pro Bono Publico," instead of "Pro Bono" Henschel, is undoubted. This great and good man who has issued from his modest retirement for the public good, has kindly given us some knowledge of Mr. Henschel which may prove most valuable to those who will occupy our places when we step "down and out," as we necessarily must after this full exposure of our lack of ability. Mr. Henschel is a "born musician," and is "recognized as a peer and brother by the greatest composers of Europe." We did not realize that the position of conductor entitled him, not only to the extortionate sum of ten thousand dollars for twenty concerts, but also to utter exemption from criticism. We have labored under the false idea that Mr. Henschel was to win his spurs before he wore them. Gentlemen of the press, it was a gross mistake! These concerts given "under circumstances never before known in the world's history" we ignorantly supposed were to present Mr. Henschel to us in the light of a new conductor in all senses of that word, and that as such we were at liberty to criticize, in as far as our limited abilities would permit; and we have objected to his tempi in various cases; we have suggested the ridiculous possibility that the various composers may have had distinct ideas of the tempi in which their various compositions were to be taken; we have vainly thought that less sweep of baton, which attracted so much attention and seemed to interfere with the full enjoyment of the music, would be an improvement; and in all these, and other assertions we forget that it was not the music, but Mr. Henschel's unequalled conductorship, which called for attention, admiration and entire absence of criticism. We know better now! We feel that Mr. Higginson's money has been put to far better use than simply to please and educate the public, and place orchestral concerts at such low rates as to be to the advantage of all. It has caused us to see and know Mr. Henschel, a musician and conductor so great that the pen of the critic must rust unless employed in his laudation. Gentlemen of the musical press, we are to day subdued, quenched! Let us, with whatever of dignity we can assume, advance to our respective newspaper offices and collect what may be due to us before we retire to oblivion forever. We stand to-day in the Valley of Humiliation, but our lives are spared! This blast of Jove-like wisdom has subdued us; another such would mean total annihilation! So let us be wise in time and withdraw. We shall not be entirely without company. Such a powerful article will not fail in being copied over the civilized world, and we shall be joined by the great army of those who in other lands have ventured on the same self-destructive course and criticized Mr. Henschel. English critics, who have been considered as lights in the musical world, have ventured on this course, little knowing what they did. To be sure they did not venture to speak of his abilities as a conductor, for so dense was their ignorance that they did not know he possessed such. Sir Julius Benedict laid down the baton of the Liverpool Philharmonic Society, and the directors, instead of instantly and unanimously placing it in the hands of Georg Henschel, absolutely remained ignorant that such a person existed, and in connection with the vacancy thought of only two persons who could by any possibility fill that place, and one of the two was almost an unanimous choice. But as an oratorio singer, English critics spoke in their ignorance words that will, when the light of "Pro Bono Publico's" wisdom is shed on them, cause them to meet us where we stand to-day, and in the depths of humility we shall clasp hands. Even as late as Sept. 10th, 1881, a well known and supposed competent English critic failed to acknowledge Mr. Henschel's superiority, and this after the American Eagle had screamed and flapped its wings for nearly a year (in the form of at least one Boston paper) in favor of Mr. Henschel as the greatest living exponent of oratorio music. This daring critic says:

"Of Mr. Henschel we cannot speak in a complimentary manner. Herr Henschel has been received with favor in London concert rooms, but there is a wide difference between rendering a song of Schumann or Brahms, and sustaining such arduous labor as that of giving adequate effect to the music Mendelssohn has composed for Elijah. There was not the dignity, not the tone, not the religious fervor required to do justice to the music of the Prophet, and it was generally regretted that a vocalist of higher powers had not been intrusted with it. When we remember what Mr. Santley used to accomplish as Elijah, we cannot but wonder that Herr Henschel appeared to represent so important a part, especially as we have a number of English vocalists who in volume of tone, precision of execution, and dignity of style, would have done greater justice to Mendelssohn's noble and difficult music."

So in our forced retirement we shall at least have good company, and as we each leave the position for which we have been so ably proved unfitted by "Pro Bono Publico," and seek those humbler walks where such simple intellect as ours may find fitter employment, let us carry with us the consoling conviction that we have not lived in vain. But for the daring efforts we have made at attempting to criticize one whose intellect, position, ability, and even whose "friends" have declared beyond all criticism, the great depth of wisdom of "Pro Bono Publico" might still have remained unknown. At least we have called it forth, and if the array of "friends" who "are quite ready to meet" us will only take this fact into consideration, they will perhaps deal gently with us now that we are so humiliated. There are perhaps even in Boston people who will consider the threat that Mr. Henschel's "friends are ready to meet" us as unwise, but it cannot be expected that all ignorance can be enlightened even by the illumination of the Jove-like thunderbolt of "Pro Bono Publico's" wisdom. The Herald has reason to rejoice that from such a source comes the compliment of being exempt from the class who have done such things as "vilify, malign, abuse, and ridicule a gentleman of Mr. Henschel's abilities." We understand now what seemed a mystery before. Always in reading the learned and laudatory articles from those well known pages, it has seemed as if somewhere in our dim consciousness of the past we had heard it all before, like some dim, half remembered strain of melody, carrying us back to other days. We understand it now we remember it all! We, too, have walked and talked with Mr. Henschel's nearest friends!

It is useless to speak further of this matter, but before closing the book and writing "Finis" to our career as musical critic, let us make one appeal to another blameworthy set. I refer to the "indifferent and demoralized" members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Do learn to appreciate the greatness that hovers over you; cease to put difficulties in the way of such philanthropic greatness; which, resigning the heights of musical position in other and musically speaking, far superior lands, has come to our benighted country, in its very infancy of music, to lay its treasures before us, and the friends of such greatness ask only that we fall down and worship! Surely a very slight return for such condescension! So, "old fiddlers," with "books doubled" like "cobblers," for the credit of your conductor, BRACE UP!!

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—

Another crowded audience attended the seventh symphony concert in Music Hall, and the selections performed were brighter, if none the less conservative in character than usual. Mozart's overture to the Magic Flute headed the programme. Next in order was the Beethoven symphony, No 4, in B b major. Both the overture and symphony were admirably played; except that the allegro ma non troppo of the latter work was performed in ludicrously quick time. The conductor as usual became very enthusiastic and appeared wholly carried away by feelings that were not sufficiently tempered by intelligent care. It was fun for the violinists; but so fast was the tempo that the poor double-bass players appeared wholly at a loss as to what to do or how to play, and the ensemble effect, while very exciting, was far from being in accord with the spirit of an allegro ma non troppo. Literally translated allegro ma non troppo means fast, not too fast; as musically translated by the conductor of the Boston symphony orchestra it was made to mean not only fast, but too fast. But then it will be argued that the time has come when it is necessary to apply a new life to the spirit of Beethoven's music; and as we are all aware there is only one man living who can do this sort of thing in Boston with a popular degree of success. Next the audience were treated to a set of dances from two of Gluck's operas, the performance of which was admirable throughout. Miss Emily Winant contributed to the interest of the concert by singing an air from Rossi's opera of Mitrane, written in 1686; and she also contributed the aria by Weber known as "O Fatima." Richness of voice and a soulful and intelligent style were as usual noticeable. At the next concert Mr. Carl Bayrholder will be the soloist. Mr. Bayrholder is a cellist of whom many good things are said. He is undoubtedly a very fine artist; but let us hear him play first, and judge him afterwards. Mr. Bayrholder has the floor.

Home Journal

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Athalia.) Op. 74. MENDELSSOHN.

CONCERTO for Violoncello in A minor, op. 33. SAINT-SAËNS.

Allegro non troppo; Allegretto con moto;

Allegro non troppo.—

SYMPHONY in C minor. No. 1, Op. 68. BRAHMS.

Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.—Andante sostenuto.—Un poco Allegretto e grazioso.—

Adagio; Più Andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio; Più Allegro.—

ADAGIO for Violoncello in G, Op. 38. BARGIEL.

SYMPHONIC POEM. (Les Préludes.) LISZT.

SOLOIST:

MR. CARL BAYRHOFER.

SYMPHONIC POEM.

LISZT.

LES PRÉLUDES.

(After Lamartine.)

Our life—what is it, but a succession of preludes to that unfathomed strain, of which Death strikes the first and solemn note? Love is the enchanting aurora of every heart; but in whose fate have not the first raptures of happiness been interrupted by the rushing of the storm, with rough breath dispelling its gentle illusions, with mortal lightning destroying its altar? And what cruelly wounded soul does not after such tempests seek to lull woful remembrances in the delightful tranquillity of rural life? Yet—Man will not endure too long that beneficial rest in the midst of appeasing sentiments of nature, and when the trumpet has given “the signal of alarm” he rushes to the dangerous post, whatever be the war which calls him to the ranks, that in the tumult of the combat he may at last regain his conscience and the full possession of his strength.—

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—EIGHTH CONCERT.

If the liberal applause which greeted the conclusion of the Brahms symphony, on Saturday evening,—applause much more hearty than had followed either of the earlier movements,—indicated not so much pleasure in that finale itself as a kind of solid satisfaction that the symphony was ended at last, we certainly should find no fault with such an expression. And yet the orchestra had exerted themselves in steady, earnest work, and the conductor had spared no effort to put life and interest into the performance. But for all that it had dragged, and we doubt if many in the audience had derived any substantial pleasure or any coherent thought from even a most attentive listening. In the ten volumes which are needed (in one edition at least) to contain all the songs which Schubert wrote, there are scores of these which are interesting enough if one sits down at the piano-forte with two or three friends, and runs them over, one by one, just to see what the author has made of the poems he had chosen to illustrate in music. As studies in adaptation, these compositions occupy and please, but one would never think of singing them when wishing to give that kind and degree of pleasure which are usually expected from vocal music of that genre. Much of the orchestral music of our time falls into a similar category. If one has the score in hand, and can follow the composer as he wanders from phrase to phrase, and from instrument to instrument, trying to see what he can make out of his materials, an hour may be spent as fairly as one spends it over any curious problem or experiment. But if one asks instead for a clear, consistent development of a few simple but high thoughts, carried out to their loftiest and strongest ultimates for the gratification of his mind, while his senses have been delighted with a gathering and growing flood of symmetrically-evolved harmonies, he will find that the master has given him for bread a stone. And on this precise plane are we inclined to rank the C-minor symphony of Brahms, opus 68, No. 1. With the exception of the short and dignified theme, piu andante, which follows the opening adagio of the fourth movement, there is hardly a subject which would not do about as well in another movement or another tempo than that in which it is set down. The first movement indeed promises something good when, after the slightly-sustained introduction resting on a dull reiterated drum-beat, there dawns a ringing and almost martial subject, in the writing of which occasional groups of a few major chords as they hastily pass give much freshness and relief. But the author soon begins to metamorphose and involve his thought, until the listener is quite perplexed, and knows not whether to wait in hope for the return of a theme which had caught his fancy, or to give himself up to a vague expectance of some things possibly as good yet to come. The third movement has a ballabile character in suggestion, at least, and might perhaps be gratifying, if heard according to its author's marking, because the principal subject, when fairly presented, seems light and clear. But the un poco allegretto—equivalent to something less than allegretto and almost one with andantino—grew to a positive allegro when the full band entered, and of the grazioso not a trace could be recognized. The second movement, andante sostenuto, left but little clear impression, and it is perhaps not wonderful that it relaxed almost to a targo toward the close, and that the audience received it apathetically. On the other hand, if the piu allegro of the finale was given out in so determined a presto that the orchestra were for bars together almost half a beat behind the conductor, there was, at any rate, an animation about it which was not unwelcome after the seemingly uncertain writing which had filled so much of “the precious half-hour.”

The solo instrument of the evening was the violoncello, on which Mr. Carl Bayrhammer executed Saint-Saëns's A-minor concerto, opus 33, and an adagio in G, opus 38, by Bargiel. Mr. Bayrhammer has reached a high point of virtuosity, and the technical difficulties of his work were passed over with an ease and simplicity that made them appear as no difficulties at all. Admirably in tune always, chromatic passages, long roulades and trills, and double-stops, seemed to flow out from under his fingers, rather than be produced by them. But his tone is not sympathetic, and not always even agreeable; it is clear, but there is a stringiness about it often which is vastly provoking, as not being what we feel it right to expect from so excellent an executant. In the second selection, which is melodious and well turned, he was heard to more advantage in this respect. The concerto is written rather upon that Wagnerian principle which considers the solo voice as being, after all, only one in a general whole, and it was somewhat disappointing now and then to feel as though the musical effect would have been equally pleasant, if the obligato by the soloist had been omitted. The allegro begins with a not particularly original or exhilarating group of running passages, but the allegretto is charming; in this an airy theme, of the Algerian type, as authors now present that to us, appears first sotto voce in the orchestra, and then passes to the soloist, and is between them most daintily treated until the first theme reappears, and the concerto ends in an allegro, in leading up to which Mr. Bayrhammer drew from his instrument a group of low tones of much smoothness and steadiness.

An excellent rendering of Mendelssohn's “Athalia” overture began the evening. The strings had an earnest, nervous sound that suited admirably with that gusty passage through which they lead on to the last appearance of the choral phrase of the brass and to the finale itself. The concert ended with Liszt's “Preludes,” which even a hearty hater of “programme music” could hardly dare to decry. There is true poetry and true music in Liszt, and he has here used the orchestra, not experimented with it. The dramatic feeling and taste of the conductor shone resplendent in his reading of this symphonic poem, every phase of which was anticipated and wrought out with great force or fine sentiment at the varying moment required. To both this number and to the overture the well and strongly played harp-part was a welcome addition.

The date of the next concert being coincident with the anniversary of Beethoven's birth, the programme has been prepared with a view to this, and will comprise only music by that master,—his overture to “Egmont,” his fifth symphony, and his pianoforte concerto in G, which will be played by Mr. George W. Sumner.

Eighth Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert given at Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening consisted of Mendelssohn's overture to "Athalia," concerto in A minor for violoncello, opus 33, by Saint-Saëns, Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1, opus 68, an adagio in G for violoncello by Bargiel, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The concert throughout was one of the most satisfactory of the season, although its lack of decided variety might be considered as making it less interesting than some of those which have preceded it. The programme, however, contained some grand music, which was finely interpreted, the performance of the musicians throughout being characterized by unusual earnestness, intelligence, and mingled vigor and expression. There were almost no suggestions of radical faults in any part of the performance, and the occasional errors which might have been noticed were lost sight of in the view of general excellence. The parts which seemed particularly well given were the final measure of the symphony and the concluding number of the programme. A thorough conception of the thought of the composer of the former work, which was indicated during its early measures, was thoroughly proved in the finale, and the orchestra was never heard to so good advantage as in it. The selection by Liszt was given with all the skill and feeling necessary to describe its ever-changing moods. The contrasts are great and make exacting demands upon an orchestra, but all were well met, and the concluding theme, with its military character and force, was given an even more than necessary vigor. The soloist of the evening, Mr. Carl Bayrhafer, showed himself to be an artist of fine parts, excellent promise and considerable present accomplishment. His selections were played in excellent style and with great purity and depth of tone, although a suggestion of timidity was gained during the opening bars of his first selection. This was soon overcome, however, and during the remainder of the evening he played with fine effect. Next Saturday evening being the anniversary of Beethoven's birth, a programme comprising solely works of his composition will be performed. Mr. George W. Sumner will be the soloist.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The seventh concert, given last Saturday evening, was an occasion of peculiar interest. Johannes Brahms's first symphony in C-minor, the work which the composer is said to have kept in his portfolio for ten years before giving it to the world, and the first appearance of which in Germany created more excitement than has been called forth by any symphonic composition of the present period, was given under conditions which are noteworthy of themselves. Mr. Henschel is a personal, intimate friend and warm admirer of Brahms; if anything could force him to assume a less catholic position in relation to the art of music than he actually occupies, and to take a quasi-factional stand in musical politics, it is safe to say that he would be willing to be accepted as a "Brahmsianer." It is thus quite supposable that Mr. Henschel has derived his conception of this symphony, if not directly a loco superiore, at least from a long and sympathetic study of the master's works, in which study his personal relations with the composer must have been of no little assistance to him. One naturally felt, in hearing the C-minor symphony under Mr. Henschel's direction, that one got as authentic a version of the work as would be humanly possible except from the composer himself, at first hand.

The symphony has been given here three times before, twice at the Harvard concerts, under Mr. Zerrahn, and once by Mr. Thomas. The impression produced by it at these first hearings was in general a perplexed one; it was at once recognized as a work which it would take no common amount of study to become really acquainted with, but many persons felt too doubtful about such study being rewarded in the end, to feel inclined to spend much time and labor in trying to fathom the meaning of so apparently distracting (and distracted) a composition. As far as we ourselves are concerned, Mr. Henschel's two performances of the symphony (at rehearsal and concert) have done much to whet our appetite for closer study of a work which was at first peculiarly repelling. It is not often that one finds a composer so terribly, so almost painfully in earnest as Brahms is in this symphony. For one thing, it displays all of Brahms's salient characteristics as a composer in a stronger light than anything else he has written. The very consciousness that he was, so to speak, about to strike a decisive blow for fame as a symphonist, the instinctive feeling that his friends expected great things of him, and that by this symphony his reputation must either be impregably secured or else fall to the ground, seems to have led Brahms to put every bit of himself, his whole heart, soul and brains into the work. There can be no doubt that under these trying conditions Brahms went to work in the right way, that he labored strenuously to satisfy his own highest ideal, without regard for the taste or predilections of his public, so as to be able to say in the end, "Here you have me, the whole of me, and nothing but me." Perhaps this very consciousness of how much he had at stake, this grim determination to write a great work at all hazards, may have reacted unfortunately upon the composer's inspiration. With all the good that can be said of the symphony, there is a certain flavor of the lamp about it. If it is great, it is consciously and intentionally great. If Brahms have a failing, it is that he becomes at times so self-absorbed in writing as to forget the natural demands of the human ear; it seems often as if he did not think to ask himself, "How will this sound?" Although by nature the least conventional of men, he seems at times to accept certain conventions unheedingly whenever they do not immediately touch the point which interests him most for the time being. Take, for instance, his very frequent treatment of the violins in their highest register. It is often hard to see that he has any definite orchestral effect in view when he makes his first violins play very high; the passages in which he employs them thus are too interesting in themselves to make any intrinsically orchestral effect necessary; it seems rather as if he wrote his violin part very high simply because it is the general modern custom to do so, without considering that the orchestral effects aimed at by contemporary composers have nothing to do with his peculiar musical tendencies. There are hosts of passages in this symphony in which one wishes heartily that he had written his first violins an octave lower; the violent, high, shrill tones are disagreeable to the ear, and add nothing to the vigor or the brilliancy of the effect. In listening to the work, we can grasp its beauties only after willfully overcoming a painful physical impression. Brahms's harmonies are certainly not more cacophonous than Wagner's; yet the former does not succeed in softening down the harshness of certain progressions by a clever handling of the orchestra, as the latter does; his music often sounds heartily ill. While composing, Brahms seems to enter into that state of somnambulism in which one hears with the inner ear alone, and not with the ordinary auditory organs which serve one when awake. One of the most curious items in his genius is his sentimentalism. In general he is anything but sentimental, but there are moments when he launches out into passages of the most gushing sweetness, with all the ardor of a man to whom the indulgence in sentimentality is a rare luxury. It is well known that Darwin is in the habit of reading all the trashy novels that come out, as a means of resting his hard-worked brain; Brahms's occasional indulgence in sentimental sweetness reminds one a little of this; when he does unbend, he does so with a vengeance, and presents the curious picture of a man who habitually lives in an intellectual sphere far above that of his associates suddenly diving down into regions which most men would avoid as commonplace and uninspiring. We have given these general impressions as they have come to us at repeated hearings of the symphony, for we are still far from feeling enough at home in the work to speak intelligently about it in detail. For one thing, it sounds better, is more interesting, and we enjoy it more and more every time we hear it; but we have not yet succeeded in catching the musical essence of all its parts. Technically speaking, the performance was, in general, very fine; but we are, as yet, wholly incompetent to speak of it from any other point of view. The performance of Mendelssohn's overture to "Athalia" was very inspiring; that of Liszt's "Les Preludes" by no means so smooth, technically speaking, and as it slapped all our preconceived notions of the composition directly in the face, we do not feel called upon to praise it in any way. It was certainly ineffective enough. Mr. Bayrhafer, the new leading 'cello of the orchestra, played Saint-Saëns's A-minor concerto and an adagio by Bargiel. The young artist was evidently too nervous to do himself justice, and it was hard to form a correct estimate of his capabilities as a solo player from his performance.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Eighth Concert.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall, last evening, the programme being as follows:

Overture ("Athalia"), op. 74.....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello in A minor,
op. 33.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Adagio for violoncello in G, op. 38.....Bargiel
Symphonic poem, ("Les Preludes").....Liszt

The Saint-Saëns and Bargiel numbers introduced Mr. Carl Bayrhafer as a 'cello soloist, the gentleman having been a resident of this city but a few months, but identified with the

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The great pressure upon our columns renders it impossible to give an analysis of the concert of last night, and we can briefly say that, as a whole, it was the most satisfactory of the series thus far, both in its programme and its execution. The great Brahms symphony in C minor was almost faultless; the strange effects of the contrabassoon and of the capricious pizzicati at the finale were well brought out. The great contrasts of Liszt's Les Preludes were strongly drawn, sweeping from bliss on the flutes, to despair on the bassoons, but never verging on the ridiculous as with Berlioz. The final theme, with its pompous military ending, could not have been made more grandiose. Mr. Henschel can be proud of the general work of the evening. Mr. Bayrhafer performed two violoncello numbers with most artistic effect; beginning with a trifle of nervousness, but immediately recovering himself and playing with fire and purity. The next concert will be wholly a Beethoven one, in honor of the master's birthday.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—On Saturday evening, at Music Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, gave the eighth concert of the series, to the great enjoyment of a large and enthusiastic audience. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's overture to "Athalia"; Saint-Saëns's Concerto in A minor for the 'cello; Brahms's Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68; Bargiel's Adagio in G for the 'cello; and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes." Mr. Henschel's orchestra played with an eloquent power of expression, brilliancy of color, and absolute absence of crudeness of tone, which was coupled with precision and refinement everywhere noticeable. The soloist was Mr. Carl Bayrhafer, whose numbers were rendered with superb strength and accuracy, and who proved to be a valuable addition to our local musicians. Traveller

Eighth Symphony Concert, Globe

The many patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts were treated last evening to the following programme: Overture (Athalia), op. 74, Mendelssohn; concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 33, Saint-Saëns; symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; adagio for violoncello in G, op. 38, Bargiel; symphonic poem (Les Preludes), Liszt. At the close of the first number on the programme Mr. Carl Bayrhafer, the soloist of the evening, stepped from his familiar place among the orchestra and gave a most pleasing and intelligent interpretation of the beautiful violoncello concerto, to the great pleasure and evident appreciation of the audience. By far the most taking thing in the programme, however, was the closing number—Liszt's splendid symphonic poem, which was played as only such an organization can play it.

orchestra since its formation. His tone is large, true and sympathetic, his technique good, and his playing, notably in the Saint-Saëns number, proved him to be a musician of rare ability. The audience quickly appreciated his abilities, and rewarded his efforts with generous applause. The orchestral work was quite up to the standard now confidently expected from this body of players, the final movement of the symphony and the Liszt number creating a marked impression by the striking merits of their presentation. Rivulet

Eighth Symphony Concert.

The programme for the concert given at Music Hall by the Boston Symphony Orchestra Saturday evening consisted of Mendelssohn's overture to "Athalia," concerto in A minor for violoncello, opus 33, by Saint-Saens, Brahms's symphony in C minor, No. 1, opus 68, an adagio in G for violoncello by Bargiel, and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes." The concert throughout was one of the most satisfactory of the season, although its lack of decided variety might be considered as making it less interesting than some of those which have preceded it. The programme, however, contained some grand music, which was finely interpreted, the performance of the musicians throughout being characterized by unusual earnestness, intelligence, and mingled vigor and expression. There were almost no suggestions of radical faults in any part of the performance, and the occasional errors which might have been noticed were lost sight of in the view of general excellence. The parts which seemed particularly well given were the final measure of the symphony and the concluding number of the programme. A thorough conception of the thought of the composer of the former work, which was indicated during its early measures, was thoroughly proved in the finale, and the orchestra was never heard to so good advantage as in it. The selection by Liszt was given with all the skill and feeling necessary to describe its ever-changing moods. The contrasts are great and make exacting demands upon an orchestra, but all were well met, and the concluding theme, with its military character and force, was given an even more than necessary vigor. The soloist of the evening, Mr. Carl Bayrhammer, showed himself to be an artist of fine parts, excellent promise and considerable present accomplishment. His selections were played in excellent style and with great purity and depth of tone, although a suggestion of timidity was gained during the opening bars of his first selection. This was soon overcome, however, and during the remainder of the evening he played with fine effect. Next Saturday evening being the anniversary of Beethoven's birth, a programme comprising solely works of his composition will be performed. Mr. George W. Sumner will be the soloist.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The seventh concert, given last Saturday evening, was an occasion of peculiar interest. Johannes Brahms's first symphony in C-minor, the work which the composer is said to have kept in his portfolio for ten years before giving it to the world, and the first appearance of which in Germany created more excitement than has been called forth by any symphonic composition of the present period, was given under conditions which are noteworthy of themselves. Mr. Henschel is a personal, intimate friend and warm admirer of Brahms; if anything could force him to assume a less catholic position in relation to the art of music than he actually occupies, and to take a quasi-factional stand in musical politics, it is safe to say that he would be willing to be accepted as a "Brahmsianer." It is thus quite supposable that Mr. Henschel has derived his conception of this symphony, if not directly a loco superiore, at least from a long and sympathetic study of the master's works, in which study his personal relations with the composer must have been of no little assistance to him. One naturally felt, in hearing the C-minor symphony under Mr. Henschel's direction, that one got as authentic a version of the work as would be humanly possible except from the composer himself, at first hand.

The symphony has been given here three times before, twice at the Harvard concerts, under Mr. Zerrahn, and once by Mr. Thomas. The impression produced by it at these first hearings was in general a perplexed one; it was at once recognized as a work which it would take no common amount of study to become really acquainted with, but many persons felt too doubtful about such study being rewarded in the end, to feel inclined to spend much time and labor in trying to fathom the meaning of so apparently distracting (and distracted) a composition. As far as we ourselves are concerned, Mr. Henschel's two performances of the symphony (at rehearsal and concert) have done much to whet our appetite for closer study of a work which was at first peculiarly repelling. It is not often that one finds a composer so terribly, so almost painfully in earnest as Brahms is in this symphony. For one thing, it displays all of Brahms's salient characteristics as a composer in a stronger light than anything else he has written. The very consciousness that he was, so to speak, about to strike a decisive blow for fame as a symphonist, the instinctive feeling that his friends expected great things of him, and that by this symphony his reputation must either be impregably secured or else fall to the ground, seems to have led Brahms to put every bit of himself, his whole heart, soul and brains into the work. There can be no doubt that under these trying conditions Brahms went to work in the right way, that he labored strenuously to satisfy his own highest ideal, without regard for the taste or predilections of his public, so as to be able to say in the end, "Here you have me, the whole of me, and nothing but me." Perhaps this very consciousness of how much he had at stake, this grim determination to write a great work at all hazards, may have reacted unfortunately upon the composer's inspiration. With all the good that can be said of the symphony, there is a certain flavor of the lamp about it. If it is great, it is consciously and intentionally great. If Brahms have a failing, it is that he becomes at times so self-absorbed in writing as to forget the natural demands of the human ear; it seems often as if he did not think to ask himself, "How will this sound?" Although by nature the least conventional of men, he seems at times to accept certain conventions unheedingly whenever they do not immediately touch the point which interests him most for the time being. Take, for instance, his very frequent treatment of the violins in their highest register. It is often hard to see that he has any definite orchestral effect in view when he makes his first violins play very high; the passages in which he employs them thus are too interesting in themselves to make any intrinsically orchestral effect necessary; it seems rather as if he wrote his violin part very high simply because it is the general modern custom to do so, without considering that the orchestral effects aimed at by contemporary composers have nothing to do with his peculiar musical tendencies. There are hosts of passages in this symphony in which one wishes heartily that he had written his first violins an octave lower; the violent, high, shrill tones are disagreeable to the ear, and add nothing to the vigor or the brilliancy of the effect. In listening to the work, we can grasp its beauties only after willfully overcoming a painful physical impression. Brahms's harmonies are certainly not more cacophonous than Wagner's; yet the former does not succeed in softening down the harshness of certain progressions by a clever handling of the orchestra, as the latter does; his music often sounds heartily ill. While composing, Brahms seems to enter into that state of somnambulism in which one hears with the inner ear alone, and not with the ordinary auditory organs which serve one when awake. One of the most curious items in his genius is his sentimentalism. In general he is anything but sentimental, but there are moments when he launches out into passages of the most gushing sweetness, with all the ardor of a man to whom the indulgence in sentimentality is a rare luxury. It is well known that Darwin is in the habit of reading all the trashy novels that come out, as a means of resting his hard-worked brain; Brahms's occasional indulgence in sentimental sweetness reminds one a little of this; when he does unbend, he does so with a vengeance, and presents the curious picture of a man who habitually lives in an intellectual sphere far above that of his associates suddenly diving down into regions which most men would avoid as commonplace and uninspiring. We have given these general impressions as they have come to us at repeated hearings of the symphony, for we are still far from feeling enough at home in the work to speak intelligently about it in detail. For one thing, it sounds better, is more interesting, and we enjoy it more and more every time we hear it; but we have not yet succeeded in catching the musical essence of all its parts. Technically speaking, the performance was, in general, very fine; but we are, as yet, wholly incompetent to speak of it from any other point of view. The performance of Mendelssohn's overture to "Athalia" was very inspiring; that of Liszt's "Les Preludes" by no means so smooth, technically speaking, and as it slapped all our preconceived notions of the composition directly in the face, we do not feel called upon to praise it in any way. It was certainly ineffective enough. Mr. Bayrhammer, the new leading 'cello of the orchestra, played Saint-Saens's A-minor concerto and an adagio by Bargiel. The young artist was evidently too nervous to do himself justice, and it was hard to form a correct estimate of his capabilities as a solo player from his performance.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Eighth Concert.

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall, last evening, the programme being as follows:

Overture ("Athalia"), op. 74.....Mendelssohn
Concerto for violoncello in A minor,
op. 33.....Saint-Saens
Symphony in C minor. No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Adagio for violoncello in G, op. 38.....Bargiel
Symphonic poem. (Les Preludes).....Liszt

The Saint-Saens and Bargiel numbers introduced Mr. Carl Bayrhammer as a 'cello soloist, the gentleman having been a resident of this city but a few months, but identified with the

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The great pressure upon our columns renders it impossible to give an analysis of the concert of last night, and we can briefly say that, as a whole, it was the most satisfactory of the series thus far, both in its programme and its execution. The great Brahms symphony in C minor was almost faultless; the strange effects of the contrabassoon and of the capricious pizzicati at the finale were well brought out. The great contrasts of Liszt's Les Preludes were strongly drawn, sweeping from bliss on the flutes, to despair on the bassoons, but never verging on the ridiculous as with Berlioz. The final theme, with its pompous military ending, could not have been made more grandiose. Mr. Henschel can be proud of the general work of the evening. Mr. Bayrhammer performed two violoncello numbers with most artistic effect; beginning with a trifle of nervousness, but immediately recovering himself and playing with fire and purity. The next concert will be wholly a Beethoven one, in honor of the master's birthday.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—On Saturday evening, at Music Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, gave the eighth concert of the series, to the great enjoyment of a large and enthusiastic audience. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's overture to "Athalia"; Saint-Saens's Concerto in A minor for the 'cello; Brahms's Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68; Burgiel's Adagio in G for the 'cello; and Liszt's Symphonic Poem, "Les Preludes." Mr. Henschel's orchestra played with an eloquent power of expression, brilliancy of color, and absolute absence of crudeness of tone, which was coupled with precision and refinement everywhere noticeable. The soloist was Mr. Carl Bayrhammer, whose numbers were rendered with superb strength and accuracy, and who proved to be a valuable addition to our local musicians.

Eighth Symphony Concert.

The many patrons of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts were treated last evening to the following programme: Overture (Athalia), op. 74, Mendelssohn; concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 33, Saint-Saens; symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; adagio for violoncello in G, op. 38, Bargiel; symphonic poem (Les Preludes), Liszt. At the close of the first number on the programme Mr. Carl Bayrhammer, the soloist of the evening, stepped from his familiar place among the orchestra and gave a most pleasing and intelligent interpretation of the beautiful violoncello concerto, to the great pleasure and evident appreciation of the audience. By far the most taking thing in the programme, however, was the closing number—Liszt's splendid symphonic poem, which was played as only such an organization can play it.

orchestra since its formation. His tone is large, true and sympathetic, his technique good, and his playing, notably in the Saint-Saens number, proved him to be a musician of rare ability. The audience quickly appreciated his abilities, and rewarded his efforts with generous applause. The orchestral work was quite up to the standard now confidently expected from this body of players, the final movement of the symphony and the Liszt number creating a marked impression by the striking merits of their presentation.

A CONDUCTOR PAR EXCELLENCE.

It is needless to affirm that this season will prove an eventful one in the annals of the musical history of Boston. A great stride has been made in the direction of maintaining a permanent orchestra by the interest that has been taken in orchestral concerts, that can never be obliterated, even if the future should prove it nothing more than a "craze." The standard of taste is principally measured in our large cities by the frequency of symphony concerts and the proficiency of the resident orchestra. There is an atmosphere of art surrounding these performances which develops and encourages the artist. But for these opportunities, the highest class of vocal and instrumental music, demanding much sustained force and large abilities of comprehension, would never be heard. It is an important matter, then, that the orchestra representing our best musicians in this city, although as yet scarcely a characteristic of Boston, should be so trained by a conductor, that it will become a necessary element of our education. This will never be attained while several conductors of various tastes and habits, either direct or experiment with the same orchestra. Within a little more than a week one orchestra has played successively with three conductors, and before long there will be concerts given under the direction of a fourth. What is applicable to an individual, is reasonable for a body of men. Neither style nor method can be developed by too many changes. A conductor who is full of nervous energy and possessing a strong will is a stimulant to his men; if these gifts are accompanied with mature judgment and extensive experience they will produce fine results. Another conductor of equal force and greater knowledge, but of a different calibre, would scarcely be able to arouse equal enthusiasm immediately, on account of the reaction of feeling that inevitably results from a strong stimulant. Enthusiasm and quick perception, although admirable qualities, cannot long stand before ripened judgment and knowledge combined with quiet and dignified assurance. These elements command esteem and win success in the long run.

An unusual combination of circumstances have drawn two strangers to this city and placed them in rival positions. The match is a close one for honors and the public await with interest the opportunity to crown the victor. If from this event we can acquire a greater knowledge of the best music than could have otherwise been the case, and eventually obtain a superior leader for one orchestra, we should congratulate ourselves upon the circumstances which otherwise might only create strong partisanship and ill feeling.

Home Journal K.

EIGHTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—

This concert took place at Music Hall last Saturday evening. The principal selection of the evening was Brahms's symphony in C minor. The work has previously been referred to at length in these columns. We still adhere to our former opinion that while it is a profound work, it is often rendered wearisome by an excess of preliminary deliberation. Excepting where the symphony is a remarkable plagiarism of Beethoven's ninth, the treatment of themes is desultory and the shortcoming is not atoned for by the necessary compensation of dramatic vitality. There is also a lack of clearness in the orchestral writing that must render it exceedingly awkward to perform. In each movement there appears to have been much straining after effect, and though there are passing glimpses of beauty, yet listening to the entire work is a severe trial to the patience. Possibly after hearing the work a half a dozen times more, we shall judge it differently; but if conversion is to be purchased at so great a sacrifice we prefer to remain in our present faith. The performance of the work was an unsatisfactory one, not so much from any fault of Mr. Henschel's conducting, as we are happy to allow, as from the evident lack of sufficient rehearsal. In a concerto by Saint Saens, and in the Romance of Bargiel, Mr. Bayrhafer proved himself to be a violoncellist of admirable attainments. He was nervous and unable to do himself the highest justice, but purity of tone, unusual fidelity as an executant, and a conceptive ability of a most artistic order were so clearly displayed by him, that his future appearance in public will always be awaited with great pleasure. The concert concluded with a fine performance of Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes."

Home Journal

Asking a distinguished musician of this city what he thought of the discussion regarding Mr. Georg Henschel's conducting, he replied:

"Mr. Henschel certainly has the right to interpret a symphony as he thinks proper, without being subject to personal abuse. He is a gentleman, a musician, and a comparative stranger. As such, is he not entitled to courtesy? Because he differs from our other conductors in his readings, is that any reason why he is wrong? Is it not barely possible that they may be wrong? Let us give him a fair and impartial hearing."

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

War! War to the knife! The friends of Mr. Henschel are denouncing the critics who have failed to be convinced that he first introduced music into Boston, and that he has caused the desert to blossom as a rose. It is a pity that so good a musician as Mr. Henschel should exist as the centre of an admiration-society, and that his really true art-instincts should suffer by having a stifling atmosphere of adulation around them. It seems to have arrayed opinion "on sides;" the one side only vaunting the merits, the other only decrying the defects. Letters have been published on both sides, and, as is usual in such cases, convince nobody, but add to the acrimony of the debate. One of these decries the material with which Mr. Henschel was obliged to work, and casts a slur upon the violinists. Just this part of the orchestra has always seemed to us the best, and its quality is not only due to Mr. Henschel, but to the work (scarcely recognized) of Mr. Bernard Listemann.

Mr. Henschel's weakest point is a tendency to individualize the works of all the masters. He does not have reverence for the traditional styles of Beethoven, Haydn or Mozart, but brings in the most daring innovations in tempo without any hesitation; his own ideas differ at times with those of eminent authorities. The rendering of the Haydn Symphony at the first concert, the First Beethoven Symphony, the third—the Eroica, and the fourth, in some movements, certainly justify able critics in differing from his views. But in the heat of debate the differences of opinion have involved other qualities than his conceptions of works. Mr. Henschel seems to us a very competent drill-master, able to read and to memorize scores with much technical ability, and rapidly becoming a master of the routine of conducting. He certainly holds his orchestra together splendidly, and is able to bring them to executing his views, however radical, with much unity.

The chief feature of the programme of the eighth concert was the Brahms Symphony in C minor. This work has been presented by the Harvard orchestra, and also by Theodore Thomas' organization. It is, to us, one of the greatest instrumental works of recent times, and its beauties are more and more revealed by each hearing, its complexity rendering it difficult to grasp entirely at once. The employment of that rare instrument, a contrabassoon, is one of the effects which are most striking, and its combinations with the contra-basses are sombre and strange. The Andante Sostenuto is less complicated and more melodious than the first movement, and the wood-wind is employed in the most exquisite manner, the oboe especially doing fine work. The horns, in the finale introduction, are absolutely awe-inspiring, as much so as the famous chords in the Finale of the great Schubert Symphony, and through the whole work there is a coherency and dramatic unity which is evinced in the close relationship of the themes throughout.

The reading of the work was a good one, as was also the performance, the chief faults being an excess of zeal in the strings who anticipated some of the attacks. The oboe melodies of the second movement were very finely performed, and in the final movement, especially in the adagio introduction, the capricious tempi were strongly given, and the pizzicato effects showed excellent training. Liszt's stirring Symphonic poem—"Les Preludes"—was grandly performed. It is full of startling contrasts, sweeping from tender love-songs on flute oboe, to powerful musical rhythms with brasses, full orchestra and rolls of military drums. We were glad to see that the harp part was played by that instrument and not by a piano. The practice of substituting a piano in harp passages detracts greatly from many works of the modern school. Mr. Bayrhafer was the soloist, and his 'cello performances call for much praise. Some nervousness was apparent in the beginning of both his numbers, but it did not show itself in false intonation, or slips in notes, but rather in a weak bowing and a scratchiness. This vanished very soon, and the performance as a whole was earnest and refined.

Felix

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17TH, AT 8, P. M.
PROGRAMME.

✻ BEETHOVEN ✻
BORN DECEMBER 17TH, 1770.

OVERTURE
TO GOETHE'S EGMONT.

Op. 84.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE.

In G. No. 4. Op. 58.

Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—Rondo (Vivace; Presto.)— [Cadenzas by Moscheles.]

TWO SONGS WITH PIANOFORTE.

Goethe's "Wonne der Wehmut" and "Mignon."

MRS. HENSCHEL.

SYMPHONY.

In C minor. No. 5, Op. 67.

Allegro con brio.—Andante con moto.—Allegro.
Allegro; Presto.

SOLOIST:

MR. GEORGE W. SUMNER.

MR. SUMNER will use a CHICKERING PIANO.

TWO SONGS FROM GOETHE.

BLISS OF SORROW.

O wherefore shouldst thou try
The tears of love to dry?
Nay, let them flow!
For didst thou only know,
How barren and how dead
Seems everything below,
To those who have not tears enough to shed,
Thou'dst rather bid them weep and seek their comfort so.

(W. Edmondstoune Aytoun.)

MIGNON.

Knowest thou the land where the pale citron grows,
And the gold orange through dark foliage glows?
A soft wind flutters from the deep-blue sky,
The myrtle blooms, and towers the laurel high.
Knowest thou it well?

O there with thee!
O that I might, my own belov'd one, flee!

Knowest thou the house? On pillars rest its beams,
Bright is its hall, in light one chamber gleams,
And marble statues stand and look on me—
What have they done, thou hapless child, to thee?
Knowest thou it well?

O there with thee!
O that I might, my lov'd protector, flee!

Knowest thou the track that o'er the mountains goes,
Where the mule threads its way through mist and snows,
Where dwelt in caves the dragon's ancient brood,
Topples the crag, and o'er it roars the flood.
Knowest thou it well?

O come with me!
There lies our road—oh, father, let us flee!

(Sir Theodore Martin.)

George Henschel, the Conductor.

To the Editor of the Herald: The 3d day of last March, on the occasion of a Harvard symphony concert, Mr. Henschel, for the first time in Boston, took the baton to direct a performance of an "overture" of his own composition, and exhibited eminent ability as an orchestral conductor. So marked was his fitness for the position that I took occasion, on the following Sunday, to publicly call attention to the event which had so fortunately revealed a man capable of reviving the languishing condition of orchestral music in Boston, advising the Harvard Musical Association to lose no time in securing his services. Good fortune, however, smiled more kindly upon the music lovers of this city, and Mr. Henschel found in Mr. H. L. Higginson one clear-sighted enough to engage him to assist in carrying out an enterprise which had for some time occupied his mind. Mr. Henschel began immediately to organize an orchestra of 65 performers, and to make preparations for presenting a programme of orchestral music every Saturday evening for 20 weeks, commencing in October, at prices of admission which could not, under the most favorable circumstances, prevent a deficit of less than several thousands of dollars for the season's entertainments.

THIS GENEROUS CONSIDERATION

of the welfare of the musical public was a munificent act upon the part of Mr. Higginson, who, like every genuine benefactor, cares to have as little said about it as possible. It is an endowment in the cause of art redounding to the credit of a liberal and cultured gentleman, its very existence being the constant reminder of the debt of gratitude which the public owes him. The concerts were inaugurated, and the results proved that Mr. Higginson had made no mistake in selecting Mr. Henschel for the position of conductor.

In regarding Mr. Henschel's capabilities it will be difficult to deny that he is a composer of worth, has a thorough knowledge of the orchestra and its resources, has a decided conception of the composition in hand, presents an intelligible method of using the baton, and possesses magnetism sufficient to inspire his players with a sense of his superiority and to command their respect. That he lacks the ability to grapple successfully with the difficulties which beset the performance of the duties of a conductor, cannot in justice be said of him, and it will require but a short lapse of time to convince his most strenuous opponents of their error in judgment.

A lack of experience has been dwelt upon as an argument against Mr. Henschel, but we would call attention to the fact that, in spite of this imagined obstacle, he has succeeded, with one exception, in getting under his control and subservient to his will every condition necessary to prove that he stands alone in combining the requisites of a competent conductor, when compared to any man who has aspired to that position in connection with our local orchestra.

We will not take the occasion, at this time of writing, to descant upon the opportunity other conductors have had to prove their incapacity after years of experience. Experience does not make a conductor.

MR. HENSCHEL'S INSTINCTS

are worth more than years of experience would be without them. His use of the baton is not only definite in the marking of the time and in the indication of the accent in its various degrees of importance, but is expressive in the signification of the phrasing and coloring of the composition. What may seem grotesque in the estimation of some is, in reality, the predominant quality of his genius as a conductor. His facial expression, sway of body and sweep of the arms, from the broadest to the most delicate movement, point in a positive manner to the orchestra the interpretation he wishes it to convey to the audience, and, when the players have learned to keep their eyes more constantly upon him and observe his movements still closer, as they eventually will, the rendering will reveal the beauty and power of the composition in such vivid colors that all thoughts of the means employed will be banished from the minds of the listeners. Whatever objection may be taken to Mr. Henschel's reading of the works, it cannot reasonably be denied that he has an absolute design, and, in most every particular, succeeds in carrying it out. The fact that he conducts without hardly referring to his book during the performance enables him to delineate to his orchestra his emotions. This eminent ability is possessed by very few conductors. The director whose attention is centred on his book must necessarily ignore his orchestra, more or less, and is but a time-beater. One critic may not comprehend the importance of personal magnetism in controlling a body of men, and another may discover some discrepancies among the bassoons and horns, and still another may make much ado about the roughness of the basses or the harshness of the first violins, or some other real or fancied difficulty concerning the individual efforts of the players, but, in spite of all fault-finding, there is no doubt of the fact that Mr. Henschel has

INSTITUTED A NEW ORDER OF THINGS

and brought about a favorable change in the matter of orchestral performances. Crescendos and diminuendos are really experienced. Themes and bits of expressive phrases never before heard in familiar compositions are brought out and given the prominence they demand. As for attack, vigor and a general precision in the concerted efforts of the players, no such a degree of success has ever been approached by our local orchestra. In this respect it rivals Theodore Thomas' orchestra in its best days. In the matter of varied expression, accelerando, ritard, etc., and in the gradations of power from piano to fortissimo, the playing has exhibited most excellent results. As regards producing a pianissimo and in the more difficult effort of passing immediately from fortissimo to pianissimo much has yet to be accomplished. Before the advent of Theodore Thomas with his orchestra, such an effect as a real pianissimo was unknown here in orchestral renderings, and, except in the efforts of Mr. Listemann with the Philharmonic orchestra, it departed with Mr. Thomas. In this much that the critics have claimed they have had truth on their side.

In justice to Mr. Henschel it must be said that he employs by look and gesture every means to indicate to the players that they are yet playing too loud in pianissimo passages, and they in turn evidently try to reduce the power and accede to his desires, but, being unconscious of the effort necessary to accomplish the effect, they do not succeed. This is the one exception referred to.

It remains now for Mr. Henschel to establish

A STANDARD OF CRITICISM,

so that the players shall know what he means when he says "pianissimo," or when the mark is discovered upon their music.

No man better than Theodore Thomas can testify to the struggle necessary in obtaining this important result. It should be gained at the earliest moment if Mr. Henschel wishes to reach the highest point in contrasted effects. It will also give that sense of repose so agree-

TWO SONGS FROM GOETHE.

BLISS OF SORROW.

O wherefore shouldst thou try
The tears of love to dry?
Nay, let them flow!
For didst thou only know,
How barren and how dead
Seems everything below,
To those who have not tears enough to shed,
Thou'dst rather bid them weep and seek their comfort so.

(W. Edmondstone Aytoun.)

MIGNON.

Knowest thou the land where the pale citron grows,
And the gold orange through dark foliage glows?
A soft wind flutters from the deep-blue sky,
The myrtle blooms, and towers the laurel high.
Knowest thou it well?

O there with thee!
O that I might, my own belov'd one, flee!

Knowest thou the house? On pillars rest its beams,
Bright is its hall, in light one chamber gleams.
And marble statues stand and look on me—
What have they done, thou hapless child, to thee?
Knowest thou it well?

O there with thee!
O that I might, my lov'd protector, flee!

Knowest thou the track that o'er the mountains goes,
Where the mule threads its way through mist and snows,
Where dwelt in caves the dragon's ancient brood,
Topples the crag, and o'er it roars the flood.
Knowest thou it well?

O come with me!
There lies our road—oh, father, let us flee!

(Sir Theodore Martin.)

Georg Henschel, the Conductor.

To the Editor of the Herald: The 3d day of last March, on the occasion of a Harvard symphony concert, Mr. Henschel, for the first time in Boston, took the baton to direct a performance of an "overture" of his own composition, and exhibited eminent ability as an orchestral conductor. So marked was his fitness for the position that I took occasion, on the following Sunday, to publicly call attention to the event which had so fortunately revealed a man capable of reviving the languishing condition of orchestral music in Boston, advising the Harvard Musical Association to lose no time in securing his services. Good fortune, however, smiled more kindly upon the music lovers of this city, and Mr. Henschel found in Mr. H. L. Higginson one clear-sighted enough to engage him to assist in carrying out an enterprise which had for some time occupied his mind. Mr. Henschel began immediately to organize an orchestra of 65 performers, and to make preparations for presenting a programme of orchestral music every Saturday evening for 20 weeks, commencing in October, at prices of admission which could not, under the most favorable circumstances, prevent a deficit of less than several thousands of dollars for the season's entertainments.

THIS GENEROUS CONSIDERATION

of the welfare of the musical public was a munificent act upon the part of Mr. Higginson, who, like every genuine benefactor, cares to have as little said about it as possible. It is an endowment in the cause of art redounding to the credit of a liberal and cultured gentleman, its very existence being the constant reminder of the debt of gratitude which the public owes him. The concerts were inaugurated, and the results proved that Mr. Higginson had made no mistake in selecting Mr. Henschel for the position of conductor.

In regarding Mr. Henschel's capabilities it will be difficult to deny that he is a composer of worth, has a thorough knowledge of the orchestra and its resources, has a decided conception of the composition in hand, presents an intelligible method of using the baton, and possesses magnetism sufficient to inspire his players with a sense of his superiority and to command their respect. That he lacks the ability to grapple successfully with the difficulties which beset the performance of the duties of a conductor, cannot in justice be said of him, and it will require but a short lapse of time to convince his most strenuous opponents of their error in judgment.

A lack of experience has been dwelt upon as an argument against Mr. Henschel, but we would call attention to the fact that, in spite of this imagined obstacle, he has succeeded, with one exception, in getting under his control and subservient to his will every condition necessary to prove that he stands alone in combining the requisites of a competent conductor, when compared to any man who has aspired to that position in connection with our local orchestra.

We will not take the occasion, at this time of writing, to descant upon the opportunity other conductors have had to prove their incapacity after years of experience. Experience does not make a conductor.

MR. HENSCHEL'S INSTINCTS

are worth more than years of experience would be without them. His use of the baton is not only definite in the marking of the time and in the indication of the accent in its various degrees of importance, but is expressive

in the signification of the phrasing and coloring of the composition. What may seem grotesque in the estimation of some is, in reality, the preëminent quality of his genius as a conductor. His facial expression, sway of body and sweep of the arms, from the broadest to the most delicate movement, point in a positive manner to the orchestra the interpretation he wishes it to convey to the audience, and, when the players have learned to keep their eyes more constantly upon him and observe his movements still closer, as they eventually will, the rendering will reveal the beauty and power of the composition in such vivid colors that all thoughts of the means employed will be banished from the minds of the listeners. Whatever objection may be taken to Mr. Henschel's reading of the works, it cannot reasonably be denied that he has an absolute design, and, in most every particular, succeeds in carrying it out. The fact that he conducts without hardly referring to his book during the performance enables him to delineate to his orchestra his emotions. This eminent ability is possessed by very few conductors. The director whose attention is centred on his book must necessarily ignore his orchestra, more or less, and is but a time-beater. One critic may not comprehend the importance of personal magnetism in controlling a body of men, and another may discover some discrepancies among the bassoons and horns, and still another may make much ado about the roughness of the basses or the harshness of the first violins, or some other real or fancied difficulty concerning the individual efforts of the players, but, in spite of all fault-finding, there is no doubt of the fact that Mr. Henschel has

INSTITUTED A NEW ORDER OF THINGS

and brought about a favorable change in the matter of orchestral performances. Crescendos and diminuendos are really experienced. Themes and bits of expressive phrases never before heard in familiar compositions are brought out and given the prominence they demand. As for attack, vigor and a general precision in the concerted efforts of the players, no such a degree of success has ever been approached by our local orchestra. In this respect it rivals Theodore Thomas' orchestra in its best days. In the matter of varied expression, accelerando, ritard, etc., and in the gradations of power from piano to fortissimo, the playing has exhibited most excellent results. As regards producing a pianissimo and in the more difficult effort of passing immediately from fortissimo to pianissimo much has yet to be accomplished. Before the advent of Theodore Thomas with his orchestra, such an effect as a real pianissimo was unknown here in orchestral renderings, and, except in the efforts of Mr. Listemann with the Philharmonic orchestra, it departed with Mr. Thomas. In this much that the critics have claimed they have had truth on their side.

In justice to Mr. Henschel it must be said that he employs by look and gesture every means to indicate to the players that they are yet playing too loud in pianissimo passages, and they in turn evidently try to reduce the power and accede to his desires, but, being unconscious of the effort necessary to accomplish the effect, they do not succeed. This is the one exception referred to.

It remains now for Mr. Henschel to establish

A STANDARD OF CRITICISM,

so that the players shall know what he means when he says "pianissimo," or when the mark is discovered upon their music.

No man better than Theodore Thomas can testify to the struggle necessary in obtaining this important result. It should be gained at the earliest moment if Mr. Henschel wishes to reach the highest point in contrasted effects. It will also give that sense of repose so agreeable

112
one to the critical ear, and we look confidently forward to its accomplishment.

The fault does not in reality reflect upon the musicians, for they do not realize how loud their pianissimo sounds when given by the full orchestra. They do not comprehend how softly they will be obliged to play in order to produce the desired effect. What would be pianissimo with a few players would be altogether too loud if given by a larger number using the same power. Let the strings practise con sordino any pianissimo passage that may occur, and, after having given it the lightest touch possible, take off the "mutes," and, with the standard of softness in their minds, try to play as softly without them, they will then appreciate what extraordinary efforts it will be necessary to make in order to keep the power down sufficiently. In this manner, with the exercise of patience on the part of the musicians, the object will soon be accomplished. The rest of the orchestra can then be made to conform to the standard of softness established by the strings, and the only just complaint of the critics will be silenced.

AS REGARDS THE TEMPI

taken by Mr. Henschel, that is a matter of judgment which can find advocates in every direction, and does not militate against a conductor's ability unless carried beyond the bounds of reason, which is not the case in Mr. Henschel's reading, for there are precedents and enough good musicians to agree with his ideas of a quicker time in the rapid movements, and a more moderate degree in the slower movements, than may be the conception of some other conductors.

It must be recollected that these concerts occur once a week, and a deal of work has to be accomplished in a short time. It must also be remembered that the orchestra has never been subjected to a thorough state of discipline. Mr. Henschel, with 65 players before him who believe in him and feel his superiority, and nearly 3000 intelligent listeners behind him lavish with applause in acknowledgment of their appreciation, together with the public's benefactor, who stands ready to financially support the enterprise under all circumstances, it matters little whether the critics praise him, find fault with him, relapse into a snivelling word with their pens or ignore him altogether, he was honorably called to this position, and, although he has not had the experience of several years' routine, he has shown that he possesses all the elements of a conductor of eminent ability, and is undoubtedly the right man in the right place.

Unlike Mr. Thomas' men, whose whole time was engaged to him, the players of Mr. Henschel's orchestra have other interests than his concerts, being obliged to be subjected to the methods of other conductors in the mean time claiming their services. Under these circumstances the success gained by Mr. Henschel is all the more to be commended.

Mr. Higginson has gone a long way toward establishing a permanent orchestra in Boston, and perhaps may in the near future see the way to command the exclusive services of the players by making the pecuniary conditions satisfactory. Then and then only can the conductor be arbitrary enough to demand of the players the most rigid discipline within the bounds of reason, and, through that means, reach the highest pinnacle of success in orchestral playing.

Wm. Dec 17, 89 WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL. Gazette

Boston Symphony Concert.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last night. The programme was entirely devoted to Beethoven, the occasion being the anniversary of the composer's birth. The works performed were the "Egmont" overture, the piano Concerto in G, and the C minor Symphony. The Overture was spiritedly and largely played on the whole, and, save for an occasional eccentricity in the time and a slight confusion among the wind instruments in the concluding portions, very creditably. The Concerto was performed by Mr. G. W. Sumner in a very careful and correct manner as far as the notes were concerned, but without force, color, or character in respect to style. There was a remarkable lack of vigor in the interpretation throughout; but this was made up in the orchestral accompaniment, which wanted nothing of this quality. It was not always in time with the soloist, and there was now and then a critical moment when an awkward break seemed to threaten, but it was safely bridged over. Mr. Sumner was heartily applauded, and came forward again in response to an enthusiastic recall. The symphony was subjected to a treatment that was novel in our experience. It certainly had the merit of originality, if no other. The reading was a wholly new one, and doubtless displayed the conductor's individuality, but, save in the last movement, there was but little of Beethoven's individuality left. The first movement was taken at a slow and lumbering pace that was as inexplicable as it was exasperating. All of crispness and brilliancy disappeared under this strange rendering, and the life of the movement disappeared at the same time. The andante was given faster than has been customary, and with much coarseness and sensationalism of coloring. Of its exquisite grace and tenderness scarcely anything remained. The minuet was played in a slower time than usual, and much of its lightness vanished, to give place to a dragging heaviness of motion that took all the "go" out of it. The opening bars of the trio were sawed out by the basses with almost brutal violence. Up to this point we had banqueted upon originality of reading almost to surfeiting, and had been treated to more of a conductor's individuality than is generally vouchsafed in one Beethoven symphony; but after this a welcome contrast was afforded by a return to Beethoven's individuality, for the finale was given with great fire and expression, and in a spirit that reflected its sentiment in the most impressive manner. Had the whole work been rendered with similar fidelity, the interpretation would have been a memorable one. But the opening Allegro con brio, was given without brio; the Andante con moto was played Allegretto con moto, and the Allegro of the Scherzo was taken Allegro moderato. It may be probable that Beethoven's deafness misled him in marking the tempo in which he meant his music to be played. If so, his errors stand in a fair way to be set right. Mrs. Henschel, who made her second appearance at these concerts last night, sang two of Beethoven's songs very charmingly. At the next concert, Mr. Henschel will be his own soloist.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA. Journal a. w. THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—NINTH CONCERT.

It was a pleasant and appropriate thought of the director of the Saturday evening concerts to recognize the fact that Saturday last was the anniversary of Beethoven's birth, by making up his programme entirely from that great master's writing. And that this thought was understood and appreciated, there was ample witness in the presence of an audience so large that many were obliged to stand. Crawford's bronze Beethoven had been crowned with a mighty laurel wreath, and the very programmes bore the date of the composer's birth inclosed in a little typographical tablet. The atmosphere was, therefore, favorable for an admirable performance, and it is no more than true to say—in spite of some passing criticism that we shall yet have to make—that a spirit of earnestness and strong intent was apparent all the evening through in all who took part.

The concert began with the grand overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which was exceptionally well played. The pensive opening phrase of the first violins, resting upon a faint support in the flutes, was given very sweetly and almost pathetically by them. From that favorable beginning the performance grew in strength and in force until the finale, full of the heroic and sterner character of the tragedy, was reached and rendered with dignity and emphasis. The second number was the pianoforte concerto in G, No. 4, opus 58, for which Mr. George W. Sumner was engaged as the soloist. Mr. Sumner is rightly a favorite because of his unassuming modesty and his conscientious pursuit of his art, and we were glad to see him in so eminent a position. So far as playing is concerned, scarcely anything could be better; his execution was perfectly exact and his touch clear and decided, whether in the rapid running phrases of the rondo or in the full chords of the andante. The intricate cadenzas by Moscheles, which were, as is customary, inserted, were so simply and unostentatiously played that they might easily have passed for less difficult than they are, and the demand which they make upon a pianist for a swift and free left hand was unhesitatingly met by Mr. Sumner. As a whole, however, the concerto lacked warmth and color, although the principal subject of the andante was feelingly given when it appeared from time to time. It is not unlikely that Mr. Sumner may have been restrained from giving "rein and spurs to his free speech" by the slight but apparent lack of complete understanding between himself and the orchestra. There were moments when he was evidently anxious lest their union should be broken, and there were others when the tension was so strained that it is a wonder that it did not give way. A similar discrepancy was noticeable, it will be remembered, at the second concert; but Mr. Sherwood's more positive and absolute fashion of playing then dominated the orchestra more quickly and drew them after him, while Mr.

113
Sumner evidently was more interested to effect, if possible, a real fusion in the uncertain places.

The symphony was the fifth,—that great work in C-minor, which has probably been the subject of as much discussion and analytic criticism as any which its author wrote. Occupying his mind for years, as it undoubtedly did, there can be no question that it stands now as Beethoven meant it to stand, and that his definitions of its character and manner of interpretation should overrule all other possible standards or theories. We can but wish that Mr. Henschel would give us some elucidation of the system he follows in his interpretation of the classic symphonies, and tell us why he so far departs not only from what we have been accustomed to hear, but from his author's own significant instructions. We have no pleasure in returning week by week to the same line of criticism, and animadverting upon errors or innovations of one particular kind. Least of all, is it agreeable to do this when our censure, given, as it is, purely and exclusively to specific questions of art, may be distorted and misinterpreted into an unfriendly disposition toward a gentleman whose character and merits, whose knowledge and the results of whose work have had and will have in these columns an appreciative and whole-hearted recognition. But when we find an anomaly in the interpretation of symphonic music confronting us week by week, what are we to do? As between the author's directions and the director's modifications, how are we to choose? When Signor Salvini deliberately violates Shakespeare's marginal note that Othello "stabs himself," and goes through the death-spasm after a bloodless cutting of his throat, thus affronting dramatic unity, as well as the author's injunction, he feels the necessity of making his excuse and explanation matters of public record over his own name, frankly admitting that he disobeys for reasons of his own, which he holds paramount to any considerations which Shakespeare may have had. In his case criticism is so far disarmed, in that he has conceded his personal overruling of the author, and can conscientiously occupy itself solely with his results. But Mr. Henschel's position is undefined. We do not know whether it is by deliberate purpose that he varies from his authors, upon a theory that he knows something of effects which they should have known, but did not, or whether his dramatic feeling and quick fancy lead him away in the concert-room from the standard which he would accept in his study. We should deeply regret being even suspected of injustice or illiberality, but we cannot pass over in silence such points as have been excepted to heretofore, and as we must again except to at this present writing. And so, in passing to consider a little in detail this same fifth symphony, let us begin by commending the harmony of action on the part of the orchestra, and their unity in many difficult passages, as well as the great animation and noble volume of tone which characterized the last movement, when we had as much fulness and force as Mr. Henschel has given us in any of his closing overtures, yet without any hardness or turbulence unbecoming the lofty spirit which Beethoven prepares and develops the conclusion of this work. Had the basses in their strange theme in the trio given a tone less harsh to their very clear and correct delivery of their notes, this movement might have passed unchallenged, for such originality as it had in the tempi did not materially affect the character of the subjects treated. But the first movement, allegro con brio, and the second, andante con moto, were not properly given out, and no mere excellence of effect produced can justify, we claim, a substitution of some new rendering for what one another has prescribed. No sooner had the counter or second theme been introduced in the first movement than the rate slackened, and the violins, instead of being full

112
one to the critical ear, and we look confidently forward to its accomplishment.

The fault does not in reality reflect upon the musicians, for they do not realize how loud their pianissimo sounds when given by the full orchestra. They do not comprehend how softly they will be obliged to play in order to produce the desired effect. What would be pianissimo with a few players would be altogether too loud if given by a larger number using the same power. Let the strings practise con sordino any pianissimo passage that may occur, and, after having given it the lightest touch possible, take off the "mutes," and, with the standard of softness in their minds, try to play as softly without them, they will then appreciate what extraordinary efforts it will be necessary to make in order to keep the power down sufficiently. In this manner, with the exercise of patience on the part of the musicians, the object will soon be accomplished. The rest of the orchestra can then be made to conform to the standard of softness established by the strings, and the only just complaint of the critics will be silenced.

AS REGARDS THE TEMPI

taken by Mr. Henschel, that is a matter of judgment which can find advocates in every direction, and does not militate against a conductor's ability unless carried beyond the bounds of reason, which is not the case in Mr. Henschel's reading, for there are precedents and enough good musicians to agree with his ideas of a quicker time in the rapid movements, and a more moderate degree in the slower movements, than may be the conception of some other conductors.

It must be recollected that these concerts occur once a week, and a deal of work has to be accomplished in a short time. It must also be remembered that the orchestra has never been subjected to a thorough state of discipline. Mr. Henschel, with 65 players before him who believe in him and feel his superiority, and nearly 3000 intelligent listeners behind him lavish with applause in acknowledgment of their appreciation, together with the public's benefactor, who stands ready to financially support the enterprise under all circumstances, it matters little whether the critics praise him, find fault with him, relapse into a snivelling word with their pens or ignore him altogether, he was honorably called to this position, and, although he has not had the experience of several years' routine, he has shown that he possesses all the elements of a conductor of eminent ability, and is undoubtedly the right man in the right place.

Unlike Mr. Thomas' men, whose whole time was engaged to him, the players of Mr. Henschel's orchestra have other interests than his concerts, being obliged to be subjected to the methods of other conductors in the mean time claiming their services. Under these circumstances the success gained by Mr. Henschel is all the more to be commended.

Mr. Higginson has gone a long way toward establishing a permanent orchestra in Boston, and perhaps may in the near future see the way to command the exclusive services of the players by making the pecuniary conditions satisfactory. Then and then only can the conductor be arbitrary enough to demand of the players the most rigid discipline within the bounds of reason, and, through that means, reach the highest pinnacle of success in orchestral playing.

Handled Dec 17, 87 WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL. Gazette

Boston Symphony Concert.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last night. The programme was entirely devoted to Beethoven, the occasion being the anniversary of the composer's birth. The works performed were the "Egmont" overture, the piano Concerto in G, and the C minor Symphony. The Overture was spiritedly and largely played on the whole, and, save for an occasional eccentricity in the time and a slight confusion among the wind instruments in the concluding portions, very creditably. The Concerto was performed by Mr. G. W. Sumner in a very careful and correct manner as far as the notes were concerned, but without force, color, or character in respect to style. There was a remarkable lack of vigor in the interpretation throughout; but this was made up in the orchestral accompaniment, which wanted nothing of this quality. It was not always in time with the soloist, and there was now and then a critical moment when an awkward break seemed to threaten, but it was safely bridged over. Mr. Sumner was heartily applauded, and came forward again in response to an enthusiastic recall. The symphony was subjected to a treatment that was novel in our experience. It certainly had the merit of originality, if no other. The reading was a wholly new one, and doubtless displayed the conductor's individuality, but, save in the last movement, there was but little of Beethoven's individuality left. The first movement was taken at a slow and lumbering pace that was as inexplicable as it was asperating. All of crispness and brilliancy disappeared under this strange rendering, and the life of the movement disappeared at the same time. The andante was given faster than has been customary, and with much coarseness and sensationalism of coloring. Of its exquisite grace and tenderness scarcely anything remained. The minuet was played in a slower time than usual, and much of its lightness vanished, to give place to a dragging heaviness of motion that took all the "go" out of it. The opening bars of the trio were sawed out by the basses with almost brutal violence. Up to this point we had banqueted upon originality of reading almost to surfeiting, and had been treated to more of a conductor's individuality than is generally vouchsafed in one Beethoven symphony; but after this a welcome contrast was afforded by a return to Beethoven's individuality, for the finale was given with great fire and expression, and in a spirit that reflected its sentiment in the most impressive manner. Had the whole work been rendered with similar fidelity, the interpretation would have been a memorable one. But the opening Allegro con brio, was given without brio; the Andante con moto was played Allegretto con moto, and the Allegro of the Scherzo was taken Allegro moderato. It may be probable that Beethoven's deafness misled him in marking the tempo in which he meant his music to be played. If so, his errors stand in a fair way to be set right. Mrs. Henschel, who made her second appearance at these concerts last night, sang two of Beethoven's songs very charmingly. At the next concert, Mr. Henschel will be his own soloist.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA. at W: THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—NINTH CONCERT.

It was a pleasant and appropriate thought of the director of the Saturday evening concerts to recognize the fact that Saturday last was the anniversary of Beethoven's birth, by making up his programme entirely from that great master's writing. And that this thought was understood and appreciated, there was ample witness in the presence of an audience so large that many were obliged to stand. Crawford's bronze Beethoven had been crowned with a mighty laurel wreath, and the very programmes bore the date of the composer's birth inclosed in a little typographical tablet. The atmosphere was, therefore, favorable for an admirable performance, and it is no more than true to say—in spite of some passing criticism that we shall yet have to make—that a spirit of earnestness and strong intent was apparent all the evening through in all who took part.

The concert began with the grand overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which was exceptionally well played. The pensive opening phrase of the first violins, resting upon a faint support in the flutes, was given very sweetly and almost pathetically by them. From that favorable beginning the performance grew in strength and in force until the finale, full of the heroic and sterner character of the tragedy, was reached and rendered with dignity and emphasis. The second number was the pianoforte concerto in G, —No. 4, opus 58, for which Mr. George W. Sumner was engaged as the soloist. Mr. Sumner is rightly a favorite because of his unassuming modesty and his conscientious pursuit of his art, and we were glad to see him in so eminent a position. So far as playing is concerned, scarcely anything could be better; his execution was perfectly exact and his touch clear and decided, whether in the rapid running phrases of the rondo or in the full chords of the andante. The intricate cadenzas by Moscheles, which were, as is customary, inserted, were so simply and unostentatiously played that they might easily have passed for less difficult than they are, and the demand which they make upon a pianist for a swift and free left hand was unhesitatingly met by Mr. Sumner. As a whole, however, the concerto lacked warmth and color, although the principal subject of the andante was feelingly given when it appeared from time to time. It is not unlikely that Mr. Sumner may have been restrained from giving "rein and spurs to his free speech" by the slight but apparent lack of complete understanding between himself and the orchestra. There were moments when he was evidently anxious lest their union should be broken, and there were others when the tension was so strained that it is a wonder that it did not give way. A similar discrepancy was noticeable, it will be remembered, at the second concert; but Mr. Sherwood's more positive and absolute fashion of playing then dominated the orchestra more quickly and drew them after him, while Mr.

113
Sumner evidently was more interested to effect, if possible, a real fusion in the uncertain places.

The symphony was the fifth,—that great work in C-minor, which has probably been the subject of as much discussion and analytic criticism as any which its author wrote. Occupying his mind for years, as it undoubtedly did, there can be no question that it stands now as Beethoven meant it to stand, and that his definitions of its character and manner of interpretation should overrule all other possible standards or theories. We can but wish that Mr. Henschel would give us some elucidation of the system he follows in his interpretation of the classic symphonies, and tell us way he so far departs not only from what we have been accustomed to hear, but from his author's own significant instructions. We have no pleasure in returning week by week to the same line of criticism, and animadverting upon errors or innovations of one particular kind. Least of all, is it agreeable to do this when our censure, given, as it is, purely and exclusively to specific questions of art, may be distorted and misinterpreted into an unfriendly disposition toward a gentleman whose character and merits, whose knowledge and the results of whose work have had and will have in these columns an appreciative and whole-hearted recognition. But when we find an anomaly in the interpretation of symphonic music confronting us week by week, what are we to do? As between the author's directions and the director's modifications, how are we to choose? When Signor Salvini deliberately violates Shakespeare's marginal note that Othello "stabs himself," and goes through the death-spasm after a bloodless cutting of his throat, thus affronting dramatic unity, as well as the author's injunction, he feels the necessity of making his excuse and explanation matters of public record over his own name, frankly admitting that he disobeys for reasons of his own, which he holds paramount to any considerations which Shakespeare may have had. In his case criticism is so far disarmed, in that he has conceded his personal overruling of the author, and can conscientiously occupy itself solely with his results. But Mr. Henschel's position is undefined. We do not know whether it is by deliberate purpose that he varies from his authors, upon a theory that he knows something of effects which they should have known, but did not, or whether his dramatic feeling and quick fancy lead him away in the concert-room from the standard which he would accept in his study. We should deeply regret being even suspected of injustice or illiberality, but we cannot pass over in silence such points as have been excepted to heretofore, and as we must again except to at this present writing. And so, in passing to consider a little in detail this same fifth symphony, let us begin by commending the harmony of action on the part of the orchestra, and their unity in many difficult passages, as well as the great animation and noble volume of tone which characterized the last movement, when we had as much fulness and force as Mr. Henschel has given us in any of his closing overtures, yet without any hardness or turbulence unbecoming the lofty spirit which Beethoven prepares and develops the conclusion of this work. Had the basses in their strange theme in the trio given a tone less harsh to their very clear and correct delivery of their notes, this movement might have passed unchallenged, for such originality as it had in the tempi did not materially affect the character of the subjects treated. But the first movement, allegro con brio, and the second, andante con moto, were not properly given out, and no mere excellence of effect produced can justify, we claim, a substitution of some new rendering for what one another has prescribed. No sooner had the counter or second theme been introduced in the first movement than the rate slackened, and the violins, instead of being full to the critical ear, and we look confidently forward to its accomplishment.

112

The fault does not in reality reflect upon the musicians, for they do not realize how loud their pianissimo sounds when given by the full orchestra. They do not comprehend how softly they will be obliged to play in order to produce the desired effect. What would be pianissimo with a few players would be altogether too loud if given by a larger number using the same power. Let the strings practise con sordino any pianissimo passage that may occur, and, after having given it the lightest touch possible, take off the "mutes," and, with the standard of softness in their minds, try to play as softly without them, they will then appreciate what extraordinary efforts it will be necessary to make in order to keep the power down sufficiently. In this manner, with the exercise of patience on the part of the musicians, the object will soon be accomplished. The rest of the orchestra can then be made to conform to the standard of softness established by the strings, and the only just complaint of the critics will be silenced.

AS REGARDS THE TEMPI

taken by Mr. Henschel, that is a matter of judgment which can find advocates in every direction, and does not militate against a conductor's ability unless carried beyond the bounds of reason, which is not the case in Mr. Henschel's reading, for there are precedents and enough good musicians to agree with his ideas of a quicker time in the rapid movements, and a more moderate degree in the slower movements, than may be the conception of some other conductors.

It must be recollected that these concerts occur once a week, and a deal of work has to be accomplished in a short time. It must also be remembered that the orchestra has never been subjected to a thorough state of discipline. Mr. Henschel, with 65 players before him who believe in him and feel his superiority, and nearly 3000 intelligent listeners behind him lavish with applause in acknowledgment of their appreciation, together with the public's benefactor, who stands ready to financially support the enterprise under all circumstances, it matters little whether the critics praise him, find fault with him, relapse into a snivelling word with their pens or ignore him altogether, he was honorably called to this position, and, although he has not had the experience of several years' routine, he has shown that he possesses all the elements of a conductor of eminent ability, and is undoubtedly the right man in the right place.

Unlike Mr. Thomas' men, whose whole time was engaged to him, the players of Mr. Henschel's orchestra have other interests than his concerts, being obliged to be subjected to the methods of other conductors in the mean time claiming their services. Under these circumstances the success gained by Mr. Henschel is all the more to be commended.

Mr. Higginson has gone a long way toward establishing a permanent orchestra in Boston, and perhaps may in the near future see the way to command the exclusive services of the players by making the pecuniary conditions satisfactory. Then and then only can the conductor be arbitrary enough to demand of the players the most rigid discipline within the bounds of reason, and, through that means, reach the highest pinnacle of success in orchestral playing.

Amherst Dec 17, 87 WARREN DAVENPORT.

MUSICAL. Saxette

Boston Symphony Concert.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last night. The programme was entirely devoted to Beethoven, the occasion being the anniversary of the composer's birth. The works performed were the "Egmont" overture, the piano Concerto in G, and the C minor Symphony. The Overture was spiritedly and largely played on the whole, and, save for an occasional eccentricity in the time and a slight confusion among the wind instruments in the concluding portions, very creditably. The Concerto was performed by Mr. G. W. Sumner in a very careful and correct manner as far as the notes were concerned, but without force, color, or character in respect to style. There was a remarkable lack of vigor in the interpretation throughout; but this was made up in the orchestral accompaniment, which wanted nothing of this quality. It was not always in time with the soloist, and there was now and then a critical moment when an awkward break seemed to threaten, but it was safely bridged over. Mr. Sumner was heartily applauded, and came forward again in response to an enthusiastic recall. The symphony was subjected to a treatment that was novel in our experience. It certainly had the merit of originality, if no other. The reading was a wholly new one, and doubtless displayed the conductor's individuality, but, save in the last movement, there was but little of Beethoven's individuality left. The first movement was taken at a slow and lumbering pace that was as inexplicable as it was exasperating. All of crispness and brilliancy disappeared under this strange rendering, and the life of the movement disappeared at the same time. The andante was given faster than has been customary, and with much coarseness and sensationalism of coloring. Of its exquisite grace and tenderness scarcely anything remained. The minuet was played in a slower time than usual, and much of its lightness vanished, to give place to a dragging heaviness of motion that took all the "go" out of it. The opening bars of the trio were sawed out by the basses with almost brutal violence. Up to this point we had banqueted upon originality of reading almost to surfeit, and had been treated to more of a conductor's individuality than is generally vouchsafed in one Beethoven symphony; but after this a welcome contrast was afforded by a return to Beethoven's individuality, for the finale was given with great fire and expression, and in a spirit that reflected its sentiment in the most impressive manner. Had the whole work been rendered with similar fidelity, the interpretation would have been a memorable one. But the opening Allegro con brio, was given without brio; the Andante con moto was played Allegretto con moto, and the Allegro of the Scherzo was taken Allegro moderato. It may be probable that Beethoven's deafness misled him in marking the tempo in which he meant his music to be played. If so, his errors stand in a fair way to be set right. Mrs. Henschel, who made her second appearance at these concerts last night, sang two of Beethoven's songs very charmingly. At the next concert, Mr. Henschel will be his own soloist.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA. aw THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—NINTH CONCERT.

113

It was a pleasant and appropriate thought of the director of the Saturday evening concerts to recognize the fact that Saturday last was the anniversary of Beethoven's birth, by making up his programme entirely from that great master's writing. And that this thought was understood and appreciated, there was ample witness in the presence of an audience so large that many were obliged to stand. Crawford's bronze Beethoven had been crowned with a mighty laurel wreath, and the very programmes bore the date of the composer's birth inclosed in a little typographical tablet. The atmosphere was, therefore, favorable for an admirable performance, and it is no more than true to say—in spite of some passing criticism that we shall yet have to make—that a spirit of earnestness and strong intent was apparent all the evening through in all who took part.

The concert began with the grand overture to Goethe's "Egmont," which was exceptionally well played. The pensive opening phrase of the first violins, resting upon a faint support in the flutes, was given very sweetly and almost pathetically by them. From that favorable beginning the performance grew in strength and in force until the finale, full of the heroic and sterner character of the tragedy, was reached and rendered with dignity and emphasis. The second number was the pianoforte concerto in G,—No. 4, opus 58, for which Mr. George W. Sumner was engaged as the soloist. Mr. Sumner is rightly a favorite because of his unassuming modesty and his conscientious pursuit of his art, and we were glad to see him in so eminent a position. So far as playing is concerned, scarcely anything could be better; his execution was perfectly exact and his touch clear and decided, whether in the rapid running phrases of the rondo or in the full chords of the andante. The intricate cadenzas by Moscheles, which were, as is customary, inserted, were so simply and unostentatiously played that they might easily have passed for less difficult than they are, and the demand which they make upon a pianist for a swift and free left hand was unhesitatingly met by Mr. Sumner. As a whole, however, the concerto lacked warmth and color, although the principal subject of the andante was feelingly given when it appeared from time to time. It is not unlikely that Mr. Sumner may have been restrained from giving "rein and spurs to his free speech" by the slight but apparent lack of complete understanding between himself and the orchestra. There were moments when he was evidently anxious lest their union should be broken, and there were others when the tension was so strained that it is a wonder that it did not give way. A similar discrepancy was noticeable, it will be remembered, at the second concert; but Mr. Sherwood's more positive and absolute fashion of playing then dominated the orchestra more quickly and drew them after him, while Mr.

Sumner evidently was more interested to effect, if possible, a real fusion in the uncertain places.

The symphony was the fifth,—that great work in C-minor, which has probably been the subject of as much discussion and analytic criticism as any which its author wrote. Occupying his mind for years, as it undoubtedly did, there can be no question that it stands now as Beethoven meant it to stand, and that his definitions of its character and manner of interpretation should overrule all other possible standards or theories. We can but wish that Mr. Henschel would give us some elucidation of the system he follows in his interpretation of the classic symphonies, and tell us why he so far departs not only from what we have been accustomed to hear, but from his author's own significant instructions. We have no pleasure in returning week by week to the same line of criticism, and animadverting upon errors or innovations of one particular kind. Least of all, is it agreeable to do this when our censure, given, as it is, purely and exclusively to specific questions of art, may be distorted and misinterpreted into an unfriendly disposition toward a gentleman whose character and merits, whose knowledge and the results of whose work have had and will have in these columns an appreciative and whole-hearted recognition. But when we find an anomaly in the interpretation of symphonic music confronting us week by week, what are we to do? As between the author's directions and the director's modifications, how are we to choose? When Signor Salvini deliberately violates Shakespeare's marginal note that Othello "stabs himself," and goes through the death-spasm after a bloodless cutting of his throat, thus affronting dramatic unity, as well as the author's injunction, he feels the necessity of making his excuse and explanation matters of public record over his own name, frankly admitting that he disobeys for reasons of his own, which he holds paramount to any considerations which Shakespeare may have had. In his case criticism is so far disarmed, in that he has conceded his personal overruling of the author, and can conscientiously occupy itself solely with his results. But Mr. Henschel's position is undefined. We do not know whether it is by deliberate purpose that he varies from his authors, upon a theory that he knows something of effects which they should have known, but did not, or whether his dramatic feeling and quick fancy lead him away in the concert-room from the standard which he would accept in his study. We should deeply regret being even suspected of injustice or illiberality, but we cannot pass over in silence such points as have been excepted to heretofore, and as we must again except to at this present writing. And so, in passing to consider a little in detail this same fifth symphony, let us begin by commending the harmony of action on the part of the orchestra, and their unity in many difficult passages, as well as the great animation and noble volume of tone which characterized the last movement, when we had as much fulness and force as Mr. Henschel has given us in any of his closing overtures, yet without any hardness or turbulence unbecoming the lofty spirit which Beethoven prepares and develops the conclusion of this work. Had the basses in their strange theme in the trio given a tone less harsh to their very clear and correct delivery of their notes, this movement might have passed unchallenged, for such originality as it had in the tempi did not materially affect the character of the subjects treated. But the first movement, allegro con brio, and the second, andante con moto, were not properly given out, and no mere excellence of effect produced can justify, we claim, a substitution of some new rendering for what one another has prescribed. No sooner had the counter or second theme been introduced in the first movement than the rate slackened, and the violins, instead of being full of gaiety and life,—which is what brio is,—sank into a sweet and gentle calm, and our gaiety was changed into a pleasantly mild melancholy. On the other hand, the andante, whose themes are a household word to all lovers of music, and as familiar, even to many who do not know whence they come, as Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," was played with a fluctuating tempo, which beginning, indeed justly, quickened markedly on the entrance of the second subject, while the introduction of that peculiar and seemingly irrelevant episode in which suddenly the rhythm changes for a few bars into triplets of sixteenth notes, followed again by four-thirty-seconds, to each beat, was greatly hurried, and not played with the enjoined dying away from piano to pianissimo. The proper time was nearly regained at the close, but these strange irregularities had in the meantime much injured the continuity of the mood which Beethoven had intended to evoke, although the playing, good enough in itself, and the indestructible beauty of the music, yet left a sensuously pleasant impression which was expressed in much applause.

Just before the symphony Mrs. Henschel sang the settings of Goethe's "Wonne der Wehmuth" and "Mignon,"—both with charming taste, and the latter with truly considerate expression. The accompaniments were beautifully played by Mr. Henschel.

There will be no concert this week, and the rehearsal of next week will begin a half an hour earlier than usual. The symphony on that occasion will be Schumann's second, and Mr. Henschel will appear as soloist himself, singing an air from Weber's "Euryanthe," and his favorite "Pogner's Address" from Wagner's "Meistersänger."

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The "Beethoven programme," given last Saturday evening in honor of the master's birthday, drew the fullest of all the full houses of the course. The concert was, to us at least, the most interesting of the season. The "Egmont" overture, the G-major pianoforte concerto, two songs with pianoforte, and the great C-minor symphony, form a programme which presents what one might call the "popular" side of Beethoven's genius. The heroic overture, the still more heroic symphony, show Beethoven at his best in the epic vein, while the ineffably beautiful and profoundly expressive, but clear and uninvolved concerto breathes an idyllic grace of sentiment which is in grateful contrast to the more fiery strains of the other two works. Indeed the programme was so appropriate to the occasion, that one cannot help wishing that a similar one might be drawn up for the 25th of March next (Sunday the 26th will be the anniversary of Beethoven's death); similar, but yet in due contrast to last evening's, showing the great composer's genius in its more transcendent and profound aspect say the "Coriolan" overture, the E-flat concerto, and the Ninth Symphony! Last evening's programme was a triumph, in the old Roman sense; this one would be an apotheosis. We have rarely listened to a more sympathetic rendering of the "Egmont" overture; save a slight, unwelcome accelerando in the finale, we found nothing in it that we are not instinctively impelled to praise heartily. One point was peculiarly interesting. Mr. Henschel succeeded in making evident the thematic relationship between the phrase beginning at the fifty-eighth measure of the allegro, and the opening phrase of the sostenuto ma non troppo, without having recourse to that extreme modification of the tempo suggested by Wagner in his pamphlet

"Ueber das Dirigiren." For this, all praise! Before speaking of Mr. G. W. Sumner's playing of the G-major concerto, we would express our astonishment and horror at the stupidity (there is no other word for it) of the person, whoever he may be, who had the top taken bodily off from the pianoforte, thus depriving the instrument of that very important reflector of sound. When we remember what pains Rubinstein (that thunderer on the keyboard) took to utilize the whole of the top of the instrument, this nonchalant discarding of an important auxiliary is doubly astounding. On the other hand, sinking the pianoforte a foot or so below the level of the main stage was an admirable idea. What Mr. Sumner's performance seemed to lack in warmth of coloring must be, in a great measure, ascribed to the absence of a proper sound-reflector. Technically, Mr. Sumner's performance was unexceptionable, and the higher artistic side of his rendering would call for unmixed praise, were it not for a single point. Mr. Sumner has done much towards curing himself of his whilom habit of phrasing with a too constant rubato. His phrasing is now singularly elegant, and had the concerto been without orchestra, it would have been perfect. But his rubatos (even when toned down as they now are) sounded in strange contrast to the phrasing of the orchestra at the beginning of almost every pianoforte phrase, especially in the first movement. It seemed always as if the orchestra took certain phrases to mean one thing, while he took them to mean another; at times it even sounded as if he were establishing a new tempo. We charge this want of unity of purpose to Mr. Sumner's account rather than to that of the orchestra, because rubato phrasing is, as a rule, impracticable for an orchestra. The performance of the fifth symphony was wonderfully inspiring in the last movement. It was not only pleasant to have a real contrabass, but the absence of the tuba, which is too often used in its place, allowed the trombones to make their legitimate brilliant effect. If the Andante con moto seemed a hair's breadth too fast, and not always consistent in tempo, at that, we greatly prefer Mr. Henschel's reading of the movement to the ultra sentimental version of Mr. Thomas. Of all Beethoven's slow movements, this one is the easiest to turn into commonplace by an over-sentimental style of playing. Mr. Henschel, at least, preserves its noble character and its vigor. The scherzo pleased us less, sounding a little heavy and lumbering. The first movement simply astonished us. Apart from the singularly slow tempo, Mr. Henschel's persistently marking two beats to a measure was as disturbing to the rhythmic sense as it was apparently unaccountable. It seems to us that, if there ever was a movement in which the four-beat rhythm is plainly apparent, this movement is the one. Four measures of the 2-4 time in the printed score go to make one (ideal) measure of the rhythm. To hear four beats and see eight is most perplexing. All other conductors we have seen, here or elsewhere, have invariably marked one beat per measure, and we cannot as yet conceive of the rhythm being understood otherwise. Mrs. Henschel sang Goethe's "Wonne der Wehmuth" and notably the "Mignon" song most exquisitely, and was admirably accompanied by her husband.

The next concert (on Dec. 31) will bring
Overture. (Ali Baba).....Cherubini
Scena and Aria. (Euryanthe).....Weber
Symphony in C, No. 2, Op. 61.....Schumann
Caprice. (The Sentinel, from Soldier's Life, Op. 146).....Hiller
Pogner's Address. (The Master Singers of Nuremberg).....Wagner
Kaisermarsch.....

Mr. George Henschel will be the singer.

The Springfield Republican of yesterday prints the following gossip furnished by its well-informed correspondent at Boston: "The new musical club which has just been organized is to be managed on a novel plan. It is to have six presidents, or 'masters,' who are to rotate in office, each to serve a month at a time and to be during his term of office its recognized leader. The club will follow the fashion, to some extent, of the dining-clubs—the Papyrus and others—will be of a social character, and may occasionally be heard of by the public as a 'patron' of some performer or the performer of some new work, and is expected to be to the leading musical men of the city what the Art Club and St. Botolph are to the artists and the literary element. It embraces the men who stand the highest in their profession and leading patrons of music, and a determined effort, it is insisted, will be made to preserve its 'tone.' People who criticize closely are coming to contrast the two leaders who are so conspicuous in the conduct of the orchestras giving the noteworthy concerts of the present noteworthy season—Henschel and Maas. Their manner is as different as the men. Henschel is a steam engine. He is all animation. His directing is a vigorous exercise. He demands attention for himself as well as his orchestra or the music produced. Maas, on the other hand, is exceedingly quiet and unobtrusive. His directing is the gentlest of efforts. But he holds his orchestra in the completest control, and is the thorough and perfect master. It is believed by some of the closest observers that the quieter man, after all, outstrips the other and showier in the race for public favors and indorsement as the chief among leaders. It is not yet determined whether the Handel and Haydn Society will be able to arrange for any concerts this season in the Mechanics' Fair Building, on the Back Bay. The chief difficulty is about the organ. One has been bought—that at the Centennial Exhibition, at Philadelphia—but it will be some months before it is ready for use. The members of the Jubilee choruses of 1869 and 1872 have been called together by Tourjée, and some sort of a musical festival of a 'popular' order is to be arranged to come off in this building."

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The following programme was performed at the tenth Boston symphony concert, at Music Hall, on Saturday evening:

Overture. (Ali Baba).....Cherubini
Scena. (Euryanthe).....Weber
Symphony in C, No. 2, Op. 61.....Schumann
Sostenuto assai; un poco piu vivace; Allegro ma non troppo.
Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Adagio espressivo. Allegro molto vivace.
Caprice. (The Sentinel, from "Soldier's Life," Op. 146).....Hiller
Pogner's Address (The Master Singers of Nuremberg).....Wagner.
Kaisermarsch.....

We were not in the mood to enjoy this concert, the opera festivity of the week having quite unfitted us for the pleasure that we might otherwise have derived from it. The symphony in C of Schumann has never been regarded with marked favor even by the many votaries and admirers of the composer's musical genius. When first produced in Leipzig it was generally condemned by the critics, and it has not since then sufficiently gained in popularity to render it a very welcome number in a concert programme. It was performed in a brilliant and effective style, though the scherzo and allegro ma non troppo movements were played so fast that it was with the greatest difficulty the double bass performers could do anything like justice to some of the difficult passages that were written for them. Mr. Henschel contributed to the interest of the concert by some excellent singing.

Journal Ninth Symphony Concert.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday night was commemorative of the one hundred and eleventh anniversary of Beethoven's birth, and was entirely devoted to the works of that master. The programme consisted of the overture to "Egmont," the concerto in G for the piano-forte, and the Fifth Symphony. Mrs. Henschel also sang two of Goethe's songs. The occasion was one full of interest to lovers of music, if not always of satisfaction, and imposed unusual exactions upon the musicians. It would be difficult to arrange a programme which should tax more greatly the intelligence of an orchestra or the feeling of its leader. The expressive overture, the symphony, with the joyous brilliancy of its first movement, the exquisite refinement of its andante and the inspired earnestness of its finale, and the difficult accompaniment of the piano-forte concerto presented a range for the exercise of all musicianly qualities which has almost no limits. In considering the concert, therefore, it will be well to bear in mind the demands which it made upon all concerned in it. The overture, as a whole, was the most satisfactory of the evening's performances, although its rendering was by no means ideal, and the conception of its powers as entertained by conductor and players not completely satisfying. Technically considered, it was played unusually well, and only a slight aberration of the wood instruments near the close was to be noted as a blemish. Nevertheless, inspiration seemed to be lacking, and the performance must be placed below many others of the same number which have been heard in this city. The symphony opened in a dull, uninspired way, and was played wearisomely throughout nearly the whole of the first measure, the conclusion being also marked by what seemed a sort of nervous uncertainty, which seemed to affect nearly the whole force of musicians. The andante was played much better, and with an excellence of expression which was remarkable in view of the undue rapidity which was given to the tempo. Had the time been controlled but a little, there would be occasion to speak of this part of the performance only in terms of the highest praise. The conclusion of the symphony was grandly performed, and with a largeness of style and control of powers which demonstrated the superior excellences which the orchestra can display when earnestly invoked to do its best. The concerto was played by Mr. Sumner with perfect correctness, but coldly and without manifesting his own interest in his work or exciting that of his hearers. The orchestra seemed to share his indifference, and accompanied him in such a manner that it was a part of the time before him and a part of the time behind, and more than once the pianist had to control or hasten his measure in order not to become discordant with his assistants. Mrs. Henschel's singing was sweet, pure and refined, but nowhere strong or impassioned. Both she and Mr. Sumner were warmly applauded, and returned to the stage to bow their acknowledgments. The next concert, on the evening of December 31, will present the following programme: Overture, "Ali Baba," Cherubini; Scena and Aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; Symphony in C, No. 2, Op. 61, Schumann; Caprice, "The Sentinel," from "Soldier's Life," Op. 146, Hiller; Pognier's Address, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," and Kaisermarsch, Wagner. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist on this occasion.

Some of the critics who have themselves been criticised for their criticisms of the Henschel concerts, or at least of Henschel's methods of directing his orchestra, have yielded to the temptation to "talk back," and have just so far weakened their position. Their wisest course, as it seems to the unprejudiced observer, would have been to have ignored the criticisms which found expression in a single anonymous newspaper contribution, which bore all the marks of the amateur and the aggressive partisan, and held themselves above such petty business. It would certainly have been more dignified. To answer back, or to consider the criticisms in any way, is a confession that they had been hit and hurt, had themselves felt the sting of the lash they so freely apply to others. The controversy still goes on in the clubs, the Music hall lobbies and elsewhere, and musical people continue to be exercised over it. The extremists on both sides, as is so often the case, have gone too far; those among the friends of the musician fall down and worship him, demand that others shall do so, and say: "You have no right to criticise his tempos; he is an artist and only by artists may he be judged, and not even by them unless they be of equal grade;" and the extremists on the other side magnify the musician's defects and condemn his leadership because of his manner and the imperious demand that he be accepted as a master, above criticism. Of course both are wrong. The tempest is one of those breezes which sweep over Boston semi-occasionally, and while they last are intense. To those who are disinterested the most acceptable criticisms are apparently those that recognize Henschel's genius and promise but point out his shortcomings of the high standard to which he aspires, and this is what the ablest critics have done. During the tempest a good many incorrect statements have been made. The statement that orchestral playing got to so low a pitch here that whenever a new work was produced it was found necessary to send to New York for an orchestra is one of these misstatements. Now the actual truth is that the number of "new works" in which a Boston orchestra took part,—purely orchestral, in connection with a vocal or instrumental soloist or a chorus,—produced here in the past 15 years or so, or since Theodore Thomas started out on concert tours with his band, outnumbered those in which the Thomas orchestra assisted, ten to one. Mr. Thomas has directed in Boston the performances, say, of half a dozen choral works, the choruses of which were made up and trained here, and these are the only occasions when it may be said that his players were sent for to assist in the production of an important work. He and his orchestra were hired at the Handel and Haydn society's triennial festival in 1874, but that was done to increase the attractions of the occasion. At other festivals the band has been augmented by individual players brought from New York or elsewhere.

Springfield Republican Dec 8. 1881

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Ali Baba.)	CHERUBINI.
SCENA. (Euryanthe.)	WEBER.
SYMPHONY in C, No. 2, Op. 61.	SCHUMANN.

Sostenuto assai; Un poco più vivace; Allegro ma non troppo.—

Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Adagio espressivo.—Allegro molto vivace.—

CAPRICE. (The Sentinel, from "Soldier's Life," Op. 146.)	HILLER.
POGNER'S ADDRESS (The Master Singers of Nuremberg.)	WAGNER.
KAISERMARSCH.

SOLOIST:

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL.

Journal Ninth Symphony Concert.

The concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday night was commemorative of the one hundred and eleventh anniversary of Beethoven's birth, and was entirely devoted to the works of that master. The programme consisted of the overture to "Egmont," the concerto in G for the piano-forte, and the Fifth Symphony. Mrs. Henschel also sang two of Goethe's songs. The occasion was one full of interest to lovers of music, if not always of satisfaction, and imposed unusual exactions upon the musicians. It would be difficult to arrange a programme which should tax more greatly the intelligence of an orchestra or the feeling of its leader. The expressive overture, the symphony, with the joyous brilliancy of its first movement, the exquisite refinement of its andante and the inspired earnestness of its finale, and the difficult accompaniment of the piano-forte concerto presented a range for the exercise of all musicianly qualities which has almost no limits. In considering the concert, therefore, it will be well to bear in mind the demands which it made upon all concerned in it. The overture, as a whole, was the most satisfactory of the evening's performances, although its rendering was by no means ideal, and the conception of its powers as entertained by conductor and players not completely satisfying. Technically considered, it was played unusually well, and only a slight aberration of the wood instruments near the close was to be noted as a blemish. Nevertheless, inspiration seemed to be lacking, and the performance must be placed below many others of the same number which have been heard in this city. The symphony opened in a dull, uninspired way, and was played wearisomely throughout nearly the whole of the first measure, the conclusion being also marked by what seemed a sort of nervous uncertainty, which seemed to affect nearly the whole force of musicians. The andante was played much better, and with an excellence of expression which was remarkable in view of the undue rapidity which was given to the tempo. Had the time been controlled but a little, there would be occasion to speak of this part of the performance only in terms of the highest praise. The conclusion of the symphony was grandly performed, and with a largeness of style and control of powers which demonstrated the superior excellencies which the orchestra can display when earnestly invoked to do its best. The concerto was played by Mr. Sumner with perfect correctness, but coldly and without manifesting his own interest in his work or exciting that of his hearers. The orchestra seemed to share his indifference, and accompanied him in such a manner that it was a part of the time before him and a part of the time behind, and more than once the pianist had to control or hasten his measure in order not to become discordant with his assistants. Mrs. Henschel's singing was sweet, pure and refined, but nowhere strong or impassioned. Both she and Mr. Sumner were warmly applauded, and returned to the stage to bow their acknowledgments. The next concert, on the evening of December 31, will present the following programme: Overture, "Ali Baba," Cherubini; Scena and Aria, "Euryanthe," Weber; Symphony in C, No. 2, Op. 61, Schumann; Caprice, The Sentinel, from "Soldier's Life," Op. 146, Hiller; Pognier's Address, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," and Kaisermarsch, Wagner. Mrs. Henschel will be the soloist on this occasion.

Some of the critics who have themselves been criticised for their criticisms of the Henschel concerts, or at least of Henschel's methods of directing his orchestra, have yielded to the temptation to "talk back," and have just so far weakened their position. Their wisest course, as it seems to the unprejudiced observer, would have been to have ignored the criticisms which found expression in a single anonymous newspaper contribution, which bore all the marks of the amateur and the aggressive partisan, and held themselves above such petty business. It would certainly have been more dignified. To answer back, or to consider the criticisms in any way, is a confession that they had been hit and hurt, had themselves felt the sting of the lash they so freely apply to others. The controversy still goes on in the clubs, the Music Hall lobbies and elsewhere, and musical people continue to be exercised over it. The extremists on both sides, as is so often the case, have gone too far; those among the friends of the musician fall down and worship him, demand that others shall do so, and say: "You have no right to criticise his tempos; he is an artist and only by artists may he be judged, and not even by them unless they be of equal grade;" and the extremists on the other side magnify the musician's defects and condemn his leadership because of his manner and the imperious demand that he be accepted as a master, above criticism. Of course both are wrong. The tempest is one of those breezes which sweep over Boston semi-occasionally, and while they last are intense. To those who are disinterested the most acceptable criticisms are apparently those that recognize Henschel's genius and promise but point out his shortcomings of the high standard to which he aspires, and this is what the ablest critics have done. During the tempest a good many incorrect statements have been made. The statement that orchestral playing got to so low a pitch here that whenever a new work was produced it was found necessary to send to New York for an orchestra is one of these misstatements. Now the actual truth is that the number of "new works" in which a Boston orchestra took part,—purely orchestral, in connection with a vocal or instrumental soloist or a chorus,—produced here in the past 15 years or so, or since Theodore Thomas started out on concert tours with his band, outnumbered those in which the Thomas orchestra assisted, ten to one. Mr. Thomas has directed in Boston the performances, say, of half a dozen choral works, the choruses of which were made up and trained here, and these are the only occasions when it may be said that his players were sent for to assist in the production of an important work. He and his orchestra were hired at the Handel and Haydn society's triennial festival in 1874, but that was done to increase the attractions of the occasion. At other festivals the band has been augmented by individual players brought from New York or elsewhere.

Springfield Republican Dec 8 1887

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Ali Baba.)	CHERUBINI.
SCENA. (Euryanthe.)	WEBER.
SYMPHONY in C, No. 2, Op. 61.	SCHUMANN.

Sostenuto assai; Un poco più vivace; Allegro ma non troppo.—

Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Adagio espressivo.—Allegro molto vivace.—

CAPRICE. (The Sentinel, from "Soldier's Life," Op. 146.)	HILLER.
POGNER'S ADDRESS (The Master Singers of Nuremberg.)	} WAGNER.
KAISERMARSCH.

SOLOIST:

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL.

SCENA. (Euryanthe.) WEBER.

Lysart, having laid a wager with Adolar, that Euryanthe would be false in her love to the latter, has failed in his treacherous attempt to make her seem so. In the dark of a tempestuous night he leaves his chamber in the castle of Euryanthe, whose guest he is, and commits his rage to the elements.
(Translation.)

RECIT. Where shall I hide myself? Where regain my scattered senses? Ha! madness only could believe her an easy prey! Ye rocks, fall down upon me! Thou, echo, repeat not the sighs of hopeless strife! Never will she be mine—O Hydra of eternal anguish!

AIR: Be silent, ye wild impulses of ardent desire! Her eye seeks Heaven alone. Within her there dwelleth innocence, grace, love; all truth is she, all nature.

RECIT. What now are lands and wealth to me? The world is poor and void without her. Mine her favor? Ah, never! Forget, unhappy man, fly! She loves him! And shall he live while I languish? No! His days are numbered. He shall die midst a thousand pangs. But vengeance, thou canst not give her to me—she loves him and I must perish!

AIR: So give I myself to the powers of vengeance. They call me to black deeds. Strewn is the seed of evil—death must follow! Perish, thou beautiful image, begone, thou last sweet torture—nothing but his destruction fills my heart.

POGNER'S ADDRESS. (The Master Singers of Nuremberg.) WAGNER.

The interior of St. Catherine's Church, in Nuremberg. The MASTERSINGERS have assembled to discuss the necessary preliminaries for the celebration of the approaching festival of St. John the Baptist, which is to be held in the meadows outside the city gates, and in which they themselves take a prominent part, appearing before the people in a contest of song. POGNER, a worthy citizen and Mastersinger, has the ear of the assembly for an important proposition.

(Translation.)

The feast of John the Baptist's Day we celebrate to-morrow:
On meadows green, 'mid flowers gay,
With merry dance, and song, and play,
We Nature's gladness borrow, forgetting every sorrow—
And each rejoices in his way!
The Sing-School in the church is by the Mastersingers slighted;
With drum and fife they gladly lie
To grassy meads, 'neath sunny sky,
And in the feast united, the people are invited,
To hear in song the Masters vie.
In such a festival of song are given various prizes,
That should the victors' fame prolong, as only just and wise is.
Now God hath me with riches blest,
And love of song plac'd in my breast;
With trouble unremitting, I've thought a prize befitting,—
That may be nobly won;
So listen, what I've done.
In German land I've travelled far,
To frenzy oft was driven,
To hear men think our burghers are
To worldly notions given.
In castles, as in town and court, I've wearied of the base report,
That only barter and gain
The burgher's heart enchain.
But that in our great empire wide
We Art alone have cherished,—
While elsewhere it hath perished;
That Art is still the burghers' pride:
And that we've ever stood,
Defending the High and Good,
And Art and Beauty here below—
This I to the world would like to show.
So hear, Masters, the wise
In which I would give the prize:—
The Singer who first honors in
The festival of song shall win,
On John the Baptist's Day,—
Be he whoso he may,— Receives what ne'er was in vogue nor
In mode, from me, Velt Pogner,—
With all my wealth and what beside,
Eva, my only child, as—bride!

(From the German of R. Wagner, by J. P. Jackson.)

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

INTRODUCTION. (Melusine, romantic opera, op. 24.) . C. GRAMMANN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in C minor, op. 12 (MS.) L. MAAS.

Allegro maestoso.—Intermezzo (Andante).—Presto.—

SYMPHONY in F. (Pastorale.) No. 6, op. 68. . BEETHOVEN.

Awaking of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country. (Allegro ma non troppo).—Scene by the brook. (Andante molto moto).—Merry gathering of the country people. (Allegro.) Storm. Tempest. (Allegro.) Herdsman's song. Blithe and thankful feelings after the tempest. (Allegretto).

PIANO SOLO.

a. ETUDE. }
b. MIDSUMMERNIGHT'S DREAM—FANTASY. . } LISZT.

OVERTURE. (Zampa.) HÉROLD.

SOLOIST:

DR. LOUIS MAAS.

(OVER)

AT the last Concert of this season, on MARCH 11TH, 1882,

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY (No. 9)

will be performed.

Ladies and Gentlemen desirous of singing in the Chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose now at MR. PECK'S OFFICE, MUSIC HALL.

THE LIST WILL BE CLOSED AT 6 P. M. ON TUESDAY, JANUARY 10TH, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified

The Chorus-Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M., on

MONDAYS, JANUARY 23D, 30TH,

FEBRUARY 6TH, 13TH,

TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21ST,

MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27TH, and

TUESDAY, MARCH 7TH,

at Bumstead Hall, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal only.

JOHN P. LYMAN,

Secretary.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

The concert of Saturday evening ended the first half of that series of musical entertainments for which Boston is indebted to the initiative of Mr. Higginson, and which, "if my gossip Report be an honest woman of her word," may be but the prelude to greater undertakings and greater successes in the seasons yet to come. The counter attraction of "William Tell" undoubtedly proved too great for many regular attendants at these concerts, for we saw quite a number of seats empty which are wont to be filled. We should have been glad had the absentees been present, for there were some special excellences in the evening's performance which we would have had them share; and yet, on the other hand, their general enjoyment was perhaps greater if they were at the opera, because the programme, considered as a whole, was not a particularly enlivening one.

The symphony was Schumann's in C, No. 2, opus 61. To listen faithfully to thirty or forty consecutive minutes of Schumann's music is not at any time a pleasure only, and, in many respects, this symphony is a tolerably severe test of an auditor's intelligence and strength of mental concentration. The first two movements, especially, strain the attention, and almost puzzle the understanding by the intricacy of their expressions, and the apparent vagueness—or at least the vagaries—of their thought. The first, with its changeful character, passing from a sostenuto assai, through a poco più vivace episode to an allegro ma non troppo, seems to be rather a striving after a true and clear exposition of thought than a direct and free presentation of ideas which the composer holds in full command. The scherzo which follows, pleasant as it is, has a slight smell of the lamp about it, and makes us think rather that the author was resolutely trying to be gay than enjoying a mood of spontaneous, unsought pleasantries. The succeeding movements—adagio espressivo, and allegro molto vivace—have an easier and more agreeable moulding, and were most gratefully received by the audience. The adagio has a particularly sweet and tender theme, and in the playing of it the injunction to be "expressive" was well regarded. The final allegro has almost no modification of the excited mood in which it begins, and wears now and then a tinge even of anxiety in the heavy cast and emphasis of its phrases, so that the short, lighter passage which just precedes the close, comes as a welcome relief to the constant force and pressure of the greater portion of the movement. The orchestra did their work excellently; and not only in the symphony—notably in the adagio—but in the other instrumental numbers, displayed a smoothness and softness in the strings, and a general finish and accuracy beyond any attained in previous concerts. We hardly need to say that the interpretation of the symphony was, as usual, the director's own; and we may perhaps be pardoned for saying that there were moments in the two earlier movements when it appeared to us as though something of the intellectual mistiness (so to speak) of the rendering might be due to a little uncertainty upon his part as to what really ought to be the reading and coloring of some of Schumann's abstruser passages.

The opening orchestral selection was Cherubini's "Ali Baba" overture, which is interesting enough in a way, as showing the conflict, if we may so express it, between the author's predilection for simple, peaceful melodies and gently woven harmonies, and his disposition to be here fantastic and picturesque. But later composers, with less native reserve, have given us so much more vivid orientalism, that Cherubini's little clashing of cymbal and drums seems but dim, while such portions as are in his better known manner suffer likewise in comparison with these very phrases of his own. A second selection was a charming caprice from Hiller's "Soldier's Life," opus 146. It is called "The Sentinel," and rests on a foundation of two repeated pizzicato notes of the double-basses, which may be taken to symbolize the steady, accentuated tread of the patrol upon his post. The first thought is in a tender minor mode, which soon changes to the major, as lighter fancies come, and they in turn are brought—all too soon—to an end by the quick call of a far-off drum. All this was so beautifully phrased and played that the audience almost insisted upon an encore in defiance of all rule. The concert ended with Wagner's grandiose but too protracted "Kaisermarsch," for which, as is proper, the brass had been considerably augmented. In this combination the strings were of course overweighted in the fortissimo; but Mr. Henschel kept the brass so well in hand that we heard not a harsh or turbulent note from them, and their volume, in spite of its power, was very enjoyable for roundness and richness of tone. The higher wooden wind instruments were also very effective, and did much toward maintaining the true coloring which, with additional strings to give it full life, would have been perfect.

The solo music for this concert was, in regular sequence, vocal, and was undertaken by Mr. Henschel himself. His selections were such as show him at his best—being strongly dramatic. One was that long address of Pogner to the other mastersingers of Nuremberg (Wagner), which is evidently a favorite with Mr. Henschel, and in which Pogner, exalting art above all else, after recounting his own travels and experiences, urges his friends on to highest emulation by promising as prize in their coming contest not only his wealth but his daughter's hand. The gradual development of the thought into the inspiring climax was finely wrought out by the singer, every step in the argument being marked by clearer and more forceful insistence. The other selection was the great scene from Weber's "Euryanthe," in which Lysistrata,—who is a sort of Iachimo,—having failed in his attempt to make Euryanthe appear faithless to her lover Adolar, rushes out into a wild night and gives vent to all his passions of baffled desire, boundless admiration, jealous hatred, despair and thirst for vengeance. Mr. Henschel's technical shortcomings as a singer were all forgotten as we heard him sweep on in recitative or air from one to another of these tempestuous moods, and the intensity and vigor of the second part were such that the loud and continued applause of the audience—very modestly acknowledged—seemed to us only not quite enthusiastic enough. Had Mr. Henschel a voice which would yield itself somewhat more graciously to his claims and intentions, he could present such scene as these with almost incomparable dramatic effect. For the accompaniments to these numbers the leader's baton was intrusted to Mr. Listemann who, being new to the direction of this band, can hardly be blamed for letting them overpower the singer now and then.

For the concert of this week, Beethoven's sixth symphony (the "Pastoral") is chosen, as next in order; the introduction will be that to Grieg's opera "Melusine," and the closing overture Herold's "Zampa." The soloist will be Dr. Maas, who is to play a study and the "Midsummer Night's Dream" fantasia of Liszt, and a manuscript concerto of his own.

To end these concerts as grandly as possible, it has been decided to give Beethoven's ninth symphony on March 11. Ladies and gentlemen who would like to assist in singing the choruses will find in an advertisement all particulars relative to the enrolment of their names and the dates of the rehearsals. We hope that the response will be so general and prompt that a body of singers may be united adequate to doing justice to this colossal and rarely attempted work.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The tenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, began with Cherubini's overture to "Ali Baba." It was excellently played, but we see no reason for disagreeing with Mendelssohn and Berlioz's depreciative estimate of this work of Cherubini's old age. Mr. Henschel than sang (Mr. Listemann conducting) Lysistrata's great scene in Weber's "Euryanthe" in superb style. Next followed Schumann's C major symphony. We cannot remember ever to have heard this involved, and, at times, somewhat harshly written work, so clearly played before. Even the furious first movement was made not only intelligible, but pleasant to the ear. Its fire and passion, even its distracted fury, were finely rendered by the orchestra. The difficult scherzo was also given with laudable distinctness. The beautiful adagio was so played as to make us forget the impression this movement had always made upon us before, of being, with all its divine beauty, somewhat badly scored. Last evening it sounded delightfully smooth and rich in color. The finale was given with equal clearness; only in the last page or two did we miss a certain vigor of accent which indisputably belongs to the music. Mr. Henschel's tempi would have struck us as admirable, had he stuck to them more firmly throughout each movement. "The Sentinel," a charming little orchestral genre piece by Ferdinand Hiller, was very nicely played and made a delightful impression. Mr. Henschel then sang "Pogner's Address," from the "Meistersinger," in his very best style, and the glorious "Kaisermarsch" brought the concert to a close. Mr. Henschel's tempo in this march is about the same as Mr. Thomas's, which has always struck us as a little over-slow. Yet the grand vigor of accent with which the orchestra played did much to make the slow tempo seem strong and energetic.

And just here let us notice a want which the repeated performances of modern compositions have brought to light in our orchestras. Boston sorely needs at least one good pair of real Turkish cymbals! The prime merit of this instrument is to have the minimum of "clash" and the maximum of vibration, or "quiver." The cymbals used here are miserable affairs—all bang and no "ring" or "quiver." At the next concert the programme will be—

- Introduction. (Melusine, romantic opera, op. 24.).....C. Grammann
 - Concerto for pianoforte in C minor, op. 12 (MS.).....L. Maas
 - Symphony in F. (Pastorale), No. 6, op. 68..Beethoven
 - Piano solos.
 - a. Etude.....Liszt
 - b. Midsummernight's Dream—Fantasy.....Liszt
 - Overture. (Zampa.).....Herold
- Mr. Louis Maas will be the pianist.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Tenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 10th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with the following as the programme:

- Overture, "Ali Baba".....Cherubini
- Scena, "Euryanthe".....Weber
- Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 61.....Schumann
- Caprice, The Sentinel, from "Soldier's Life," op. 146.....Hiller
- Pogner's Address, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
- "Kaisermarsch".....Wagner

Mr. Henschel on this occasion filled the dual rôles of conductor and soloist, the direction of the orchestra in the accompaniments to the vocal selections being temporarily assumed by Mr. Bernhard Listemann. Mr. Henschel's delivery of the "Prayers' Address," with such an accompaniment as was furnished, deserves to rank with the best dramatic singing ever heard here, the masterly manner in which it was rendered only again showing the striking ability of Mr. Henschel in this line of vocal effort. The Weber scena was equally well rendered, but its characteristics did not make it so strikingly effective a bit of work as the Wagner selection proved. The result of the additional rehearsals had by orchestra recently was plainly shown in the evening's programme, especially in the symphony, which was given a very satisfying rendering throughout, the adagio being played with particularly good effect. The striking characteristics of the Cherubini overture were brought out vividly by the presentation of this number, and the delightful, quaint beauties of the Hiller "Caprice" were interpreted in a masterly fashion. All the excellent points of the other orchestral numbers were, however, overshadowed by the "Kaisermarsch." A half dozen or more instruments were added to the orchestra for this selection, making a total of 72 men, and the effect of this truly majestic composition, as played by this great orchestra in a hall of such dimension, was fairly electrifying. The audience was aroused to a very enthusiastic pitch by this last selection; and, indeed, the many beauties of this brilliant programme were quickly appreciated, as might be expected from such an assembly of music lovers as are always in attendance upon this series of concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The tenth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music hall on Saturday evening, Mr. Georg Henschel being on this occasion both conductor and soloist. The programme was as follows:

- Overture, "Ali Baba".....Cherubini
- Scena, "Euryanthe".....Weber
- Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 61.....Schumann
- Caprice, The Sentinel, from "Soldier's Life," op. 146.....Hiller
- Pogner's Address, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
- "Kaisermarsch".....Wagner

Mr. Henschel's interpretation of "Pogner's address" was one of the best bits of vocal work that he has done here, and Weber's Scena was almost equally good. Mr. Listemann temporarily assumed the leadership while the orchestra played the accompaniment for Mr. Henschel. The orchestral work was of the best, the discipline now being at a high standard. Some additions have recently been made, and this body of musicians now numbers seventy-two in all.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The tenth Boston Symphony Concert took place at Music Hall last night. The result of the programme, as a whole, was dull. The selections were heavy in their general effect, and needed something more brilliant than was given to produce the desired contrast. The most spirited work of the evening, Cherubini's "Ali Baba" overture, was played at the opening of the concert, and the other pieces were slow-moving in character. They were a Caprice entitled "The Sentinel," from Hiller's "Soldiers' Life," op. 146, a graceful and charming bit of writing, and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch." Between these two works came Pogner's Address from Wagner's "Master Singers of Nuremberg," sung by Mr. Henschel, who also contributed to the concert the bass Scena from Weber's "Euryanthe," in both which he has been heard here before to good effect. The Symphony was Schumann's in C, No. 2, by no means his best work of this description. Mr. Henschel in this, as in his previous symphony interpretations, had his own particular views regarding the tempi, and it is hardly necessary to add that they differed almost entirely from those to which we have been accustomed, or that the new readings were not sufficiently marked improvements upon the old order of things to make the changes especially desirable. The orchestra showed careful training throughout, and the strings in particular did much better in respect to delicacy than has been the rule with them of late. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Introduction, "Melusine," C. Grammann; Concerto for Piano-forte, L. Maas; Symphony in F, No. 6, Beethoven; Piano solos, Liszt; Overture (Zampa) Herold. The soloist will be Mr. Louis Maas.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The tenth concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra series was given in Music Hall last evening before the usual crowded house. The programme presented was a particularly good one, and enlisted the services of the conductor, Georg Henschel, as soloist. In the course of the evening he sang a scena from Weber's "Euryanthe" and Pogner's address from Wagner's "Master Singers of Nuremberg" in his customary vigorous and dramatic style. The warmth of the applause which was accorded both these selections showed how great a favorite he is with the musical public. The orchestral portion of the programme was diversified and excellent. It opened with that novel and extraordinary composition of Cherubini, the overture to "Ali Baba," whose very peculiar instrumentation developed effects in the orchestra which were evidently entirely new to many of the audience. Robert Schumann's symphony in C (his second, op. 61), formed the nucleus of the concert. This characteristic work, abounding as it does with so many of the Schumann irregularities and beauties, was in all respects delightfully presented by the orchestra. The most taking thing upon the evening's programme, however, was a selection from Hiller's scene from a soldier's life, the one chosen being the second division of the work (op. 146), the "Sentinel." This delicately played number was the most warmly and heartily applauded of any during the evening. Wagner's "Kaiser" march closed the concert. The programme for the next concert will be found elsewhere.

Mr. Georg Henschel gained many admirers for his musical ability and versatile genius by his cute and marvelous improvisations on the piano at a meeting of the "Clefts" in The Vendome, on Wednesday evening. His polyphonic treatment at a moment's notice, on a theme from "La Belle Helene" was an exceedingly ingenious bit of impromptu.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded the first half of its series of twenty concerts at Music Hall Saturday evening, when one of the largest houses of the season was in attendance. The programme was dull in general effect, and little enthusiasm was excited by its performance. Nobody can care much for Cherubini's overture to "Ali Baba," which is a sensational affair, with plenty of noise in it, but very little music. Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," also, full of pounding and blowing, as it is, never seems to get many ideas knocked out of it, although it has plenty of good effects and demonstrates extraordinary knowledge of orchestral resources in its composer. These selections, however, were the best played of any in the programme. Schumann's symphony in C, No. 2, formed the piece de resistance of the performance. It is one of the least interesting of Schumann's symphonies, and, in general, rather inert and demonstrating no unusual genius. It was well presented so far as the instruments were concerned, but the time in some of the more lively passages was allowed to drag most tediously. Hiller's caprice, "The Sentinel," from "Soldier's Life," opus 146, an exquisite piece of writing, with a dreamy measure accented by a rhythmic undertone and a touch of distant drums, was beautifully performed.

Mr. Henschel, besides directing the orchestra in the numbers above mentioned, sang an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe" and "Pogner's Address" in the "Meistersinger," Mr. Listemann conducting the accompaniment. Mr. Henschel sang these selections with great success, the latter, especially, being quite without defect. The graceful orchestral accompaniment to this number was very finely given. The next concert will be marked by the performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," Herold's overture to "Zampa," and a piano concerto of his own composition and two compositions of Liszt, by Dr. Louis Maas. The announcement is made that the series will close March 11, on which occasion the ninth symphony (Beethoven) will be presented. As this work requires a well drilled chorus ladies and gentlemen desirous of assisting on that occasion must register their names and addresses at the box office of the Music Hall with Mr. Peck before 6 P. M. on Tuesday, January 10, after which date the selections will be made and the accepted ones duly notified. The choral rehearsals will take place January 23 and 30, February 21 and 27 and March 7 at Bumstead Hall, and will be conducted by Mr. Henschel.

We were unable to attend the Boston Symphony concert Saturday evening. It was the anniversary of Beethoven's birth, and the programme strictly commemorated the event, the principal numbers performed being the Fifth Symphony and the G major piano concerto, No. 4. Mr. George W. Sumner was the pianist of the concert, and Mrs. Georg Henschel contributed a number of Beethoven's songs. At the next concert Mr. Henschel will be the soloist.

Mr. Higginson has re-engaged Mr. Henschel to conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season at the salary of $10,000.

has been decided to give Beethoven's ninth symphony on March 11. Ladies and gentlemen who would like to assist in singing the choruses will find in an advertisement all particulars relative to the enrolment of their names and the dates of the rehearsals. We hope that the response will be so general and prompt that a body of singers may be united adequate to doing justice to this colossal and rarely attempted work.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The tenth concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, began with Cherubini's overture to "Ali Baba." It was excellently played, but we see no reason for disagreeing with Mendelssohn and Berlioz's depreciative estimate of this work of Cherubini's old age. Mr. Henschel than sang (Mr. Listemann conducting) Lysiat's great scena in Weber's "Euryanthe" in superb style. Next followed Schumann's C major symphony. We cannot remember ever to have heard this involved, and, at times, somewhat harshly written work, so clearly played before. Even the furious first movement was made not only intelligible, but pleasant to the ear. Its fire and passion, even its distracted fury, were finely rendered by the orchestra. The difficult scherzo was also given with laudable distinctness. The beautiful adagio was so played as to make us forget the impression this movement had always made upon us before, of being, with all its divine beauty, somewhat badly scored. Last evening it sounded delightfully smooth and rich in color. The finale was given with equal clearness; only in the last page or two did we miss a certain vigor of accent which indisputably belongs to the music. Mr. Henschel's tempi would have struck us as admirable, had he stuck to them more firmly throughout each movement. "The Sentinel," a charming little orchestral genre piece by Ferdinand Hiller, was very nicely played and made a delightful impression. Mr. Henschel then sang "Pogner's Address," from the "Meistersinger," in his very best style, and the glorious "Kaisermarsch" brought the concert to a close. Mr. Henschel's tempo in this march is about the same as Mr. Thomas's, which has always struck us as a little over-slow. Yet the grand vigor of accent with which the orchestra played did much to make the slow tempo seem strong and energetic.

And just here let us notice a want which the repeated performances of modern compositions have brought to light in our orchestras. Boston sorely needs at least one good pair of real Turkish cymbals! The prime merit of this instrument is to have the minimum of "clash" and the maximum of vibration, or "quiver." The cymbals used here are miserable affairs—all bang and no "ring" or "quiver." At the next concert the programme will be—

Introduction. (Melusine, romantic opera, op. 24.).....C. Grammann
Concerto for pianoforte in C minor, op. 12 (MS.).....L. Maas
Symphony in F. (Pastorale.) No. 6, op. 68..Beethoven
Piano solos.
a. Etude.....Liszt
b. Midsummernight's Dream—Fantasy.....Liszt
Overture. (Zampa.).....Hérold
Mr. Louis Maas will be the pianist. Trans:

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Tenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 10th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with the following as the programme:

Overture, "Ali Baba".....Cherubini
Scena, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 61.....Schumann
Caprice, The Sentinel, from "Soldier's Life," op. 146.....Hiller
Pogner's Address, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
"Kaisermarsch".....Wagner

Mr. Henschel on this occasion filled the dual rôles of conductor and soloist, the direction of the orchestra in the accompaniments to the vocal selections being temporarily assumed by Mr. Bernhard Listemann. Mr. Henschel's delivery of the "Prayers' Address," with such an accompaniment as was furnished, deserves to rank with the best dramatic singing ever heard here, the masterly manner in which it was rendered only again showing the striking ability of Mr. Henschel in this line of vocal effort. The Weber scena was equally well rendered, but its characteristics did not make it so strikingly effective a bit of work as the Wagner selection proved. The result of the additional rehearsals had by orchestra recently was plainly shown in the evening's programme, especially in the symphony, which was given a very satisfying rendering throughout, the adagio being played with particularly good effect. The striking characteristics of the Cherubini overture were brought out vividly by the presentation of this number, and the delightful, quaint beauties of the Hiller "Caprice" were interpreted in a masterly fashion. All the excellent points of the other orchestral numbers were, however, overshadowed by the "Kaisermarsch." A half dozen or more instruments were added to the orchestra for this selection, making a total of 72 men, and the effect of this truly majestic composition, as played by this great orchestra in a hall of such dimension, was fairly electrifying. The audience was aroused to a very enthusiastic pitch by this last selection; and, indeed, the many beauties of this brilliant programme were quickly appreciated, as might be expected from such an assembly of music lovers as are always in attendance upon this series of concerts.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The tenth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music hall on Saturday evening, Mr. Georg Henschel being on this occasion both conductor and soloist. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Ali Baba".....Cherubini
Scena, "Euryanthe".....Weber
Symphony in C, No. 2, op. 61.....Schumann
Caprice, The Sentinel, from "Soldier's Life," op. 146.....Hiller
Pogner's Address, "The Master Singers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
"Kaisermarsch".....Wagner

Mr. Henschel's interpretation of "Pogner's address" was one of the best bits of vocal work that he has done here, and Weber's Scena was almost equally good. Mr. Listemann temporarily assumed the leadership while the orchestra played the accompaniment for Mr. Henschel. The orchestral work was of the best, the discipline now being at a high standard. Some additions have recently been made, and this body of musicians new numbers seventy-two in all.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The tenth Boston Symphony Concert took place at Music Hall last night. The result of the programme, as a whole, was dull. The selections were heavy in their general effect, and needed something more brilliant than was given to produce the desired contrast. The most spirited work of the evening, Cherubini's "Ali Baba" overture, was played at the opening of the concert, and the other pieces were slow-moving in character. They were a Caprice entitled "The Sentinel," from Hiller's "Soldiers' Life," op. 146, a graceful and charming bit of writing, and Wagner's "Kaisermarsch." Between these two works came Pogner's Address from Wagner's "Master Singers of Nuremberg," sung by Mr. Henschel, who also contributed to the concert the bass Scena from Weber's "Euryanthe," in both which he has been heard here before to good effect. The Symphony was Schumann's in C, No. 2, by no means his best work of this description. Mr. Henschel in this, as in his previous symphony interpretations, had his own particular views regarding the tempi, and it is hardly necessary to add that they differed almost entirely from those to which we have been accustomed, or that the new readings were not sufficiently marked improvements upon the old order of things to make the changes especially desirable. The orchestra showed careful training throughout, and the strings in particular did much better in respect to delicacy than has been the rule with them of late. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Introduction, "Melusine," C. Grammann; Concerto for Piano-forte, L. Maas; Symphony in F, No. 6, Beethoven; Piano solos, Liszt; Overture (Zampa) Herold. The soloist will be Mr. Louis Maas.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The tenth concert in the Boston Symphony orchestra series was given in Music Hall last evening before the usual crowded house. The programme presented was a particularly good one, and enlisted the services of the conductor, Georg Henschel, as soloist. In the course of the evening he sang a scena from Weber's "Euryanthe" and Pogner's address from Wagner's "Master Singers of Nuremberg" in his customary vigorous and dramatic style. The warmth of the applause which was accorded both these selections showed how great a favorite he is with the musical public. The orchestral portion of the programme was diversified and excellent. It opened with that novel and extraordinary composition of Cherubini, the overture to "Ali Baba," whose very peculiar instrumentation developed effects in the orchestra which were evidently entirely new to many of the audience. Robert Schumann's symphony in C (his second, op. 61), formed the nucleus of the concert. This characteristic work, abounding as it does with so many of the Schumann irregularities and beauties, was in all respects delightfully presented by the orchestra. The most taking thing upon the evening's programme, however, was a selection from Hiller's scene from a soldier's life, the one chosen being the second division of the work (op. 146), the "Sentinel." This delicately played number was the most warmly and heartily applauded of any during the evening. Wagner's "Kaiser" march closed the concert. The programme for the next concert will be found elsewhere.

Mr. Georg Henschel gained many admirers for his musical ability and versatile genius by his cute and marvelous improvisations on the piano at a meeting of the "Clefs" in The Vendome, on Wednesday evening. His polyphonic treatment at a moment's notice, on a theme from "La Belle Helene" was an exceedingly ingenious bit of impromptu.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra concluded the first half of its series of twenty concerts at Music Hall Saturday evening, when one of the largest houses of the season was in attendance. The programme was dull in general effect, and little enthusiasm was excited by its performance. Nobody can care much for Cherubini's overture to "Ali Baba," which is a sensational affair, with plenty of noise in it, but very little music. Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," also, full of pounding and blowing, as it is, never seems to get many ideas knocked out of it, although it has plenty of good effects and demonstrates extraordinary knowledge of orchestral resources in its composer. These selections, however, were the best played of any in the programme. Schumann's symphony in C, No. 2, formed the piece de resistance of the performance. It is one of the least interesting of Schumann's symphonies, and, in general, rather inert and demonstrating no unusual genius. It was well presented so far as the instruments were concerned, but the time in some of the more lively passages was allowed to drag most tediously. Hiller's caprice, "The Sentinel," from "Soldier's Life," opus 146, an exquisite piece of writing, with a dreamy measure accented by a rhythmic undertone and a touch of distant drums, was beautifully performed.

Mr. Henschel, besides directing the orchestra in the numbers above mentioned, sang an aria from Weber's "Euryanthe" and "Pogner's Address" in the "Meistersinger," Mr. Listemann conducting the accompaniment. Mr. Henschel sang these selections with great success, the latter, especially, being quite without defect. The graceful orchestral accompaniment to this number was very finely given. The next concert will be marked by the performance of Beethoven's "Pastoral Symphony," Herold's overture to "Zampa," and a piano concerto of his own composition and two compositions of Liszt, by Dr. Louis Maas. The announcement is made that the series will close March 11, on which occasion the ninth symphony (Beethoven) will be presented. As this work requires a well drilled chorus ladies and gentlemen desirous of assisting on that occasion must register their names and addresses at the box office of the Music Hall with Mr. Peck before 6 P. M. on Tuesday, January 10, after which date the selections will be made and the accepted ones duly notified. The choral rehearsals will take place January 23 and 30, February 21 and 27 and March 7 at Bumstead Hall, and will be conducted by Mr. Henschel.

We were unable to attend the Boston Symphony concert Saturday evening. It was the anniversary of Beethoven's birth, and the programme strictly commemorated the event, the principal numbers performed being the Fifth Symphony and the G major piano concerto, No. 4. Mr. George W. Sumner was the pianist of the concert, and Mrs. Georg Henschel contributed a number of Beethoven's songs. At the next concert Mr. Henschel will be the soloist.

Mr. Higginson has re-engaged Mr. Henschel to conduct the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra next season at the salary of $10,000.

Musical Matters at the Hub—Georg Henschel and Cyrus Haldemann Again.

BOSTON, Jan. 2, 1881.

We attended the tenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and must confess to being pleased with the programme (which is here given in full) and its interpretation:

Overture, "Ali Baba".....Cherubini
Scena, "Euryanthe".....Weber

Georg Henschel.

Symphony in C, No. 2, Op. 61.....Schumann

Caprice, "The Sentinel".....Hiller

Pogner's Address.....Wagner

Georg Henschel.

Kaisermarsch.....Wagner

The overture was exceedingly well performed, the conductor and the orchestra entering into the spirit of the piece and doing some excellent work. The scena was not well sung. We do not admire Mr. Henschel's method, although there are thousands who do. The symphony was characterized by an individuality of interpretation that was breezy and sometimes erratic, the movement allegro na mon troppo, being taken, in our opinion, none too fast, while the adagio espressivo was as well done on this occasion as upon any previous one, while the final movement, allegro molto vivace, was full of life and palpitating with vivacity. As a whole the work was well read. There were times when we thought Mr. Henschel should have held more to ancient traditions; but they were never so pronounced as to interfere with the palpable enjoyment of the audience. The best number on the programme, that is, the one that met with the heartiest applause was Hiller's "The Sentinel," from "Soldier's Life," op. 146. But in spite of the enthusiastic demand for a repetition it was not granted.

Now, for a few words as regards Mr. Henschel. Every musician and critic will acknowledge that it is the music we ought to care for and not the conductor, but we saw people stand up in their seats and crane their heads forward to get a glimpse of Mr. H., especially in the more agitated movements of the various works. Why do they do this? Is there any particular amount of manliness expressed in his positions that call for this unwholesome desire? We maintain not, but it is nevertheless true that an attendant at these concerts cannot sit back in his seat and shutting the eyes, drink in the music only, as could be done when Bernhardt Listemann led, or even T. Thomas. Mr. Henschel stands like an automaton swinging his arm, to the wrist of which is attached by an extemporized bracelet his bâton, and executing the most erratic and entirely unnecessary curls and motions imaginable. He is decidedly æsthetic, and it would occasion no surprise whatever to see him come forward some night with a lace collar and "fixings" to match the Grosvenor of the idyllic Gilbert. There is a decidedly effeminate air about this conductor that is indubitably humorous, and the hollow back, which was one of T. Thomas' strongest points with the fair sex, seems to be the strongest one of Mr. Henschel, the leader of æstheticism in Boston. As we sat listening to the orchestra and watching the various expressions of transcendental emotion on the features of the audience we wondered why these concerts were enabled to attract so many people, and the only conclusion we arrived at was that our people were so thoroughly amazed at the liberality of the banker, musician, philanthropist, Mr. Higginson, that actuated by a feeling of wonder they unhesitatingly walked up to the box-office and purchased their tickets with the air of the man who bought a pig in a bag—not quite certain that it was a pig, but in hopes that the salesman told the truth. Whether their pig has turned out a boar or a sow we are as yet uninformed, but the evidences tend to prove the existence of the first-named animal.

With the intention of gaining the hold that he has felt to be slipping away from him, Mr. Henschel has modified his contortions and his utter disregard for the conventionalities of the ancients, so that but little fault can be found with his tempi. At least his offending in this respect last Saturday was not very pronounced.

In the famous "Pro Bono Publico" letter, which is now alleged to be the joint work of Messrs. Haldeman and Bacon, musicians to their honors the common councilmen, the leader of the Boston Theatre orchestra was very roughly handled, as was the Philharmonic Orchestral Society. Of course there must be a reason, and after much diligent inquiry we have discovered it. Cyrus S.

126
Haldeman has a son, this son plays an instrument — no matter which — and last year was a member of the Philharmonic orchestra as well as that of the Boston Theatre; this year he is a member of neither, but is of the Henschel orchestra, hence, e. g. and i. e., the Henschel orchestra is "too beautiful and holy for anything" while the others are "entirely worthless." When one discovers why the milk is in the cocoanut, what was a mystery before becomes a simple scientific fact.
APOLLO.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night might almost be termed a military one, since march rhythms were present in almost all of the numbers, and the drum and triangle had labor without end. It began with Cherubini's overture to Ali Baba, a work which has more sensational effect than is the wont of this composer. It contains a f climax, well worked up, and a startling amount of crash and force. It was strongly performed. The second number introduced Mr. Henschel as a singer, in Weber's grand aria, Wo Berg' Ich Mich. Mr. Listemann directed the orchestra in this number and the rounds of applause that greeted him as he took the baton must have convinced him that Boston has not forgotten his labors in the cause of orchestral music. The subsequent vocal number, "Pogner's Address" from Wagner's Meistersingers was also directed by him, and went in a flawless manner. Mr. Henschel's singing in these songs was of the best. He is the finest interpreter of German song that Boston, or even America possesses; and this, too, in spite of a naturally rough voice and some faults of mannerism. The peculiar timbre of his voice lends itself splendidly to the broad, manly address of the burgher, Veit Pogner. As he has sung both the songs mentioned, before in Boston, we need not specify their points of excellence. The symphony of the evening was the second of Schumann. With the exception of the last movement, the work was superbly given. The opening theme of horns by violin figures, might have had more boldness, but the strings played with exquisite finish. In the second and third movements the violin themes are of exquisite beauty, and remind us of Schumann's dainty work with the same instruments in the Incantation of Marfred. The trios of the scherzo are splendidly contrasted, and were finely rendered, and the second trio had especial beauty owing to the shading of horns and woodwind. We might have asked a little more careful shading in the adagio where many piano effects were taken mezzo-forte. The violins did excellently in the charming motive, in the highest position, which is ever-present in the string parts, and the oboes also gave their melody with fine effect. The contrapuntal work of this movement was well balanced and clear. In the last movement the violin scales were blurred and the more rapid figures in all the parts might have been somewhat clearer, but the general alla breve character of the movement was strongly and clearly carried out. Mr. Henschel's reading of the whole work was a broad and earnest one, sometimes a little rigid, as if he were repressing himself, but generally intelligent and effective. The other numbers were Hiller's sketch, The Sentinel, a neat picture of military life, with a rhythmic pizzicato background, and the usual quantity of drum. Wagner's Kaisermarsch closed the proceedings with more drum and triangle together with much brass and general racket. We cannot find any great idea in the work, spite of the great noise, even though it serves up "A strong castle is our Lord," in small slices. It is rhythm rather than music. It was, however, well played, save that some of the horns and wood were timid in their attacks once or twice. The next concert promises Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, the overture to Zampa, a concerto by Dr. Maas, and some interesting piano solos by the latter gentleman. The directors of these concerts have certainly presented a catholic series of programmes from which very few important artists of the vicinity have been omitted. The announcement is made that the series will close March 11th, on which occasion the ninth symphony (Beethoven) will be presented. As this work requires a well drilled chorus, ladies and gentlemen desirous of assisting on that occasion must register their names and addresses at the box office of the Music Hall, with Mr. Peck. The list will be closed at 6 P. M. on Tuesday, January 10th, after which date the selections will be made, and the accepted ones duly notified. The choral rehearsals will take place January 23d, 30th, February 21st and 27th, and March 7th, at Bumstead Hall, and will be conducted by Mr. Henschel.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

INTRODUCTION. (Melusine, romantic opera, op. 24.) . . . C. GRAMMANN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in C minor, op. 12 (MS.) L. MAAS.
Allegro maestoso.—Intermezzo (Andante).—Presto.—

SYMPHONY in F. (Pastorale.) No. 6, op. 68. . . BEETHOVEN.

Awaking of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country. (Allegro ma non troppo).—Scene by the brook. (Andante molto moto).—Merry gathering of the country people. (Allegro). Storm. Tempest. (Allegro). Herdsman's song. Blithe and thankful feelings after the tempest. (Allegretto).—

PIANO SOLO.

a. ETUDE. (Waldesrauschen). { LISZT.
b. MIDSUMMERNIGHT'S DREAM—FANTASY.

OVERTURE. (Zampa). HÉROLD.

SOLOIST:

DR. LOUIS MAAS.

DR. MAAS will use a MILLER PIANO.

AT the last Concert of this season, on MARCH 11TH, 1882,

BEETHOVEN'S CHORAL SYMPHONY (No. 9)

will be performed.

Ladies and Gentlemen desirous of singing in the Chorus on that occasion, and willing to attend all the necessary rehearsals, are invited to write their names and addresses in a book provided for this purpose now at MR. PECK'S OFFICE, MUSIC HALL.

THE LIST WILL BE CLOSED AT 6 P. M. ON TUESDAY, JANUARY 10TH, after which date—as only a limited number of voices is required—the selection will be made and ladies and gentlemen duly notified.

The Chorus-Rehearsals will take place from 7.30 to 9 P. M., on

MONDAYS, JANUARY 23D, 30TH,
FEBRUARY 6TH, 13TH,
TUESDAY, FEBRUARY 21ST,
MONDAY, FEBRUARY 27TH, and
TUESDAY, MARCH 7TH,

at Bumstead Hall, and will be conducted by MR. HENSCHEL.

Complimentary Tickets can be given to the members of the Chorus to the Public Rehearsal only.

JOHN P. LYMAN,

Secretary.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

The concert of Saturday evening, the eleventh of the series, began with Grammann's introduction to his own romantic opera of "Melusine," an orchestral movement of truly fascinating character. Meant, perhaps, to hint at the long, vague wandering to which the fairy Melusine was condemned for her offence against her father, the chief figuration of this piece is to be found in a tissue of ingeniously woven harmonies, which twine to and fro in a way that strongly recalls the undulating rhythm and melody of the introduction to Wagner's "Rheingold," although in that the beating and rolling of the river's current are meant to be suggested. This prelude does not give us the wail which, when alluded to in French metaphor as un cri de Mélusine, is synonymous with a shriek of despair; but there are long-drawn and slow-moving notes, now above and now below the central mass of harmonies, which might be accepted as significant of a tender and regretful retrospect. The orchestra played this number with much delicacy and reserve, sustaining well their conductor in an interpretation of much fancy and feeling.

The second number introduced the soloist of the evening, Dr. Louis Maas, who was received with much warmth on coming forward to play his own pianoforte concerto in C minor, already presented by him at one of the Harvard concerts of last year. But as the audience which attends these concerts is so much larger than that to which he then played, and likewise of different composition and temper, Dr. Maas was practically giving another original presentment of his composition, and is, therefore, to be congratulated on the attention and favor with which it was received. For ourselves we cannot help saying that this concerto does not either greatly delight or amply satisfy us. We are ready to admit the mastery of fertile resources of which it shows proof, the skill in orchestration, and the variety of forms of expression. We concede at once that it gives prima facie evidence of both high talent and large learning; and yet it leaves us far less interested and less stirred than many of its very author's lesser writings. That it is thus unsatisfying, is perhaps rather attributable to the epoch than to the man. For it is not alone by music, but by literature, painting and sculpture as well, that one is daily disposed to repeat King Claudius's reproof to Polonius,—"More matter, with less art." The inherent fault, as it seems to us, of Dr. Maas's concerto is like that which causes the first symphony of Brahms to impress us as a great work and to give us little pleasure. A disposition to elaborate; to overlay simple thought with almost extreme phrases; to accompany an orchestral passage with roulades and scales and arpeggios, which, after all, contribute nothing of intrinsic value, but only add the sound of the pianoforte; and to engraft upon a passage for the pianoforte petty orchestral remarks which have no near kinship to the primary themes nor are closely germane to the thought of the moment,—all these are manifestly traits which detract alike from the unity and dignity of the composition, and materially diminish the pleasure it might give and the reputation it might win. And yet if Dr. Maas were not, as we have said, a man of talent and learning, he could not have written this work, the defects of which are rather excellences misdirected. The first movement, with its broad initial phrase, sombre, and yet not oppressive, followed by the gleaming groups of triplets that come down across it, is fresh and inspiring, and seems to betoken an address to the auditor in which grave and dignified thoughts shall be made more fit "for human nature's daily food" by lighter fancies that shall adorn without concealing them. With such an opening there is a chance for a movement both impressive and charming. But so many conceits succeed, so many little episodes and digressions intervene, that the composer really spends his strength for nought, and at last almost every listener but the technically-trained one is half inclined to think with one honest-spoken neighbor of ours, that "after the first three minutes he didn't care for it." But when the interlude begins, with its smooth andante shaped into a kind of polyphonic song without words, there is an instant change to be felt in the atmosphere of the audience. A sweet, harmonious theme, well sustained, rarely far departed from, and gradually developed and enforced,—it was as welcome as flowers in May. There was in this movement a short passage for the right hand only of the pianist, with an answering harmony in the wooden wind instruments, of rare delicacy and plaintiveness of thought, and in constructive effect novel without any touch of the fantastic, worthy of the highest admiration. The last movement, being a presto, permits naturally a less consistent thought and more use of these formal mechanical passages with which treatises and methods of study have made us all familiar. There is a limit to technical possibility when fluent writing and fluent delivery are to be united, and even Beethoven has written variations which have a trivial sound. We recall here a contrasted phrase for the solo instruments and the violins in pizzicato, which is truly indovinato, and there are some subsequent phrasings of much brilliant effect. Altogether, it seems to us a work whose promise is greater than itself; and yet, even as it stands, a work upon which its author is rightly to be congratulated. Dr. Maas of course played his own share with that control of the pianoforte which we have often so gladly noted, and Mr. Henschel and the orchestra took evident pains with their work. Now and then some complexity seemed to make the band hesitate to play freely, and the very high phrases for the first violins in the last movement sounded far too shrill, but no disagreement of consequence was apparent. Beside this concerto Dr. Maas played two selections from Liszt, "Waldesrauschen" and the transcription of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," in so clear and telling a fashion as to give him a triple recall.

The symphony was Beethoven's sixth (in F), which is commonly known as the "Pastoral." The general reading was in too hard and un-plastic a tone, and the temper of the allegri and allegretto was rather boisterous than simply "blithe," "cheerful," or "thankful," as we are told it should be, and the tempest grew almost into a tornado. It is needless to do more than hint that, as usual, Mr. Henschel both departed from the conventional tempi and varied his own from moment to moment at his fancy. Let us rather note that the first two movements were given with a good deal of steadiness, and the second (the "scene by the brook," andante molto) was almost unexceptionable, while the horns and bassoons acquitted themselves remarkably well in the third movement, in spite of being worried and hampered by the over-swift pace into which they were forced.

The concert ended with another old theatrical favorite, the overture to "Zampa." Mr. Henschel has an unquestionable talent for the dramatic, and this hackneyed prelude to Herold's compound of peace and piracy and punishment was made to sound as fresh and vivid and lively as though it were the newest of the new, and was evidently much relished.

The pianoforte, a Miller, was not worthy of the time and place. This is the second time on which an instrument of this make has appeared in these concerts, and we hope it will be the last. Not that these pianofortes have not good qualities, but they are too thin, dull and metallic altogether for great music in a great hall. On such occasions the audience has a right to the best, which, if attainable in all departments, and there are several American makers whose instruments are greatly superior, not to mention the splendid imported Blüthners. Nor can we quite understand why Dr. Maas should have been willing to use an inexpressive instrument, which in the distance was hardly audible. A mere pianist may easily consent to play on anything which does not quite destroy his effects; but how a composer can so far forget his pride in his own music, as to play it on any instrument less than the best, is a mystery. Of course, everybody understands the mercantile compacts by which some players regularly use particular pianofortes; such contracts come legitimately enough into the department of advertising, and we have no intention of discussing them here. But on so important an occasion as a symphony concert, the use of an inferior instrument for any such purpose is as censurable as would be the printing upon the programme of one of those strings of certificates with which operatic vocalists—such prime judges of instruments!—endorse as the best the pianofortes or harmoniums of any manufacturer who knows how to gain their personal favor and interest. And, if makers would only think of it, such general unfavorable comment as on Saturday evening upon an instrument which proves so unequal to its position, does them far more injury than any good that can derive from a mention of their names at the foot of the programme.

At the next concert, Mr. Charles R. Adams will sing from "Oberon" and "Lohengrin," and the orchestra will play the overture to the former, the finale to the latter, and Schubert's great symphony in C.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night was longer, by almost half an hour, than any of its predecessors, and spite of a number of light and even popular selections, seemed at times to drag. It opened with an interesting introduction to Melusine by Grammann. This was followed by a piano concerto in C minor by Doctor Louis Maas, performed by the composer. From a single hearing we cannot speak with absolute certainty of this work, but the first movement impressed us as being more learned than inspired. Its constant changes of rhythm and prolix development caused many of its effects to become tame, spite of some broad and majestic tutti passages which make strong climaxes. The second movement has somewhat more to say, although the changes of rhythm and key are still numerous. It contains one especially quaint and tender theme which is at first announced upon the horn and then responded to by the piano supported only by the lower wood wind. This odd duet passage is remarkably beautiful and gives an earnest though sombre bent to the rest of the movement. The last movement suffers from some of the faults which we have charged to the first, spite of a swinging and appropriate theme given pizzicato by the strings, and the general vein of this part of the work seems chiefly formed to display difficulties of technique which become monotonous. The work, as are all of Doctor Maas' compositions for orchestra, is finely scored. Dr. Maas played the piano part with that precision and calm surety which is one of his leading characteristics, but was not well seconded by the orchestra. The attacks were timid and sometimes too late, and the general effect was as if the musicians were feeling their way through the intricacies of the work. These intricacies were at times great enough to form a valid excuse for the shortcomings. Doctor Maas performed two solos later in the evening, displaying much delicacy in Liszt's Waldestrauchen and great technique in the Mendelssohn Wedding March as arranged by the same composer, the latter winning the most enthusiastic applause and thoroughly deserving it. The symphony of the evening was the sixth of Beethoven—the Pastoral. It is not Beethoven's best by any means, even though it has been made the justification of programme music for evermore. We are sure that all persons enjoy the fifth more heartily, even though it is less definite in its purpose, and that the fact that there is no special meaning attached to the four tremendous brass chords in the great Schubert symphony, does not make that work less impressive. But here it was, with its musical poultry—cuckoo, quail, yellow hammer and nightingale—its rustic dance with picture of the drunken musician in the bassoon (excellently performed), its fight among the dancers, thunderstorm, shepherd's thanksgiving and all the other graphicalities. It was well played; the violin figures of the first and last movements were especially clear and steady; the oboe work in the third movement was well rendered, and even the terribly trying horn figures were almost entirely free from blemish. We thought that both the first and second movements could have been improved by being taken somewhat faster, but the thunder storm was finely shaded and effectively rendered; the last movement was also given in a manner that brought out all its beauties. The concert closed with that conglomeration of melodies (from prayers to dances) yecept the Zampa Overture. It was played with spirit and lightness, and its strong contrasts made the most of.

The next concert offers the following programme: Overture and Air, Oberon, Weber; Symphony in C, Schubert; The Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell (Lohengrin), Wagner. Mr. Charles R. Adams will be the soloist, and the announcement of the [powerful] Schubert symphony is a guarantee of an interesting concert.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with the Introduction to C. Grammann's romantic opera, "Melusine," which is a well written and richly scored work, not strikingly original in design or treatment but flowing, effective and interesting. It was played with much warmth of color and grace of style. The symphony was the "Pastoral," and it is hardly necessary to add that we once again had Beethoven imposed by Mr. Henschel. The first movement became a startling novelty by the rapidity with which it was taken. It was difficult in the surprise of the moment to decide whether we were listening to a performance of the graceful and tender opening of the most graceful and tender of all Beethoven's symphonies, or to a polka or "walk-round." The composer's indication is allegro ma non troppo, which means, if it means anything, gaily but not too much so; but it was taken by the conductor at one of his favorite galloping paces that destroyed the whole spirit, character and delicacy of the movement. Not only this, but at every crescendo the time was hurried still more, only to return to its normal motion when a favorable crescendo presented itself. The intention of this portion of the work is to portray the "awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country," but they were wide awake and in the liveliest condition from the very outset. The whole pastoral effect was eliminated by the almost immoderate liberty taken with the time. The andante receding much better treatment and, barring some coarseness of expression, was tolerably well interpreted. The scherzo was opened in a way that was objectionable, though some of its tripping and character was lost in the hard, dry and mechanical reading to which it was subjected. The rustic dance was taken so rapidly that its peculiar color and its marked rhythm almost disappeared in scrambling confusion that ensued. The finale was over noisy and over fast, to the injury of its devotional and uplifting sentiment, but it was by no means the worst feature of the reading as a whole. It is very evident that Mr. Henschel, despite his talents is not a good reader of Beethoven, or if he be one he loses his head when he attempts to interpret him baton in hand. It is depressing and painful to be obliged to complain so constantly of his work, but there is no remedy for it save an improvement in the method of the conductor. The orchestra's share in the performance was very well done. The soloist was Mr. Louis Maas, who performed his concerto in C minor, heard here once before at one of the Harvard concerts last season. His interpretation of it was brilliant, effective and spirited to a high degree. It is a finely written work, admirably scored, and was listened to with great attention. Both the artist-composer and composition were very warmly applauded. Mr. Maas also played Liszt's "Waldestrauchen," and his Fantasia on "A Midsummer Night's Dream," in the facile, masterly and spirited style peculiarly his own. The performance concluded with the overture to "Zampa." The programme for the next concert will be as follows: Overture and Air, "Oberon," Weber; Symphony in C, Schubert, and the Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell, from "Lohengrin," Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. C. R. Adams.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The eleventh of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Introduction, "Melusine," romantic opera, op. 24, C. Grammann; concerto for pianoforte in C minor, op. 12 (MS.), Louis Maas; Symphony in F, "Pastorale," No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; piano solo (a), Etude, "Waldestrauchen;" (b) "Midsummer-Night's Dream," Fantasia, Liszt; and overture, "Zampa," Herold. The first orchestral selection was a delicate and harmonious composition, without striking or original points, and was played in an agreeable and satisfactory way. The symphony was well performed by the musicians, who showed a better knowledge of the time demanded by the first measure than their conductor, and here and there were not apace with him. This introductory number was given with a rapidity which deprived it of much of its charm, and gave little knowledge of its meaning or relation to the succeeding parts of the composition. The accompanying instructions of the composer, which, if they mean anything, seem especially designed to prevent too gay and brisk a manner, seemed to be disregarded, and the measure throughout was given more rapidly than any other in the symphony. Moreover, the time was not evenly sustained, but again gave occasion for Mr. Henschel to display his apparently incorrigible fault of increasing his pace whenever a loud passage is reached, and retarding it whenever he encounters a soft one. The andante, while lacking delicacy and refinement in parts, was much better done and was careful and true in time, but that portion of the allegro which describes the gathering of the country people, although opening well, was clumsy in its conclusion and lacked accent. The storm scene was excellently described, but the effect of contrast in the thankful and devotional thoughts with which the symphony concludes was impaired by too much noise and too little attention to sentiment and intelligent phrasing. The overture to Zampa, which most concertgoers will doubtless agree upon having heard quite enough of, was given one of the best performances it has ever received in this city.

Dr. Louis Maas, the soloist of the evening, was heard at his best in the fantasy of Liszt, which he played exceedingly well, and deserved the marked manifestation of approval which he received. The concerto, of his own composition, was also well performed, but it did not give impression of having any great merit. The first measure was commonplace and without any connected purpose that could be discovered, while it showed no marked indications of originality. The orchestral accompaniment of this portion of the work, also, was disconnected and trivial, and, for the most part, seemed to have no fixed relations to the piano score. The second movement—andante—had a tender and delicate theme, and was very tuneful and bright in feeling, but the final presto suggested the defects of the first number of the composition. The concert next Saturday evening will offer the following programme: Overture and Air, Oberon, Weber; Symphony in C, Schubert; The Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell, Lohengrin, Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. Charles R. Adams.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The symphony on Saturday evening was Beethoven's sixth, "The Pastoral." In the presentation of the work by the orchestra, there were manifested the same characteristics which have been repeatedly noted on former occasions. When vigor, sonority and incisive delivery were becoming properties, they were furnished in abundance. When smoothness, delicacy and evenness of utterance were demanded, there was much less reason to be satisfied. Again, too, was apparent a tendency toward acceleration in crescendo passages; and wide departures from the accepted rates of time, with the usual disregard for Beethoven's cautionary phrase, "ma non troppo," were again annoying, to put it mildly, the want of a logical purpose being the disturbing cause. Beethoven accomplishes, in the Pastoral Symphony, great results with comparatively small means. A pair of horns are all that are used to give the color which brass may furnish, in the first and second movements. A pair of trumpets appear in the third movement; but not until the composer aspires to depict a storm are trombones and drums assigned tasks. There is hardly a work by Beethoven which will so well repay a student in orchestration as the score of the Pastoral Symphony. But the master, in using few "colors" in given with a good deal of steadiness, and the second (the "scene by the brook," andante molto moto) was almost unexceptionable, while the horns and bassoons acquitted themselves remarkably well in the third movement, in spite of being worried and hampered by the over-swift pace into which they were forced.

The concert ended with another old theatrical favorite, the overture to "Zampa." Mr. Henschel has an unquestionable talent for the dramatic, and this hackneyed prelude to Herold's compound of peace and piracy and punishment was made to sound as fresh and vivid and lively as though it were the newest of the new, and was evidently much relished.

The pianoforte, a Miller, was not worthy of the time and place. This is the second time on which an instrument of this make has appeared in these concerts, and we hope it will be the last. Not that these pianofortes have not good qualities, but they are too thin, dull and metallic altogether for great music in a great hall. On such occasions the audience has a right to the best, which, if attainable in all departments, and there are several American makers whose instruments are greatly superior, not to mention the splendid imported Blüthners. Nor can we quite understand why Dr. Maas should have been willing to use an inexpressive instrument, which in the distance was hardly audible. A mere pianist may easily consent to play on anything which does not quite destroy his effects; but how a composer can so far forget his pride in his own music, as to play it on any instrument less than the best, is a mystery. Of course, everybody understands the mercantile compacts by which some players regularly use particular pianofortes; such contracts come legitimately enough into the department of advertising, and we have no intention of discussing them here. But on so important an occasion as a symphony concert, the use of an inferior instrument for any such purpose is as censurable as would be the printing upon the programme of one of those strings of certificates with which operative vocalists—such prime judges of instruments!—endorse as the best the pianofortes or harmoniums of any manufacturer who knows how to gain their personal favor and interest. And, if makers would only think of it, such general unfavorable comment as on Saturday evening upon an instrument which proves so unequal to its position, does them far more injury than any good that can derive from a mention of their names at the foot of the programme.

At the next concert, Mr. Charles R. Adams will sing from "Oberon" and "Lohengrin," and the orchestra will play the overture to the former, the finale to the latter, and Schubert's great symphony in C.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night was longer, by almost half an hour, than any of its predecessors, and spite of a number of light and even popular selections, seemed at times to drag. It opened with an interesting introduction to Melusine by Grammann. This was followed by a piano concerto in C minor by Doctor Louis Maas, performed by the composer. From a single hearing we cannot speak with absolute certainty of this work, but the first movement impressed us as being more learned than inspired. Its constant changes of rhythm and prolix development caused many of its effects to become tame, spite of some broad and majestic tutti passages which make strong climaxes. The second movement has somewhat more to say, although the changes of rhythm and key are still numerous. It contains one especially quaint and tender theme which is at first announced upon the horn and then responded to by the piano supported only by the lower wood wind. This odd duet passage is remarkably beautiful and gives an earnest though sombre bent to the rest of the movement. The last movement suffers from some of the faults which we have charged to the first, spite of a swinging and appropriate theme given pizzicato by the strings, and the general vein of this part of the work seems chiefly formed to display difficulties of technique which become monotonous. The work, as are all of Doctor Maas' compositions for orchestra, is finely scored. Dr. Maas played the piano part with that precision and calm surety which is one of his leading characteristics, but was not well seconded by the orchestra. The attacks were timid and sometimes too late, and the general effect was as if the musicians were feeling their way through the intricacies of the work. These intricacies were at times great enough to form a valid excuse for the shortcomings. Doctor Maas performed two solos later in the evening, displaying much delicacy in Liszt's Waldestrauchen and great technique in the Mendelssohn Wedding March as arranged by the same composer, the latter winning the most enthusiastic applause and thoroughly deserving it. The symphony of the evening was the sixth of Beethoven—the Pastoral. It is not Beethoven's best by any means, even though it has been made the justification of programme music for evermore. We are sure that all persons enjoy the fifth more heartily, even though it is less definite in its purpose, and that the fact that there is no special meaning attached to the four tremendous brass chords in the great Schubert symphony, does not make that work less impressive. But here it was, with its musical poultry—cuckoo, quail, yellow hammer and nightingale—its rustic dance with picture of the drunken musician in the bassoon (excellently performed), its fight among the dancers, thunderstorm, shepherd's thanksgiving and all the other graphicalities. It was well played; the violin figures of the first and last movements were especially clear and steady; the oboe work in the third movement was well rendered, and even the terribly trying horn figures were almost entirely free from blemish. We thought that both the first and second movements could have been improved by being taken somewhat faster, but the thunder storm was finely shaded and effectively rendered; the last movement was also given in a manner that brought out all its beauties. The concert closed with that conglomeration of melodies (from prayers to dances) yecept the Zampa Overture. It was played with spirit and lightness, and its strong contrasts made the most of.

The next concert offers the following programme: Overture and Air, Oberon, Weber; Symphony in C, Schubert; The Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell (Lohengrin), Wagner. Mr. Charles R. Adams will be the soloist, and the announcement of the powerful Schubert symphony is a guarantee of an interesting concert.

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with the Introduction to C. Grammann's romantic opera, "Melusine," which is a well written and richly scored work, not strikingly original in design or treatment but flowing, effective and interesting. It was played with much warmth of color and grace of style. The symphony was the "Pastoral," and it is hardly necessary to add that we once again had Beethoven inspired by Mr. Henschel. The first movement became a startling novelty by the rapidity with which it was taken. It was difficult in the surprise of the moment to decide whether we were listening to a performance of the graceful and tender opening of the most graceful and tender of all Beethoven's symphonies, or to a polka or "walk-round." The composer's indication is allegro ma non troppo, which means, if it means anything, gaily but not too much so; but it was taken by the conductor at one of his favorite galloping paces that destroyed the whole spirit, character and delicacy of the movement. Not only this, but at every crescendo the time was hurried still more, only to return to its normal motion when a favorable depression presented itself. The intention of this portion of the work is to portray the "awakening of cheerful feelings on arriving in the country," but they were wide awake and in the liveliest condition from the very outset. The whole pastoral effect was eliminated by the almost impertinent treatment and, barring some coarse-sounding much better—probably well interpreted. The scherzo was opened in a way that was objectionable, though some of its tripping and character was lost in the hard, dry and mechanical reading to which it was subjected. The rustic dance was taken so rapidly that its peculiar color and its marked rhythm almost disappeared in scrambling confusion that ensued. The finale was over noisy and over fast, to the injury of its devotional and uplifting sentiment, but it was by no means the worst feature of the reading as a whole. It is very evident that Mr. Henschel, despite his talents is not a good reader of Beethoven, or if he be one he loses his head when he attempts to interpret him baton in hand. It is depressing and painful to be obliged to complain so constantly of his work, but there is no remedy for it save an improvement in the method of the conductor. The orchestra's share in the performance was very well done. The soloist was Mr. Louis Maas, who performed his concerto in C minor, heard here once before at one of the Harvard concerts last season. His interpretation of it was brilliant, effective and spirited to a high degree. It is a finely written work, admirably scored, and was listened to with great attention. Both the artist-composer and composition were very warmly applauded. Mr. Maas also played Liszt's "Waldestrauchen," and his Fantasia on "A Midsummer Night's Dream," in the facile, masterly and spirited style peculiarly his own. The performance concluded with the overture to "Zampa." The programme for the next concert will be as follows: Overture and air, "Oberon," Weber; Symphony in C, Schubert, and the Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell, Lohengrin, Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. C. R. Adams.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The eleventh of the concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening. The programme was as follows: Introduction, "Melusine," romantic opera, op. 24, C. Grammann; concerto for pianoforte in C minor, op. 12 (MS.), Louis Maas; Symphony in F, "Pastorale," No. 6, op. 68, Beethoven; piano solo (a), Etude, "Waldestrauchen"; (b) "Midsummer-Night's Dream," Fantasy, Liszt; and overture, "Zampa," Herold. The first orchestral selection was a delicate and harmonious composition, without striking or original points, and was played in an agreeable and satisfactory way. The symphony was well performed by the musicians, who showed a better knowledge of the time demanded by the first measure than their conductor, and here and there were not apace with him. This introductory number was given with a rapidity which deprived it of much of its charm, and gave little knowledge of its meaning or relation to the succeeding parts of the composition. The accompanying instructions of the composer, which, if they mean anything, seem especially designed to prevent too gay and brisk a manner, seemed to be disregarded, and the measure throughout was given more rapidly than any other in the symphony. Moreover, the time was not evenly sustained, but again gave occasion for Mr. Henschel to display his apparently incorrigible fault of increasing his pace whenever a loud passage is reached, and retarding it whenever he encounters a soft one. The andante, while lacking delicacy and refinement in parts, was much better done and was careful and true in time, but that portion of the allegro which describes the gathering of the country people, although opening well, was clumsy in its conclusion and lacked accent. The storm scene was excellently described, but the effect of contrast in the thankful and devotional thoughts with which the symphony concludes was impaired by too much noise and too little attention to sentiment and intelligent phrasing. The overture to Zampa, which most concert-goers will doubtless agree upon having heard quite enough of, was given one of the best performances it has ever received in this city.

Dr. Louis Maas, the soloist of the evening, was heard at his best in the fantasy of Liszt, which he played exceedingly well, and deserved the marked manifestation of approval which he received. The concerto, of his own composition, was also well performed, but it did not give impression of having any great merit. The first measure was commonplace and without any connected purpose that could be discovered, while it showed no marked indications of originality. The orchestral accompaniment of this portion of the work, also, was disconnected and trivial, and, for the most part, seemed to have no fixed relations to the piano score. The second movement—andante—had a tender and delicate theme, and was very tuneful and bright in feeling, but the final presto suggested the defects of the first number of the composition. The concert next Saturday evening will offer the following programme: Overture and air, Oberon, Weber; Symphony in C, Schubert; The Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell, Lohengrin, Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. Charles R. Adams.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The symphony on Saturday evening was Beethoven's sixth, "The Pastoral." In the presentation of the work by the orchestra, there were manifested the same characteristics which have been repeatedly noted on former occasions. When vigor, sonority and incisive delivery were becoming properties, they were furnished in abundance. When smoothness, delicacy and evenness of utterance were demanded, there was much less reason to be satisfied. Again, too, was apparent a tendency toward acceleration in crescendo passages; and wide departures from the accepted rates of time, with the usual disregard for Beethoven's cautionary phrase, "ma non troppo," were again annoying, to put it mildly, the want of a logical purpose being the disturbing cause. Beethoven accomplishes, in the Pastoral Symphony, great results with comparatively small means. A pair of horns are all that are used to give the color which brass may furnish, in the first and second movements. A pair of trumpets appear in the third movement; but not until the composer aspires to depict a storm are trombones and drums assigned tasks. There is hardly a work by Beethoven which will so well repay a student in orchestration as the score of the Pastoral Symphony. But the master, in using few "colors" in this "astonishing landscape," as Berlioz calls it, left a task for readers and interpreters of greater difficulty than in any other symphony by him, except the ninth. There are numberless instances where it is plainly the composer's wish that the answering phrases shall be so expressed that it shall be at once evident that they are answers in close or near imitation. Take for examples those in the andante, where the motif is assigned to the tenors and cellos, in unison; or, more notable still, the passage where the second violins and violas sing the theme; in each the first violins are given an accompaniment in arpeggios. Now the purpose of these citations is to call attention to the fact that at the performance under notice the composer's manifest intention was only partially revealed in the first instance—the aid furnished by the bassoons preventing a complete obliteration,—and in the second was entirely lost. And these failures, it is more than possible, were due to the system adopted for seating the players. The second violins, violas and cellos, severally massed, could hardly have failed to make their quasi-obbligato passages audible to every eye. The initial number of the programme was the prelude to a romantic opera by C. Gramman, entitled "Melusine," a luscious piece of scoring, somewhat after the manner of Goldmark, with an easy flow of melody, but showing no notable invention in form or style. Last on the programme came Herold's "Zampa" overture, which, familiar as it was, might fairly be counted a novelty, since, with the possible exception of some concert by Mr. Thomas, this was the first opportunity a good three-quarters of the audience had been favored with for hearing the work played by an orchestra of proper proportions. The fashion of giving works of this genre in orchestral concerts of the first order is highly commendable. Besides adding a delightful variety to the programme they serve an educational purpose in that they aid in cultivating a catholic taste. Mr. Maas, who was the soloist of the concert, played his piano concerto in C minor, first given here at a Harvard concert last winter, Liszt's "Waldesrauschen" and "Midsummer Night's Dream" fantasia—all in his own easy, clear and accurate style, with just as much warmth as the several works required. A good idea was that of setting the piano on a lower platform in front of the orchestra, all that was fine in either player or instrument being given a full opportunity for display, and the orchestra also having every chance to make its presence felt.

The orchestra will give its third concert in the Sanders Theatre course on Wednesday evening. The twelfth in the Music Hall course will come off on Saturday evening, the following being the programme promised: Overture and aria, "Oberon," Weber; Symphony, C major, Schubert; Lohengrin's legend and farewell, Wagner. Mr. Charles R. Adams will be the singer. The regular public rehearsal will be held on Friday afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert. Herald

The 11th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, with Mr. Louis Maas as the soloist. The programme was as follows:

Introduction (Melusine, romantic opera, op. 24.)
C. Grammann
Concerto for pianoforte in C minor, op. 12 (MS.)
L. Maas
Symphony in F. (Pastorale.) No. 6, op. 68..Beethoven
Piano solos:
a. Etude. (Waldesrauschen.....) Liszt
b. Midsummernight's Dream, fantasy..... Herold
Overture, "Zampa".....Herold

Naturally there was much interest in the pianoforte concerto, with the composer as the soloist, but it must be confessed that the impression left by it, after listening to its rehearsal and last evening's performance, is disappointing. The first movement, allegro, appears to be little more than a series of exercises for the soloist with a very unsatisfactory accompaniment for the orchestra, a far better knowledge of the pianoforte than the orchestra being shown in the movement. The intermezzo, andante, has a single tuneful theme, but even in this there is little that appears original in idea or treatment, and the final movement, presto, returns to the exercise characteristics of the allegro. When the soloist returned for his second part in the programme, and gave such a thoroughly charming rendition of the Liszt selections, it was impossible to refrain from regret that such great abilities as an executant should have been expended upon a composition which, as a whole, is of such inferior merit. Not but that the concerto shows the work of a good musician; its chief fault appears to be caused by an inability to arrange its ideas logically and with due attention to effective climaxes. The Grammann number proved a delightful bit of writing, in which the strings are used with admirable effect, and its interpretation was thoroughly pleasing. The beauties of the symphony were brought out with excellent effect throughout, and each movement was heartily applauded. The ever popular "Zampa" overture was played as it has never been played here before, and its melodious measures were given additional attractions by reason of the large body of players. The concert was certainly a most enjoyable one.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 14TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. } (Oberon.) WEBER.
AIR. }

SYMPHONY in C. SCHUBERT.

Andante; Allegro ma non troppo. Più moto.—

Andante con moto.—Scherzo (Allegro vivace).—

Finale. (Allegro vivace).—

THE LEGEND AND LOHENGRIN'S FAREWELL (Lohengrin). WAGNER.

SOLOIST:

MR. CHARLES R. ADAMS.

AIR. (Oberon.)

WEBER.

From boyhood trained in battlefield
The lance to couch, the falchion wield,
Exulting in the clang of arms,
Danger alone for thee had charms.
Girt with thy father's sword,
Proud of thy father's name,
A slave but to thy knightly word,
Thy only passion: Fame!
A gentle ray, a milder beam,
Broke sweetly on life's broader stream,
And lent its lustre soft and fair,
To temper glory's crimson glare.
Sweet as the breath of eve,
Bright as its star above,
Came woman round thy heart to weave
The magic chain of love.
But though the true servant of beauty divine,
The high path of duty will ever be thine.
Life without love a dreary waste would be—
But life without honour thou liv'st not to see!

THE LEGEND AND LOHENGRIN'S FAREWELL. (LOHENGRIN.) . WAGNER.

In distant lands, where ye can never enter,
A castle stands, the Monsalvat its name;
A radiant temple riseth from its centre,
More costly 'tis than aught of earthly fame!
Therein a vessel of most wondrous power,
A shrine most holy, guarded well, doth stand;
That none but mortals purest guard this dower,
'Twas brought to earth by an angelic band.
Once every year a dove from Heaven descendeth,
To strengthen then its wondrous powers anew;
It is the Grail — and purest faith it spendeth
Among the Knights who are its chosen few.
To serve the Grail whome'er is now elected,
Receives from it a supernatural power;
From all base fraud and craft he is protected,
Away from him doth flee the fatal hour.
E'en when the Knight to distant lands it sendeth,
As champion, to some virtuous cause maintain,
The sacred power him strength and honor lendeth,
If as a Knight he unreveal'd remain.
Such wondrous nature is the Grail's great blessing,
Reveal'd, the Knight must from all mortals flee;
Let not rest in your heart a doubt oppressing,
It known to you he saileth o'er the sea.
Now list, what he to you in troth declareth:
Down from the Grail to you on earth he came,
My father, Percival—a crown he weareth—
His Knight am I—and Lohengrin my name!
O Elsa, but a year with thee I yearned—
To dwell with thee, in happiness bewed,
Then in the Grail's grand throng alive returned
Thy brother whom so long thou fanciedst dead!
If he come home, when I cannot receive him,
This horn, this sword, this ring—all thou shalt give him.
This horn in dangers great him aid procuring,
This sword in battle shall him victory gain!
This ring, remembrance in his mind assuring,
Of him who saved thy name from every stain.
Farewell, farewell, farewell! my sweetest bride!
Farewell! The Grail would spurn, did I abide!

(From the German of Richard Wagner, by John P. Jackson.)

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE HENSCHEL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The twelfth Symphony Concert by the Boston Orchestra, under the leading of Mr. Georg Henschel, was given on Saturday evening at Music Hall, in the presence of a very large audience. Every seat was taken, and many were standing near the entrance doors of the auditorium. The following programme was performed: Overture and air, "Oberon," Weber; Symphony in C, Schubert; the Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell, "Lohengrin," Wagner. Mr. Charles R. Adams was the soloist, who sang the tenor air from "Oberon" with his old-time voice, and elicited the most hearty applause from the audience. Again in the Legend and Farewell from "Lohengrin" Mr. Adams surprised as well as delighted the audience by his singing. Mr. Henschel has undeniably succeeded, even in the brief period in which he has been at work, in bringing his orchestra into a condition of real excellence. We doubt if Schubert's symphony in C was ever much better rendered than on Saturday, by an orchestra of equal numbers. At the next concert, which takes place Saturday evening, 21st inst., the following programme will be performed: Toccata in F, orchestrated by H. Esser, J. S. Bach; Concerto for piano-forte, violin and violoncello, op. 56, in C, Beethoven; Symphony in D minor, "Reformation," No. 5, op. 107, Mendelssohn; Andante for violin and violoncello, from the "Serenade in Canon Form," op. 23, Henschel; Overture, "La Part du Diable," Auber. Soloists, Mme. Terese Liebe, violin; Mr. Theodore Liebe, violoncello; Mr. Henschel, pianoforte. The orchestra and its patrons are to be congratulated on this programme, and Music Hall will doubtless be filled again to hear it.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"Oberon," "Lohengrin," and Schubert's Symphony—A Delightful Concert.

Number twelve in the course of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra occurred in Music Hall last evening. The hall was densely crowded, as usual. Even the bad weather of Friday afternoon was not enough to keep the many patrons of this excellent institution away from the public rehearsal. The programme presented on these two occasions was a particularly attractive one. It consisted of but three numbers, and afforded an opportunity to hear Charles R. Adams, the tenor. Notwithstanding the limited number of works presented, there was no shadow of monotony or sameness about the concert. From the light and delicate fancies of the "Oberon" overture, through the bright, harmonious, even at times powerful, measures of Schubert (poor Schubert, who never heard his own symphonies), to the lofty and purifying strains of the immortal "Lohengrin," all this involves a delightful journey through a variegated landscape, where it is now sunshine and anon gloomy, and where the roses of melody are succeeded by the mountains of harmony. The Oberon overture is a characteristic work, and represents Weber in his brightest and most tuneful humor. Wagner's opera is such a work of unity that almost any portion of it is a fair sample of the whole, and the "Legend and Lohengrin's farewell" embody the keynote and the inspiration of it. In the air from "Oberon" Mr. Adams did some fine work, but it was in the role of Lohengrin that he gained the chief honors of the evening. The orchestral work was excellent throughout. Schubert's symphony in C is of unusual length, being fully one-third longer than the average length of a Beethoven symphony; but it was listened to with unwearied attention and increasing delight. It is throughout a thoroughly characteristic work. Schubert generally comes to us with the tears in his eyes. He is sad even when he smiles. There is very little of this sentiment, however, in the symphony. But the composer never spoke in a more powerful voice or penetrated deeper into the soul of harmony than in this work. It was too difficult for him to perform himself, and he was too poor to get others to play it for him, on which account he never heard the full effect of it. It was not till after his death that it was brought out by grand orchestra. It is such music as can be thoroughly appreciated on first hearing, which accounts for the prolonged and reiterated applause accorded it last evening. It received, in fact, more marks of delight from the audience than any orchestral work thus far presented.

The following programme will be presented on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week:

Toccata in F (orchestrated by H. Esser).....J. S. Bach
Concerto for piano-forte, violin and violoncello, Op. 56, in C.....Beethoven
Symphony in D minor (Reformation).....Mendelssohn
No. 5, op. 107.....Mendelssohn
Andante for violin and violoncello.....Henschel
(From the "Serenade in Canon Form," op. 23.)
Overture (La Part du Diable).....Auber
Soloists: Mme. Terese Liebe, violin; Mr. Theodore Liebe, violoncello; Mr. Henschel, pianoforte.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The symphony was Schubert's in C. The performance of this masterpiece was not wanting in spirit or effectiveness of a certain bolsterous description, and as may be easily divined, in the same hastening of the tempi that seems to be established as an incorrigible vice in Mr. Henschel's conducting. The pace at which the various movements were taken compelled the performers to hurry along as well as they might, and with a result that led to much raggedness of execution among the strings and considerable coarseness and scrambling on the part of the wind. The scherzo in particular was greatly jumbled from this cause. Mr. Henschel's idea of the andante con moto seemed to be that it is a rather spirited march. There was much confusion in the finale, and a monotony of color in the whole, owing to the loudness which prevailed through the interpretation. The performance was enthusiastically applauded, however, and evidently proved satisfying in spite of, or perhaps in consequence of, its noisiness. The soloist was Mr. C. R. Adams, who sang Huon's great aria from Weber's "Oberon," and the "Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell," by Wagner, in both which he was heard to brilliant advantage. He was in good voice, and his singing, in expressiveness, power, fire and artistic finish, was worthy of him in his very best days. He fairly thrilled his audience, and was applauded with prolonged and unrestrained enthusiasm. At the next concert the symphony will be the Reformation, by Mendelssohn; a Toccata by Bach; a concerto for piano, violin and cello, by Beethoven; an Andante for violin and cello, by Mr. Henschel; and Auber's overture to "La Part du Diable" will also be performed.

CHICKERING PIANO.

AIR. (Oberon.)

WEBER.

From boyhood trained in battlefield
The lance to couch, the falchion wield,
Exulting in the clang of arms,
Danger alone for thee had charms.
Girt with thy father's sword,
Proud of thy father's name,
A slave but to thy knightly word,
Thy only passion: Fame!
A gentle ray, a milder beam,
Broke sweetly on life's broader stream,
And lent its lustre soft and fair,
To temper glory's crimson glare.
Sweet as the breath of eve,
Bright as its star above,
Came woman round thy heart to weave
The magic chain of love.
But though the true servant of beauty divine,
The high path of duty will ever be thine.
Life without love a dreary waste would be—
But life without honour thou liv'st not to see!

THE LEGEND AND LOHENGRIN'S FAREWELL. (LOHENGRIN.) . WAGNER.

In distant lands, where ye can never enter,
A castle stands, the Monsalvat its name;
A radiant temple riseth from its centre,
More costly 'tis than aught of earthly fame!
Therein a vessel of most wondrous power,
A shrine most holy, guarded well, doth stand;
That none but mortals purest guard this dower,
'Twas brought to earth by an angelic band.
Once every year a dove from Heaven descendeth,
To strengthen then its wondrous powers anew;
It is the Grail — and purest faith it spendeth
Among the Knights who are its chosen few.
To serve the Grail whome'er is now elected,
Receives from it a supernatural power;
From all base fraud and craft he is protected,
Away from him doth flee the fatal hour.
E'en when the Knight to distant lands it sendeth,
As champion, to some virtuous cause maintain,
The sacred power him strength and honor lendeth,
If as a Knight he unreveal'd remain.
Such wondrous nature is the Grail's great blessing,
Reveal'd, the Knight must from all mortals flee;
Let not rest in your heart a doubt oppressing,
If known to you he saileth o'er the sea.
Now list, what he to you in troth declareth:
Down from the Grail to you on earth he came,
My father, Percival—a crown he weareth—
His Knight am I—and Lohengrin my name!
O Elsa, but a year with thee I yearned—
To dwell with thee, in happiness bewed,
Then in the Grail's grand throng alive returned
Thy brother whom so long thou fanciest dead!
If he come home, when I cannot receive him,
This horn, this sword, this ring—all thou shalt give him.
This horn in dangers great him aid procuring,
This sword in battle shall him victory gain!
This ring, remembrance in his mind assuring,
Of him who saved thy name from every stain.
Farewell, farewell, farewell! my sweetest bride!
Farewell! The Grail would spurn, did I abide!

(From the German of Richard Wagner, by John P. Jackson.)

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE HENSCHEL SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The twelfth Symphony Concert by the Boston Orchestra, under the leading of Mr. Georg Henschel, was given on Saturday evening at Music Hall, in the presence of a very large audience. Every seat was taken, and many were standing near the entrance doors of the auditorium. The following programme was performed: Overture and air, "Oberon," Weber; Symphony in C, Schubert; the Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell, "Lohengrin," Wagner. Mr. Charles R. Adams was the soloist, who sang the tenor air from "Oberon" with his old-time voice, and elicited the most hearty applause from the audience. Again in the Legend and Farewell from "Lohengrin" Mr. Adams surprised as well as delighted the audience by his singing. Mr. Henschel has undeniably succeeded, even in the brief period in which he has been at work, in bringing his orchestra into a condition of real excellence. We doubt if Schubert's symphony in C was ever much better rendered than on Saturday, by an orchestra of equal numbers. At the next concert, which takes place Saturday evening, 21st inst., the following programme will be performed: Toccata in F, orchestrated by H. Esser, J. S. Bach; Concerto for piano-forte, violin and violoncello, op. 56, in C, Beethoven; Symphony in D minor, "Reformation," No. 5, op. 107, Mendelssohn; Andante for violin and violoncello, from the "Serenade in Canon Form," op. 23, Henschel; Overture, "La Part du Diable," Auber. Soloists, Mme. Terese Liebe, violin; Mr. Theodore Liebe, violoncello; Mr. Henschel, pianoforte. The orchestra and its patrons are to be congratulated on this programme, and Music Hall will doubtless be filled again to hear it.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"Oberon," "Lohengrin," and Schubert's Symphony—A Delightful Concert.

Number twelve in the course of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra occurred in Music Hall last evening. The hall was densely crowded, as usual. Even the bad weather of Friday afternoon was not enough to keep the many patrons of this excellent institution away from the public rehearsal. The programme presented on these two occasions was a particularly attractive one. It consisted of but three numbers, and afforded an opportunity to hear Charles R. Adams, the tenor. Notwithstanding the limited number of works presented, there was no shadow of monotony or sameness about the concert. From the light and delicate fancies of the "Oberon" overture, through the bright, harmonious, even at times powerful, measures of Schubert (poor Schubert, who never heard his own symphonies), to the lofty and purifying strains of the immortal "Lohengrin," all this involves a delightful journey through a variegated landscape, where it is now sunshine and anon gloomy, and where the roses of melody are succeeded by the mountains of harmony. The Oberon overture is a characteristic work, and represents Weber in his brightest and most tuneful humor. Wagner's opera is such a work of unity that almost any portion of it is a fair sample of the whole, and the "Legend and Lohengrin's farewell" embody the keynote and the inspiration of it. In the air from "Oberon" Mr. Adams did some fine work, but it was in the role of Lohengrin that he gained the chief honors of the evening. The orchestral work was excellent throughout. Schubert's symphony in C is of unusual length, being fully one-third longer than the average length of a Beethoven symphony; but it was listened to with unwearied attention and increasing delight. It is throughout a thoroughly characteristic work. Schubert generally comes to us with the tears in his eyes. He is sad even when he smiles. There is very little of this sentiment, however, in the symphony. But the composer never spoke in a more powerful voice or penetrated deeper into the soul of harmony than in this work. It was too difficult for him to perform himself, and he was too poor to get others to play it for him, on which account he never heard the full effect of it. It was not till after his death that it was brought out by grand orchestra. It is such music as can be thoroughly appreciated on first hearing, which accounts for the prolonged and reiterated applause accorded it last evening. It received, in fact, more marks of delight from the audience than any orchestral work thus far presented.

The following programme will be presented on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening of next week:

Toccata in F (orchestrated by H. Esser).....J. S. Bach
Concerto for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, Op. 56, in C.....Beethoven
Symphony in D minor (Reformation).....Mendelssohn
No. 5, op. 107.....Mendelssohn
Andante for violin and violoncello.....Henschel
(From the "Serenade in Canon Form," op. 23.)
Overture (La Part du Diable).....Auber
Soloists: Mme. Terese Liebe, violin; Mr. Theodore Liebe, violoncello; Mr. Henschel, pianoforte.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The twelfth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The symphony was Schubert's in C. The performance of this masterpiece was not wanting in spirit or effectiveness of a certain bolsterous description, and as may be easily divined, in the same hastening of the tempi that seems to be established as an incorrigible vice in Mr. Henschel's conducting. The pace at which the various movements were taken compelled the performers to hurry along as well as they might, and with a result that led to much raggedness of execution among the strings and considerable coarseness and scrambling on the part of the wind. The scherzo in particular was greatly jumbled from this cause. Mr. Henschel's idea of the andante con moto seemed to be that it is a rather spirited march. There was much confusion in the finale, and a monotony of color in the whole, owing to the loudness which prevailed through the interpretation. The performance was enthusiastically applauded, however, and evidently proved satisfying in spite of, or perhaps in consequence of, its noisiness. The soloist was Mr. C. R. Adams, who sang Huon's great aria from Weber's "Oberon," and the "Legend and Lohengrin's Farewell," by Wagner, in both which he was heard to brilliant advantage. He was in good voice, and his singing, in expressiveness, power, fire and artistic finish, was worthy of him in his very best days. He fairly thrilled his audience, and was applauded with prolonged and unrestrained enthusiasm. At the next concert the symphony will be the Reformation, by Mendelssohn; a Toccata by Bach; a concerto for piano, violin and cello, by Beethoven; an Andante for violin and cello, by Mr. Henschel; and Auber's overture to "La Part du Diable" will also be performed.

CHICKERING PIANO.

THE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Twelfth Concert on Saturday Evening; Some Specially Noteworthy Features— The Gilmore Concert—Attractions of the Coming Week on the Dramatic Stage and Concert Platform.

There was present at the symphony concert of Saturday evening an unusually large audience, whose enthusiasm was in proportion to its numbers, and which applauded to the very echo. We are sure that we speak but simple truth when we attribute this exalted and responsive mood, in largest measure certainly, to the presence of Mr. Charles R. Adams, whose singing was remarkable for its own intrinsic character and for the effect it produced. The concert began with that wonderful overture to Weber's "Oberon." If Mr. Henschel had done no other of many notable things since he came to Boston, we should be his grateful debtors for what we may fairly call revelations in regard to the inherent possibilities of those dramatic overtures which have been familiar to us all ever since we knew anything of concert music. Transcribed for the pianoforte or reduced to meet the exigencies of little orchestras in concert-rooms, or played as l'événement du rideau in theatres, they must often have been to most of us a source of wonder that great men could have written them. Mr. Henschel gives them vitality, and they show themselves more as they are,—fitting prologues to the tragedy, the comedy, or the fantasy of the lyric stage. And if, in the heat of moment, the leader hastens and strengthens more than seems strictly just, as he is ever wont to do, here at least he finds no conservative criticism rigidly opposing him with the principles of a classic standard, and his individualism is more nearly justified by the energy and the dramatic ardor it contains and imparts. The "Oberon" overture then began with great delicacy and expressiveness, and continued thence to grow in power and purpose to that almost tumultuous climax with its heavy surgings and rollings deep down in the basses, far below the general harmony. For ourselves, we found the finale far too rapid, and we should have welcomed a slower time and a gentler touch where the tenor air is foreshadowed; but as the overture did not alone present us this, we are not disposed to be captiously critical here. So soon as the late comers had settled into their seats, Mr. Adams came forward to sustain the impression already created by singing the great tenor scene from the same opera. He was in good voice, and entered upon his not easy task with all the freedom of the lyric artist who, not dependent upon his notes, can sing with the directness and fulness that the outspoken habits of the stage engender and develop. The martial introduction was declaimed with breadth and boldness, the sudden higher notes ringing out strongly, and the tender melody in praise of love, so delicately ornate, was in tenderly true contrast to the previous mood. Later in the evening—indeed, for the closing number of the programme—Mr. Adams sang the whole of that beautiful scene in which Lohengrin recounts the story of the Holy Grail to Elsa, reveals himself to her, and bids her farewell. Displease us and perplex us as Wagner may, by his eccentricity, his theories and his abstruseness, he has yet passages of pure poetry, of which this is one. The peculiar and yet unobtrusive character of the orchestration, rising into unavoidable saliency only in moments when the actor's passion is at its height and needs the strongest material aid, the continuous growth of the narration, and the thrilling burst of emotion at the close, make this scene, with that of Elsa's vision and the proof of its prophecy, pages which the lovers of true dramatic music will never let die. Mr. Adams sang this long scene,—which, as well as the "Oberon," he gave in the original German text,—like a great artist. The opening of the narrative presented the mystic legend with idyllic simplicity, which gradually grew in intensity and fervor as Lohengrin made known his personality, and yet the singer had reserved sufficient power and feeling to give the passion of the last few lines a potent rendering. In a word, the performance of these two scenes showed us Mr. Adams at his best,—with equal voice, true style and phrase, and just dramatic understanding and portrayal.

The symphony, which was the only other number of the programme, was that great work of Schubert in C. At the close there was quite a salvo of applause, which we cannot help thinking was paid more to the beauty and the glory of the music than to the merit of the performance. And we must believe that the sober second thought of many in that great audience will coincide with ours when we say that all the splendor of sound and excitement of speed which Mr. Henschel so wonderfully evokes are dearly bought if their price be a sacrifice of the true intention of the composition. The lovely andante con moto of the symphony must be among the music cherished by scores of amateurs and connoisseurs who were present on Saturday night. We will say with them, if they wish, that the reading then given was vivacious, vigorous and effective; but will they not say with us that they missed the tender eloquence of its theme—only less touching, perhaps, than the marcia funebre in the "Eroica"—in that jaunty lightness? Let us be just, however, and admit that in this very movement, after the theme had been fully developed and the episode which the strings begin had entered, the time was somewhat relaxed and a near approach to the true rate retained until the final return of the original theme. The scherzo was taken at an acceptable rate, but the playing was too methodical and serious, and the true character of those frequent little runs for the violins, which are for all the world like ripples of laughter, was turned into gentle gravity. The first movement began very well and showed a good deal of technical improvement in many parts of the orchestra, but the piu moto which it ends soon increased to a thorough presto, in which the band gave us all the notes, but without significant phrasing. The final allegro vivace was certainly full of spirit and dash, and even had that gayer flavor which the preceding movement lacked. In spite of its great length it was played strongly to the very end, and while it had not had much variety of shading, there was yet at last an added force and fire that might well stir up to enthusiasm and carry away an audience of less favorable predisposition through the exhilaration of the moment,—just as we still think is often the case with the conductor himself, situated as he is between the two fervors of a great orchestral force and of a compact and interested mass of eager and friendly listeners.

For the next concert much attractive variety is promised. Mr. and Mrs. Liebe, the violoncellist and violinist, are to assist; they will play an andante by Mr. Henschel, and (with Mr. Henschel at the pianoforte) a Beethoven concerto. The orchestra will perform Mendelssohn's "Reformation" symphony, Bach's Toccata in F, as instrumented by Esser, and Auber's "La Part du Diable" overture.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert last evening was a successful and brilliant one. The overture to Oberon was perhaps a little violent in its execution, but the succeeding song from the same opera was surprisingly well sung by Mr. Adams. He was often obliged to have recourse to the falsetto register, but all the high notes, both chest and falsetto, were well intoned, and the aria was given with great beauty and sweetness. Mr. Adams did almost equally well in the "Farewell" from Lohengrin, in which he gave great dramatic force, but at the close he became somewhat throaty, though the huskiness which he sometimes exhibits was almost entirely absent. The Schubert symphony (the great ninth) was also given with much majesty, and awoke more enthusiasm than any of the series thus far. It was a trifle too brassy in the scherzo, but in the success of the whole one may pass over a few individual blemishes in silence. Mr. Henschel is remarkably successful in his working-up of strong climaxes, and such are plenty in this symphony. The third movement seemed the least perfect, and the finale the most successful, although in this the strings exhibited at times trop de zèle. But the fiery impetuosity of the finale fits Mr. Henschel's vein nicely, and the result was an impressive and thrilling performance of the movement. The violins in the more florid work of this part deserve great praise. The next concert is to give considerable Henschel; that gentleman appearing on the programme as conductor, composer and pianist. The symphony will be the Reformation by Mendelssohn. The programme is to open with a toccata by Bach, and end with a very pretty overture, Le part du Diable, by Auber—a decided sweep. Beethoven's concertos for violin, cello, and piano, and Henschel's andante for violin and cello, opus. 23, complete the list. The string parts of the above two works will be performed by Mme. Theodor Liebe and her brother, Mr. Theodore Liebe.

Home Journal
BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The eleventh Boston Symphony orchestra concert took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening. The first selection on the programme was the introduction to G. Grammann's romantic opera, Melusine. The work is scored in an effective and brilliant style, its superfluity of sweetness being its only objectionable characteristic. The performance was buoyant and spirited, in delightful accord with the suggestions of the composition. It is impossible to commend Mr. Henschel's interpretation of the Pastoral symphony of Beethoven, and the novelty associated with the performance was its only interesting feature. We found his reading at the beginning of the allegro ma non troppo movement to be strictly in accord with the metronomized time as indicated in the Litolf piano arrangements of the symphony; but the conductor failed to maintain anything like a steady and consistent tempo, nor was there any tempo rubato manifested in true sense of the term. Nearly every crescendo was hurried and every diminuendo retarded, and the beautiful poetry of the work was in no way effectively or artistically presented. Both the dance, and the final movement of the symphony were played altogether too fast, and the performance was void of all the refinement and grace which might serve to present the pastoral character of the music with the true effect that was intended for it. A more inappropriate performance of a Beethoven symphony has seldom, if ever, been heard in Music Hall. Dr. Louis Maas was the soloist of the concert, his principal performance being that of his concerto in C-minor, a work constructed on pleasing subjects very clear in form, delightfully written for the solo instrument and admirably scored for the orchestra. It has been once previously performed in Boston, and we see no reason to change the opinion that we then expressed in regard to it, though by a second hearing of the work we are enabled to judge it more justly. Romanticism in the truest sense pervades the whole of the opening movement, which is an allegro maestoso, wonderfully rich in its instrumentation. The intermezzo also has romance or song without words by way of slow movements. The melody here is adequately distinguished by symphonic depth. The presto, which brings the work to a termination, is as bright and sparkling a piece of writing as could well be fancied, scored in perfect taste and full of genial touches of humor. That the composer played his own not easy music con amore may readily be taken for granted. There was a perfect mastery of all technical difficulties, united with a finish of style which rendered his performance an extremely enjoyable one. Mr. Maas also played Liszt's Waldesrauschen, and his fantasia on Midsummer's Night's Dream in his characteristically brilliant and effective style. At the next concert Mr. C. R. Adams will be the soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Transcript
The Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert on Saturday evening presented Schubert's great "Symphony in C" and selections from Weber's "Oberon" and Wagner's "Lohengrin," with Mr. C. R. Adams as the soloist. The overture to "Oberon" was the opening number, and was better played than the rest. Whether from the peculiar division of the orchestra into two lobes, or from some other cause, the clearness and unity so desirable in the rendering of the melodious and beautiful symphony was not attained. Far better renderings of it have been enjoyed here. Indeed, the roughness and confusedness of the body of tone and the monotonous emphasis of the interpretation, with all the repetitions, made the superb work even wearisome, a thing that would hardly have been thought possible. Mr. Adams's singing of the difficult Oberon scena was a remarkable display of his powers, but his great effect was made in the "Lohengrin" air, when he fairly thrilled the spellbound audience with the deep dramatic significance which he imparted with most exquisite art and feeling to the narration of the mystic legend. He was enthusiastically applauded, and recalled even after the audience had moved to go out.

At the concert of next Saturday the symphony will be the "Reformation," by Mendelssohn; a toccata by Bach; the concerto for piano, violin and cello, by Beethoven; an andante for violin and cello, by Mr. Henschel; and Auber's overture to "La Part du Diable" will also be performed. Mr. and Mme. Liebe and Mr. Henschel will be the soloists. The usual public rehearsal will be held on Friday afternoon.

The "Henschel war" has waged angrily since I last wrote, and is causing any amount of amusement to outsiders. Some of the zealous adherents of the new conductor have rushed into print and berated the critics roundly, but in this sort of warfare the newspaper men are likely to come off best since they can get in their blows last as well as with some degree of continuity. Besides, such writers as Woolf, Aphorp, Capen, Elson, and Ticknor, know what they are talking about when they discuss music, and are not liable to make many mistakes. The mode of warfare adopted by the advocates of Mr. Henschel in making direct and personal attacks upon the critics is likely to render the discussion of their favorite's abilities none the less pointed and severe. There is, of course, much talk about a "ring of the critics," formed for the purpose of crushing the stranger. This is absurd. If there is a city in America where the critics are independent in their opinions, and, especially, one of another, it is Boston. This feeling of independence is carried to so great an extent, that, while courtesy may govern their personal relations, there is very little association, one with another. In the social and musical clubs, it is rarely the case, that more than one or two of these gentlemen are found in the same organization. Every attempt on the part of any one to unite these expressions, in any common cause, has been futile, and above all things there is a professional jealousy among the musical and dramatic writers here, for fear the outside public may think one writer is influenced by the opinions of another. Hence, half a dozen different opinions may possibly be read in the different daily papers, and as many more as widely divergent in the Sunday press, but the criticisms, in whichever direction they may tend, are honest. This has been the case for a quarter of a century, at least. As for the chance for bribery, it is very small. The Boston musical writers, as a class, are gentlemen who, aside from their personal character for honesty and uprightness, are lifted above the necessity of becoming mercenary. Several of them command large salaries, either as writers or in places of trust, and some are rich in worldly goods to the extent that ought, certainly, to preclude the idea that their pens would, under any circumstances, be for sale. Some very amusing incidents might be told, wherein agents and artists have held different opinion. There are doubtless some black sheep, but the influence of this class of writers is exceedingly small, and they are generally shunned by the others, and regarded with utter contempt. So far as the Henschel business is concerned the whole matter is just here: The leading musical writers have, strangely enough for once, been quite unanimous in their comments upon Mr. Henschel's readings of the symphonies, in the belief that his tempi are often faulty and misconceived, and that his extravagant mode of conducting fails to produce the best work on the part of the musician. On the other hand, there appears to be a class of people who think that a conductor who receives $500 a night for his services must have a great head, and can not, under any circumstances, go wrong. CLIFFORD. BOSTON, MASS., December 15, 1881.

The hyper-critics were in full cry last Sunday and Monday over Mr. Henschel's tempo at the prior concert, and Mr. Higginson's method of securing an orchestra for next season. In their several departments they had it their own way; but, unfortunately for them, in Messrs. Higginson and Henschel's department, crowded audiences seemed to give the preference to the reality of the music to the hypothesis of propriety. What the public care for is that they are getting the best of the great masters at a very reasonable cost through the munificent generosity of a single public-spirited gentleman and the devotion and skill of a non-disputatious conductor. And the public are likely to remain unconvinced that such masterly preëminence is less deserving than chronic fault-finding.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

TOCCATA in F. (Orchestrated by H. Esser.) . . . J. S. BACH.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN
AND VIOLONCELLO. Op. 56, in C. . . BEETHOVEN.

Allegro.—Largo.

Rondo alla Polacca. (Tempo di Rondo. Allegro; Tempo primo.)—

SYMPHONY in D minor. (Reformation.) No. 5, op. 107. MENDELSSOHN.

Andante; Allegro con fuoco.—Allegro vivace.—

Andante. Andante con moto; Allegro vivace; Allegro maestoso.—

ANDANTE for Violin and Violoncello. . . HENSCHEL.
(From the "Serenade in Canon Form." Op. 23.)

OVERTURE. (La Part du Diable.) . . . AUBER.

SOLOISTS:

Mme. TERESE LIEBE, Violin.

Mr. THEODORE LIEBE, Violoncello.

Mr. HENSCHEL, Pianoforte.

MR. HENSCHEL will use a CHICKERING PIANO.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Transcript
The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concert on Saturday evening presented Schubert's great "Symphony in C" and selections from Weber's "Oberon" and Wagner's "Lohengrin," with Mr. C. R. Adams as the soloist. The overture to "Oberon" was the opening number, and was better played than the rest. Whether from the peculiar division of the orchestra into two lobes, or from some other cause, the clearness and unity so desirable in the rendering of the melodious and beautiful symphony was not attained. Far better renderings of it have been enjoyed here. Indeed, the roughness and confusedness of the body of tone and the monotonous emphasis of the interpretation, with all the repetitions, made the superb work even wearisome, a thing that would hardly have been thought possible. Mr. Adams's singing of the difficult Oberon scena was a remarkable display of his powers, but his great effect was made in the "Lohengrin" air, when he fairly thrilled the spellbound audience with the deep dramatic significance which he imparted with most exquisite art and feeling to the narration of the mystic legend. He was enthusiastically applauded, and recalled even after the audience had moved to go out.

At the concert of next Saturday the symphony will be the "Reformation," by Mendelssohn; a toccata by Bach; the concerto for piano, violin and 'cello, by Beethoven; an andante for violin and 'cello, by Mr. Henschel; and Auber's overture to "La Part du Diable" will also be performed. Mr. and Mme. Liebe and Mr. Henschel will be the soloists. The usual public rehearsal will be held on Friday afternoon.

The "Henschel war" has waged angrily since I last wrote, and is causing any amount of amusement to outsiders. Some of the zealous adherents of the new conductor have rushed into print and berated the critics roundly, but in this sort of warfare the newspaper men are likely to come off best since they can get in their blows last as well as with some degree of continuity. Besides, such writers as Woolf, Apthorp, Capen, Elson, and Ticknor, know what they are talking about when they discuss music, and are not liable to make many mistakes. The mode of warfare adopted by the advocates of Mr. Henschel in making direct and personal attacks upon the critics is likely to render the discussion of their favorite's abilities none the less pointed and severe. There is, of course, much talk about a "ring of the critics," formed for the purpose of crushing the stranger. This is absurd. If there is a city in America where the critics are independent in their opinions, and, especially, one of another, it is Boston. This feeling of independence is carried to so great an extent, that, while courtesy may govern their personal relations, there is very little association, one with another. In the social and musical clubs, it is rarely the case, that more than one or two of these gentlemen are found in the same organization. Every attempt on the part of any one to unite there expressions, in any common cause, has been futile, and above all things there is a professional jealousy among the musical and dramatic writers here, for fear the outside public may think one writer is influenced by the opinions of another. Hence, half a dozen different opinions may possibly be read in the different daily papers, and as many more as widely divergent in the Sunday press, but the criticisms, in whichever direction they may tend, are honest. This has been the case for a quarter of a century, at least. As for the chance for bribery, it is very small. The Boston musical writers, as a class, are gentlemen who, aside from their personal character for honesty and uprightness, are lifted above the necessity of becoming mercenary. Several of them command large salaries, either as writers or in places of trust, and some are rich in worldly goods to the extent that ought, certainly, to preclude the idea that their pens would, under any circumstances, be for sale. Some very amusing incidents might be told, wherein agents and artists have held different opinion. There are doubtless some black sheep, but the influence of this class of writers is exceedingly small, and they are generally shunned by the others, and regarded with utter contempt. So far as the Henschel business is concerned the whole matter is just here: The leading musical writers have, strangely enough for once, been quite unanimous in their comments upon Mr. Henschel's readings of the symphonies, in the belief that his tempi are often faulty and misconceived, and that his extravagant mode of conducting fails to produce the best work on the part of the musician. On the other hand, there appears to be a class of people who think that a conductor who receives $500 a night for his services must have a great head, and can not, under any circumstances, go wrong. CLIFFORD.

BOSTON, MASS., December 15, 1881.

The hyper-critics were in full cry last Sunday and Monday over Mr. Henschel's tempo at the prior concert, and Mr. Higginson's method of securing an orchestra for next season. In their several departments they had it their own way; but, unfortunately for them, in Messrs. Higginson and Henschel's department, crowded audiences seemed to give the preference to the reality of the music to the hypothesis of propriety. What the public care for is that they are getting the best of the great masters at a very reasonable cost through the munificent generosity of a single public-spirited gentleman and the devotion and skill of a non-disputatious conductor. And the public are likely to remain unconvinced that such masterly preëminence is less deserving than chronic fault-finding.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 21ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

TOCCATA in F. (Orchestrated by H. Esser.) . . . J. S. BACH.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE, VIOLIN
AND VIOLONCELLO. Op. 56, in C. . . BEETHOVEN.

Allegro.—Largo.
Rondo alla Polacca. (Tempo di Rondo. Allegro; Tempo primo.)—

SYMPHONY in D minor. (Reformation.) No. 5, op. 107. MENDELSSOHN.

Andante; Allegro con fuoco.—Allegro vivace.—
Andante. Andante con moto; Allegro vivace; Allegro maestoso.—

ANDANTE for Violin and Violoncello. . . HENSCHEL.
(From the "Serenade in Canon Form." Op. 23.)

OVERTURE. (La Part du Diable.) . . . AUBER.

SOLOISTS:

Mme. TERESE LIEBE, Violin.

Mr. THEODORE LIEBE, Violoncello.

Mr. HENSCHEL, Pianoforte.

MR. HENSCHEL will use a CHICKERING PIANO.

^{score}
The Boston Symphony Concert, which occurred January 21st, was notable for the variety of its programme, which contained selections all the way from Bach and Beethoven to Auber. A Toccata, by J. S. Bach, served to display the strings at their best, since almost all of the contrapuntal figures were given by the orchestral string quartet. The triple concerto for piano, violin, and 'cello, by Beethoven, was not very successful. The soloists were Mme. Liebe, and Messrs. Henschel and Theo. Liebe. The balance was decidedly imperfect, and this was the more noticeable since many of the phrases of its second movement are "imitated" from one instrument to another. The intonation of the two string instruments was very undecided, and the tone thin. Mr. Henschel performed the piano part finely; but all his careful phrasing and delicate shading could not cover the deficiencies of the performance. The orchestra did its part well, under the direction of Mr. B. Listemann. But this work ought not to be given, unless a Joachim, a Rubinstein, and a Fischer can unite together, to give its phrases a charm by especially fine execution. It is one of the least inspiring works of the great master; but its form and beauty of detail make it interesting to the musician.

Mr. Henschel's reading of the Mendelssohn "Reformation Symphony" we did not heartily agree with, at least not in the andante, which was taken slower even than an adagio. Nor did we find the orchestra faultless, since the strings and the horns overpowered many phrases of the oboes and clarinets. We have never been able to go into raptures about this work, even though the contrapuntal treatment of "A strong castle is our Lord," in the last movement, is ingenious and novel. The effect of approaching the climax gradually, and beginning the theme with flute, and wood-wind generally, is Mendelssohnian in its elegance; but the oddity of hearing the broad chorale theme tootled out by this sentimental instrument is strongly felt. The wood-wind was not secure in its attacks in the last movement, — the oboes especially.

The andante for violin and 'cello, in canon form, by Mr. Henschel, was finely given by Mme. Liebe and her brother. The tones were now pure, and the shading excellent. The work is another example of Mr. Henschel's musicianly attainments, and of his ability to work well in the strictest forms, never obscuring the poetic thought by pedantry. The concert closed with Auber's overture, La Pâque du Diable, in which the violins gave the pretty little figures with much grace; but nevertheless, the triviality of the work could not be quite overcome or forgotten.

Yet, we by no means find fault with the choice of some such works in these programmes. The desire seems to be to send the audience home in a good humor, and this has generally been accomplished by introducing some light work, and by keeping the programmes of Spartan brevity and forbidding encores.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA — THIRTEENTH CONCERT.

We have often been disposed to query, when listening to some formal composition by one of the great old organ masters, whether the modern auditor had not, after all, lost as well as gained in that marked extension of the capacities of the instrument which has taken place within half a century. The organ which sufficed for Handel or Bach would seem poor and trivial nowadays, even in comparison merely with a standard church instrument, and would be almost as nothing beside those grander ones which are placed in cathedrals and in concert halls. But not seldom when the full power of these latter is invoked in the conclusion of a great fugue or a full chorus, the clear consistency of the theme is lost under the shrillness of the over-riding twelfths and fifteenths of the mixture stops or drowned by the surging confusion of heavy pedal-basses, until we cannot help longing for less volume and more lucidity—for the simple and more equable, even though far weaker, voicing of some instrument of elder fashion. Such reflections came newly to us as we listened on Saturday evening to the first number of Mr. Henschel's thirteenth programme. This was H. Esser's remarkably direct and proper orchestral arrangement of the well-known toccata in F, by J. S. Bach. The precise movement and relation of every part were defined; in spite of the disadvantage of the divided voices of the second violins and the basses, the strings were still clear and powerful, alike in sustained and in counter-pointed phrases; the long-drawn fundamental notes had the smoothness and regularity of the organ, and the leading was energetic, prompt and even. Though not in itself particularly attractive to a general public, and of an almost tedious length, the toccata found evident favor with the audience, and marks a success for the conductor and the band,—among whom, by the way, we were pleased to observe Signor Campanari as a first violinist.

The second number of the evening introduced Mr. and Mme. Liebe, who were strangers to this audience, although they have been already heard in the city in a bureau concert or two. Mr. Liebe is a violoncellist, while Mme. Liebe plays the violin. Their professional characteristics are quite similar,—a clear, sweet tone, somewhat lacking in force; nice appreciation of sentiment and phrase, but without much energy or enthusiasm in expressing these; a pleasant and sufficient command of technique, marred only by a too frequent failure to attain exactness of intonation. The work chosen for their introduction was Beethoven's triple concerto (with piano-forte) in C, opus 56. This composition, in spite of many passages which are full worthy of the author, is not exactly palpitant d'intérêt, when brought under ordinary circumstances into the concert-room. To make it entertaining to the amateur, and easily traceable by the musician, it should be performed by players of long experience, strength and certainty of intention and execution. The pastoral themes with which the violoncello begins the solo entrances, and which then pass to the violin, were clearly read and phrased with feeling; but in all the ensembles there was a vagueness and weakness which we will not attribute as a fault to the players, but will only regret. Youth must not be expected to fill the measure of Beethoven or of Shakspeare. Mr. and Mme. Liebe were heard, later in the evening, and to entire advantage, in an andante from Mr. Henschel's "Serenade in Canon Form," an unpretending movement for the two solo instruments and double quartet of strings. The theme is gentle and convincing, and developed well, although, we think, at rather too much length; perhaps if the support had been a little more positive, there would have been found in such stronger relief that motive which we missed. In the concerto, Mr. Henschel assumed the piano-forte part, which he played with clearness, and decision of touch and real sincerity of style, following the careful and intelligent leading of Mr. Listemann (who held the baton temporarily) with close attention. But why he again took the lid bodily from the piano-forte we fail to understand,—he having already made one disastrous experiment of the sort, when he obliged Mr. Sumner to perform upon a similarly denuded instrument. The tone disintegrated and scattered, and the effect in most parts of the hall was unsatisfactory to a degree. If he feared lest the piano-forte should overshadow the other instruments, he might have taken a good upright instead of a grand.

The symphony was Mendelssohn's fifth in D minor, opus 105, commonly known as the "Reformation" symphony, and holding as a prominent—if not absolutely its central—thought Luther's chorale "Ein feste Burg." Like all "occasional" work, this symphony is unequal and not altogether attractive. Mendelssohn was apparently not fully inspired by his subject, however much it may have appealed to his intellect as a worthy one. He has here his passages of true eloquence, as in the opening andante; in the peace and happiness of faith which the second movement seems to suggest; in the calm tranquillity which, in the third movement, precedes the entrance of the chorale; and he has some unexpected and thrilling moments—like the awakening trumpets in the first movement—phrases which must have burst upon him in writing, as they do upon the listener in the hearing. But there is much which suggests the perfunctory labor of skilful writing rather than the necessary expression of original thought. In a word, it is a composition due to an external and not an internal impulse, and so possessing the merits and defects which accompany whatever work has such a basis and motive. The playing was excellent throughout; the rich volume of the strings and the steady fulness of the brass in the first movement was delightful, and the counter-pointed finale, which might easily have been turned into confusion, was given clearly, in spite of an extreme rapidity. Mr. Henschel had, of course, his peculiar views to enforce in certain passages, and it would not have been easy to discriminate the several tempi of the last movement according to their nomenclature. But as the symphony is not so strictly composed as most, so we may perhaps more readily overlook such latitude in delivery. And doing this, we are disposed to consider this the best symphony reading which the director has thus far given.

The concert ended with an overture by Auber—"La Part du Diable." If Auber is to be believed on what he therein says, we do not think there is any danger of the devil's monopolizing the best music, for this overture, arring one dainty little theme, very lightly turned off by the violins, is thin and theatrical. But, as the general effect of the programme had been rather heavily uniform, this tinkling and jingling and skipping was cheerful and refreshing, and we were glad to hear it.

The next concert, which falls on the day after Mozart's birthday, will probably be one of the finest of the series. Mozart will be represented in the programme by his "Masonic Funeral Music," his symphony in D, his piano fantasy in C minor (dedicated to his wife), and a nocturne-serenade for four small orchestras, now performed in Boston for the first time. Beside the interest of this music, the habitudes of these concerts will have that of hearing at the piano-forte, Professor Carl Baermann. He will play Beethoven's E flat concerto, number 5, the fantasy just mentioned, a ballad by Rheinberger, and a fantasy by Liszt.

The Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening. It is hardly necessary to say that the weather seemed to have no effect upon the size of the audience: not only every seat was taken, but the usual number were obliged to stand throughout the evening. The programme in many essentials and in general effect differed greatly from its predecessors. It opened with J. S. Bach's toccata in F, as set to the orchestra by H. Esser—a very novel, if not wholly pleasing, introduction. It was followed by Beethoven's concerto for pianoforte, violin and violoncello (op. 56 in C). Mr. Henschel gave a satisfactory reading of the piano score; Mme. Terese Liebe was the violinist; Mr. Theodore Liebe played the violoncello, while Mr. Listemann led the orchestra. The result as a whole was, of course, good, and the efforts of the soloists were rewarded by continued applause. Mendelssohn's Reformation symphony—that broad and noble creation of a genius—was the most notable number, and in it the orchestra did its most careful and effective work. Mr. Henschel's andante for violin and violoncello (from the "Serenade in Canon form," op. 23) afforded Mme. and Mr. Liebe a second and freer opportunity to be heard, and they were warmly received, and retired only after an enthusiastic recall. Auber's bright and surprising little work, overture to the "Part du Diable," closed the concert. Next Saturday will not be Mozart's birthday. It is just one day too late, as the great composer was born January 27, 1756; but the occasion is to be fittingly observed by the managers of the symphony concerts. Altogether a most notable programme will be given, enlisting the services of the brilliant pianist, Carl Baermann. The programme is as follows:

Masonic Funeral Music.....Mozart
Concerto for Pianoforte.....Beethoven
In E flat. No. 5, op. 73.
Nocturno-Serenade in D.....Mozart
For four small orchestras. (First time).
Piano Solo.
a. Fantasy in C minor (dedicated to his wife)...Mozart
b. Ballad.....Rheinberger
c. Venezia e Napoli (Gondoliera and Tarantella)...Liszt
Symphony in D (Koechel, No. 504)...Globe.....Mozart

MUSICAL MATTERS. Herald

Thirteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 13th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, with the following as the programme:

Toccata in F.....J. S. Bach
Concerto for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, op. 56, in C.....Beethoven
Symphony in D minor, No. 5, op. 107.....Mendelssohn
Andante for violin and violoncello.....Henschel
Overture, "La Part du Diable".....Auber

While each of the several numbers was enjoyable, the combination was not as happy as most of the season's programmes have been, the effect as a whole, being somewhat too heavy and sombre. The soloists of the evening were Mme. Terese Liebe, violin; Mr. Theodore Liebe, violoncello, and Mr. Henschel, pianoforte. Much interest was shown in the appearance of Mme. and Mr. Liebe, who received a very cordial greeting upon their entrance, it being their first public appearance here save that at one of the concerts of the Roberts' course last fall. It was quite evident, from the successful effort made by Mr. Liebe, last evening, that his previous appearance was under some disadvantages which were not apparent at the time, and it is a pleasure to recognize the ability shown, by this player, on this occasion. While his playing has not all the strength and vigor desirable, his tone is reasonably full and very pure, his bowing clean, clear and delicate, and his playing shows intelligence and fine artistic training. Many of the solo passages for the cello in the concerto were given with a beauty and grace that was thoroughly charming, and this artist was also heard to fine advantage in the Henschel "Andante." Mme. Liebe showed the same technical excellences as when she played here earlier in the season, and there was, as well, a sympathetic quality which was lacking in her former effort, this added beauty in her playing being particularly noticeable in the Henschel number, which proved one of the gems of the programme. Mr. Henschel's part in the concerto showed him to be a pianist of more than good abilities for such work, his touch being clear and elastic and well suited to give an effective presentation of the pianoforte score. The symphony, commonly known as the "Reformation" from its having been written for the tercentenary festival of the Augsburg confession, commands the admiration of the listener even when poorly played, but the reading given it by Mr. Henschel on this occasion brought out all its grand characteristics with startling effect and aroused the most enthusiastic appreciation of the audience. The graceful theme of the second movement was about the only relief from the sombre coloring of the first part of the programme, and this made this portion of the work particularly enjoyable. The Bach "Toccata," orchestrated by H. Esser, proved something of a novelty from its antique style, and its difficulties were overcome in a masterly fashion by the players. The Auber overture gave a bright finish to the evening's work, as it was played in the same brilliant way as have all this class of compositions that have found a place upon these programmes. Mr. Bernhard Listemann directed the orchestra in the Beethoven concerto, and showed his admirable abilities in this line of duty.

The next Boston Symphony Concert is to have a good deal of Henschel on its program. That gentleman will appear as pianist, composer and conductor, and he has already appeared as singer in the series.

That is a good deal for one man to do, but he will do it all with satisfaction to the public, which seems to be entirely captivated by him. The only thing he cannot do is, to appear as a string quartet, or sing duets with himself.

But that reminds me that (spite of my promise at the outset) you may already have an overdose of

L. C. E.

MUSIC. Currier

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last night was rather distinguished by its length than by its breadth, although it included Bach, Beethoven and Mendelssohn among its composers, not to mention Henschel and Auber, who brought up the rear. It began with a Bach Toccata, which gave the strings an excellent opportunity to display their phrasing and technical ability. It was clearly and beautifully performed. Following this, came the triple concerto of Beethoven, for violin, cello and piano, with Mme. Terese Liebe, and Messrs. Liebe and Henschel as soloists. This was not a success. Not only was a lack of good ensemble work apparent, but the string soloists got exasperatingly out of tune, and seldom displayed the broad, firm delivery which alone can make this work interesting. The Mendelssohn Reformation Sym. phony is not the greatest of the master's instrumental works, even if it does serve up "A strong castle is our Lord" in contrapuntal sauce; and, by the way, this same chorale was given in Wagner's Kaiser Marsch only three weeks ago at these concerts. There are two glorious movements in the work, the Scherzo and the Andante, but, as we heard it last night, we have our doubts as to there being any "movement" at all to the Andante, it was taken so very slow. But, to counterbalance this, the Meno Allegro of the first part was taken too quick. The brass was clearly played throughout, and gave a ringing energy to the first and last movements, and the strings were forcible enough at times to overwhelm the wood-wind. We cannot consider either the symphony or the concerto, as given, to be at all adequate expressions of the ideas intended by the composers. Per Contra the Andante from Mr. Henschel's serenade in canon form, was a really interesting work, which proves anew how excellently this composer can blend the technical with the beautiful. It was admirably played by Mme. Liebe, and Mr. Theodore Liebe; the thin tone and false intonation of the concerto being entirely absent, and both artists displaying refinement and surety in its execution. The concert closed with a rather frothy Auber overture, which was, however, well played, especially by the muted strings. The next concert is to celebrate the birthday of Mozart, and four of that composer's works will be given—the Masonic Funeral Music, the Notturmo Serenade for four small orchestras, the C minor Fantasy, and the Symphony in D. We are sorry that the pleasant Musical Joke should be absent from a Mozart programme, as it would have given a charming humorous touch to the proceedings. Professor Baermann is to be the pianist, and the great Fifth piano concerto of Beethoven is to be given, as well as several solos.

Thirteenth Symphony Concert.

The programme given at the 13th concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday night was not of a character to create an interest in the minds of those seeking entertainment simply. Each of the five numbers was a study requiring close attention, and the concert as a whole was marked by a lack of something to relieve the sense of weight which it left upon the mind. This was supplied to a slight extent by Auber's overture, "La Part du Diable," which came last upon the programme, and by one of the movements in the symphony, but these were not quite sufficient to offset the decidedly hard character of the selections. A Toccata in F by J. S. Bach, arranged for the orchestra by H. Esser, was the opening number, and received a very satisfactory interpretation, Mr. Henschel conducting with good judgment and the quaint phrasing of the work being well brought out. The smoothness with which the bass strings carried the long continued monotone which ran through some of the passages was a noticeable feature, and was remarkably effective. The second number on the programme was a concerto in C, for pianoforte, violin and violoncello, by Beethoven. Mr. Henschel, Mme. Terese Liebe and Mr. Theodore Liebe were the soloists, and Mr. Bernhard Listemann conducted the orchestra. Mme. Liebe performed her part with much skill, her execution being smooth and distinct and her accentuation good. Mr. Liebe did not give a performance that was altogether satisfactory, his higher notes being at times a little uncertain. Some of the passages for violoncello, however, were rendered with great beauty, and, with the exception just noted, Mr. Liebe's execution was good. At the piano Mr. Henschel acquitted himself admirably, and the work of the orchestra was very well done. Mr. and Mme. Liebe also played an andante in canon form by Mr. Henschel, in which both played with marked spirit. The accompaniment was rendered by a double quartet of strings, Mr. Henschel conducting. Mendelssohn's Symphony in D minor, known as the "Reformation," is the only number on the programme which remains to be spoken of, and the manner in which it was performed is entitled to commendation. The andante with which it opens was given with admirable breadth and with a steadiness which was maintained throughout the allegro con fuoco into which the movement changes. We have already spoken of the second movement, which was an allegro vivace, and was given with much brilliancy, eliciting hearty applause. The third movement, beginning with an andante and closing with an allegro maestoso, was also well rendered.

At the fourteenth concert, on Saturday evening next, the programme will be as follows: Masonic Funeral Music, Mozart (Born Jan. 27, 1756); Concerto for Pianoforte, in E flat, No. 5, op. 73, Beethoven; Notturmo-Serenade in D for four small orchestras (first time), Mozart; Piano Solo (a. Fantasy in C minor, Mozart; b. Ballad, Rheinberger; c. Venezia e Napoli, Liszt); Symphony in D (Koechel No. 504), Mozart. Prof. Carl Baermann will appear as soloist.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The thirteenth concert, given on Saturday night, began with Esser's skilful adaptation for orchestra of Bach's toccata in F-major, which was played with much spirit and accuracy, but with altogether too much monotony of forte. Better shading would have revealed the beauties of the work by the contrast which would have been produced. The disadvantages of the method of seating the orchestra were very apparent in the performance of this work. In the portions where the themes are played by different members of the string family, one had to listen very closely to catch that which is assigned to cellos and basses. The string tone was very fine throughout the performance, and in some instances had nearly the roundness and sonority of a well-voiced organ diapason. No one of the works by Beethoven, Mendelssohn and Auber presented at this concert showed the composer at his best as a writer of concertos, symphonies and overtures, respectively. In the concerto for piano, violin and 'cello, Beethoven, apparently hampered by the necessity of treating the solo instruments with strict impartiality, only succeeded in producing a work which is neither an impressive composition in itself nor one which is especially fitted to display the executive powers of any of the players engaged in it. In each of the movements interesting passages occur, but they are treated with a diffuseness which soon becomes tedious. Even the delightful theme of the rondo loses its freshness through the constant iteration. The largo is the most pleasing movement—partly because of its brevity. The solo parts were played by Mme. Liebe, violin, Mr. Liebe, 'cello, and Mr. Henschel, piano, each with much grace, Mr. Liebe's occasional untunefulness being the only notable shortcoming. Mendelssohn's Reformation Symphony, written in 1830 for a special occasion, was not, it is said, considered by its author as a very creditable piece of work. At any rate, he would not permit its publication during his life, and when it appeared in print after his death there was a general utterance of the opinion that the score had better remained in its portfolio. The symphony has one movement, however, which is very charming—the allegro vivace, a genuine scherzo, and of a high order even for him whose other compositions of the same genre are masterpieces in their way. But the charm was nearly spoiled by the unnecessarily strong accent on the initial note of each measure—so strong that the effect of sforzando in those measures where it is prescribed for the last third was entirely lost,—while the playful character of the theme was destroyed by the unreasonably slow tempo adopted. Auber's overture to "La Part du Diable," probably a novelty to the greater part of the audience, is bright and melodious, with several finely contrasted movements. A hunting refrain for a quartet of horns was elegantly played. The opera, by the way, is still popular in Europe, and now that there is a lively demand here for works of its class, might be made a profitable venture for an American manager. Mme. Liebe and Mr. Liebe also played, accompanied by strings, the andante from Mr. Henschel's serenade in canon-form—a graceful theme, neatly wrought out,—with refined taste. Next Saturday's programme will consist largely of works by Mozart, in honor of the master's birthday (Jan. 27). It will be as follows: Masonic funeral music, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte in E-flat, No. 5, op. 73, Beethoven; nocturno serenade in D, for four small orchestras (first time), Mozart; piano solo—a, fantasy in C minor (dedicated to his wife), Mozart; b, ballade, Rheinberger; c, Venezia e Napoli (Gondollera and Tarantella), Liszt; symphony in D (Koechel, No. 504), Mozart. Soloist, Professor Carl Baermann.

The regular public rehearsal will take place on Friday afternoon. The fourth concert in the course at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given on Wednesday evening, and the following will be the programme: Overture, "Oberon," Weber; concerto for pianoforte, violin and 'cello, op. 56, Beethoven; symphony, "Reformation," Mendelssohn; andante for violin and 'cello, from the serenade in canon form, op. 23, Henschel; overture, "La Part du Diable," Auber. Soloists—Mme. Teresa Liebe, violin; Mr. Theodora Liebe, 'cello; Mr. Henschel, pianoforte.

MUSICAL. Gazette

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The thirteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Music Hall, last night, was largely attended, despite the unfavorable state of the weather. It opened with a Toccata in F by Bach, instrumented by Esser, an interesting work, but somewhat tiresome in length and repetitions. It was spiritedly played, the body of string tone sounding to special advantage. It was followed by Beethoven's Concerto, op. 56, for piano, violin, 'cello and orchestra, performed by Mr. Henschel, Miss Teresa Liebe and Mr. Theodore Liebe. It is not one of the master's finest works, and has many dull moments, especially in the opening allegro. It needs good and careful playing to make it interesting. It had the latter, but the untunefulness of the string soloists, particularly the 'cello, marred much of the pleasure that might otherwise have attended the listening to it. The symphony was Mendelssohn's, in D-minor ("Reformation"), by no means one of his happiest inspirations in this class of work. The scherzo is the only movement that is wholly clear and satisfying. The rest is pretentious rather than effective. It was well played, the scherzo with considerable delicacy of style, and the finale with appropriate fire. An andante for violin, 'cello and orchestra in canon form, by Mr. Henschel, a graceful and skilfully-written work, came next. The solo parts were played by Miss and Mr. Liebe with good taste and expression. The whole concluded with a spirited performance of Auber's charming little overture to "La Part du Diable." The next concert will be chiefly devoted to Mozart, in honor of the one hundred and twenty-sixth anniversary of his birth. The soloist will be Carl Baermann, who will make his second appearance here on this occasion, and will perform Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto and a group of selections from Mozart, Rheinberger and Liszt.

It is rumored that the Boston Symphony Orchestra and its conductor will next season be placed on a more independent footing than ever before. It may possibly take the form of a permanent orchestra, with both musicians and conductor on fixed salaries which shall enable them to devote their entire time to orchestral work.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XIV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, JANUARY 28TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

MASONIC FUNERAL MUSIC. MOZART.
(Born Jan. 27th, 1756.)

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE. BEETHOVEN.
In E flat. No. 5, op. 73.

Allegro.—Adagio un poco mosso. Rondo. (Allegro).—

NOTTURNO-SERENADE IN D
FOR FOUR SMALL ORCHESTRAS. (First time.) MOZART.

Andante.—Allegretto grazioso.—Minuetto.—

PIANO SOLO.

- FANTASY in C minor. (Dedicated to his wife.) . MOZART.
- BALLAD. RHEINBERGER.
- VENEZIA E NAPOLI. (Gondollera and Tarantella). LISZT.

SYMPHONY in D. (Koechel No. 504) MOZART.
Adagio; Allegro.—Andante.—Finale. (Presto).—

SOLOIST:

PROFESSOR CARL BAERMANN.

MR. BAERMANN will use a CHICKERING PIANO.

Fourteenth Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given before a large audience at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was presented: Masonic funeral music, Mozart; concerto for pianoforte, in E flat, No. 5, op. 73, Beethoven; nocturno serenade in D, for four small orchestras (first time), Mozart; piano solos—a, Fantasy in C minor (dedicated to his wife), Mozart; b, ballad, Rheinberger; c, Venezia e Napoli (Gondoliera and Tarantella), Liszt; symphony in D (Koechel No. 504), Mozart. As will be seen by an examination of this programme, Mozart's works alone were performed by the orchestra, the occasion being commemorative of the birth of that composer, which occurred on the 27th of January, 1756. This feature of celebrating the fame of a certain composer by giving an evening to his works was inaugurated a few weeks ago, when Beethoven was thus remembered. Such a custom is interesting and important, although not appealing strongly to the popular taste, since it results in giving a sameness of quality to an evening's entertainment, which the introduction of the works of other musicians would relieve and lighten. Still, the success which has attended the experiment as made by Mr. Henschel is very encouraging. The work of the orchestra on Saturday evening was unusually good. The funeral music was given with an excellent knowledge of light and shade, and was very impressive and sonorous throughout. The symphony is less interesting than many others by the same masters, but it was well performed, although with a lack of spirit in parts which many listeners might have thought excusable. The serenade for four small orchestras was light and pleasing, the first number being especially sweet in its answering phrases and its melodies carried on and echoed back by one body of players and another. The orchestra accompanied Prof. Baermann in the Beethoven concerto, and showed therein the least satisfactory feature of its work for the evening, falling at times to keep in time with the pianist, and often delaying or anticipating the measure in the interjected phrases with which the composition abounds. The orchestral opening of the first measure, however, was played with fine effect.

The chief feature of the evening was the piano playing of Professor Carl Baermann, whose great success at a recent concert of the Philharmonic Society will be remembered. His selections for Saturday evening did not afford so good an opportunity for the full display of his powers as those of the former occasion, but in their performance the musician stood no less revealed. His playing of the concerto was wonderfully pure, intellectual and confident, rich in expression and faultless in execution. This selection, the intricate and difficult composition of Liszt, and the poetic numbers of Rheinberger, displayed his excellences in a large and comprehensive way, and gave opportunity for all his powers. He is certainly the greatest master of the piano who has been seen in this city for many years, and one of whom we must hope to hear more before he leaves us. The sincerity and straightforwardness of his work are not the least charming of its qualities. With a technique as perfect as it is possible to imagine he never consciously makes a display of it, but causes his hearers to forget it in the spirit of the composition which he interprets. The sureness and delicacy of his touch have not been better shown than in the Rheinberger ballad, which he gave with a beauty like that of a singing voice and a tone that is rarely drawn from a piano. His reception was enthusiastic, and at the close of each of his performances he was repeatedly recalled.

AMUSEMENTS.

The Fourteenth Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The 14th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Prof. Carl Baermann being the soloist. The programme was as follows:

Masonic funeral music.....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte.....Beethoven
in E flat. No. 5, op. 73.
Nocturno-serenade in D, for four small orchestras.....Mozart
Piano solos.
a. Fantasy in C minor. (Dedicated to his wife.).....Mozart
b. Ballad.....Rheinberger
c. Venezia e Napoli. (Gondoliera and Tarantella).....Liszt
Symphony in D (Koechel No. 504).....Mozart

The chief interest in the evening's programme was shown in the numbers contributed by Prof. Baermann, who was welcomed upon his entrance as few artists have been in Boston in the past, and who fairly carried his audience by storm by his masterly efforts. His success at the Philharmonic Society's concert a few weeks ago was more than equalled on this occasion, and his playing fully justified the enthusiasm of the audience, whose applause recalled him again and again after each of his numbers. The distinct individuality of the player was shown plainly in the concerto, the reading of which gave every musical thought of the composer with a clearness and beauty which can hardly be described. In the adagio the orchestra somewhat overshadowed the player, and in a few instances was not quite with him, so that this part of the work lacked something of the almost absolute perfection which characterized the presentation of the other movements. As regards the solo numbers contributed by Prof. Baermann, there is little that can be added to what has already been said about his playing. No player since Rubenstein has approached his abilities, and there is so much of the genuine musician's nature shown in his every effort that a double pleasure is afforded the listener. The marvellous beauty of the interpretation of the Rheinberger "Ballad" was particularly notable, the singing tone given out by the instrument, under the player's touch, rivalling in beauty even the delicate grace of a Joseffy. Prof. Baermann's triumph is especially pleasing because of the utter lack of any clap-trap in his introduction to the public, as well as for the reason that he appears as an artist rather than as an advertising agent for a piano firm. The idea of commemorating the anniversary of the birth of a composer is all very well in theory, but a programme so exclusively of any one of the great musicians' works as that selected for last evening, is hardly as enjoyable as though the usual variety had been chosen. The serenade for four orchestras was rather a pleasing novelty, especially in the first movement, where the apparent idea of having each theme echoed by the three assisting bands was quite happily carried out. The symphony was admirably played, on the whole, but the departure made from Mr. Henschel's original plan of giving a bright ending to the programme, made the work less enjoyable than though it had been played earlier in the evening. There were hardly a dozen vacant seats in the hall, notwithstanding the storm, and the fact is worthy of record that nearly 3000 persons paid their admission to hear this programme rehearsed on Friday afternoon.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The fourteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. A very large audience was present, notwithstanding the unfavorable state of the weather. The programme was chiefly commemorative of the anniversary of Mozart's birthday, and was, in the main, devoted to that master's works. The concert opened with the fine Masonic Funeral Music, as broad and impressive a piece of writing as is to be found in the long catalogue of Mozart's compositions. It was exceedingly well played, and with a deep feeling for its appropriate color and expressiveness. A quaint Notturmo—Serenade in D, for four small orchestras, was given for the first time here. It is in three movements, and has as much the air of a musical joke as of anything else. One orchestra leads off in each movement with a slight theme, which is taken up by the second orchestra with less force, and a fragment seized on by the third orchestra piano, ending with a few concluding bars repeated by the fourth orchestra pianissimo. This is done over and over again, until it becomes almost wearisome. The harmonies are very simple, rarely departing from the tonic and dominant. It is only in a portion of the concluding minuet that there is any attempt at serious work, and here the four orchestras have something better to do. It was impossible not to smile at the puerility of the opening movement, and the constant reappearance of the fourth orchestra and its pianissimo echo of the end of the preceding strain at last tired with its monotony; but on the whole the work pleased greatly and was warmly applauded. It was excellently performed. The concert ended with Mozart's Symphony in D (Koechel 504), which was hurried somewhat throughout; but taken altogether received tolerably fair treatment.

The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann, who made his second appearance in Boston on this occasion. His playing excited a furore that has never been exceeded in Music Hall. He was applauded with the wildest enthusiasm, and recalled again and again in the midst of an excited and a demonstrative admiration that we have but rarely seen equalled. If the remotest doubt existed regarding the justice of the unstinted and unqualified laudation which was showered upon him after his performance at a recent concert of the Boston Philharmonic Society, it was completely dispelled by his achievements on this occasion. There can be no question that on the whole he is the finest pianist who has ever appeared here. He combines all of the merits of the greatest who have preceded him, and he has, moreover, qualities which are peculiarly his own. His technique is marvellously perfect, and, added to this, he has deep poetic feeling of the highest order, exquisitely refined taste, breadth and largeness of style, tremendous power, and at the same time the most airy delicacy. His touch is wonderfully beautiful, and the finish, the elegance and the completeness that characterize his work, not only in every essential but in the most minute details, are unexampled within our experience. His first contribution to the concert was Beethoven's piano concerto in E-flat, "The Emperor." His interpretation of this the grandest of piano concertos was noble in the widest and highest sense of the word. Von Bulow's performance may have equalled it in point of correctness, but it certainly fell behind it in warmth, in expressiveness, and in varied beauty of sentiment. Rubinstein's interpretation may have equalled it in largeness, in passion and dramatic feeling, but it was not as perfect as a whole in respect to correctness and depth of expression. It is possible to exhaust all the resources of praise upon Mr. Baermann's reading and rendering of this concerto without in anywise exaggerating their merits. They were perfect beyond all qualification. One of the great charms of his playing is the modesty and unobtrusiveness that accompany it. The listener is never disturbed by having the artist's individuality thrust upon him. In fact, the performer is so absorbed in his work that the audience sympathetically follow him in this respect and become interested only in the music. There is not a trace of the mere virtuoso in Mr. Baermann. He never tries to astonish for the purpose of creating an effect. On the contrary he manifests an affectionate, almost a religious devotion to the master he is interpreting for the time being. It would be idle to attempt to describe the amazing clearness, distinctness, and equality of his playing in the most rapid as well as in the most pianissimo passages; or to describe his trill, with its astounding crescendo and decrescendo; the extraordinarily varied resources of his touch; or the grace and elegance of his perfect phrasing. All were manifested at their highest in this performance. Mr. Baermann is not only a great player, but a great interpreter. Nothing could have been finer than the broad majesty of style, and, above all, the artistic fidelity to the spirit, color and meaning of the work that distinguished his reading of it from beginning to end. The adagio was a lovely bit of expression, mainly in sentiment, and, though delicate to the finest point in its delivery, without a trace of affectation. The effect of the whole upon the audience was electrical. At the conclusion it broke into a spontaneous storm of applause; and this was the more flattering to the artist and creditable to the public as in the one instance it had been modestly earned and in the other that it rewarded the interpretation. Later in the evening Mr. Baermann performed Mozart's Fantasia in C-minor, a ballad by Rheinberger, and Venezia e Napoli (a canzonetta, Gondollera and Tarantella) by Liszt. The first was rendered with beautiful chastity and simplicity. The second, a dainty and thoughtful little work of much difficulty, was played with rare brilliancy, and the second theme with charming expressiveness. The difficulties of the Liszt selection showed the abundant and fluent technique of the player in almost every phase. Here, too, he was recalled again and again. Everybody was delighted, and everybody was warm in praise and admiration of the artist, and for once everybody was right. His success was without a flaw and without qualification, and he may rest assured that he will always have a large and a cordially appreciative hearing here. We must not forget to add that the concert was admirably conducted by Mr. Henschel. At the next concert, Gade's overture, "In the Highlands," Hensel's Concerto for piano, and Beethoven's Symphony No. 7 will be performed. The soloists are to be Miss Fanny Kellogg and Mr. J. A. Preston.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

We greatly regret that the pressure on our columns precludes a detailed analysis of last night's concert. It was largely made up of Mozart's works, and was one of the most successful of the series. Much of the success was due to the piano playing of Professor Baermann, who achieved an absolute triumph both in Beethoven's Fifth concerto, and in solo works by Mozart, Liszt and Rheinberger. The concerto was wonderfully well played in its first two movements, and the Liszt Tarantelle was of the highest standard of execution. Of the orchestral works, the most interesting was the Serenade for four small orchestras, in which the different hands are treated by the composer somewhat like a four-banked organ, and imitations from ff to pp abound. The next concert contains the seventh Beethoven Symphony, Hensel's F minor concerto, German lieder and operatic arias, with Miss Fannie Kellogg and Mr. J. A. Preston as the soloists.

—Mr. Baerman played at the Boston Symphony Orchestra rehearsal on Friday afternoon to an audience of 2800 persons, of whom 2200 were ladies.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mozart's birthday falling on Jan. 27, the fourteenth symphony concert, given last Saturday evening, Jan. 28, presented four of the great master's works. The "Masonic Funeral Music," which has not often been played here before, stood first on the list. This beautiful work, written in Mozart's very largest and most serious style, is one of those compositions which show how well prepared the composer was to take part in the new musical movement started some years later by Beethoven in his "Eroica" symphony, had not death taken him away too soon. It was excellently played, smoothly, earnestly and strongly; only now and then did one feel that the element of grace, which is so constant a characteristic of Mozart's music, might have been somewhat more italicized (the term is not infelicitous, considering how Italian in character much of Mozart's graceful melody is). The "Notturmo-Serenade" for four small orchestras, in which every phrase, given out strongly by the first orchestra, is repeated diminuendo, e sempre diminuendo by the others in turn, was a novelty in every sense of the term. It seemed a delightful work, of light character, half poetic and half humorous, but all graceful and beautiful. The D major symphony (the one "without minuet") closed the concert. Never before have we heard Mr. Henschel's orchestra play so finely as in this symphony. To begin with, the tempi and the whole conception of the work struck us as exceptionally sympathetic. Then the execution was beautifully clear, delicate and finished; the quality of tone of both strings and wind exceedingly smooth and sweet. For once all Mozart's airy grace was feelingly caught by the orchestra. Let it be remembered, too, that to play a Mozart symphony thoroughly well is to do a thing which is perhaps as difficult as any task that can be set an orchestra. And now for Mr. Baermann's triumph, for a triumph it surely was! The unusual warmth with which he was received by the audience must be attributed to the memory, still fresh in almost every one's mind, of his achievements in the Beethoven G major concerto at a recent Philharmonic concert, and of his superb playing at Friday afternoon's rehearsal. It was more than a passing compliment; it was a spontaneous expression of glorious and well-founded anticipations. Mr. Baermann's playing of Beethoven's great E-flat concerto can only be characterized as magnificent. It was one of those performances which makes criticism out of place; it is a worthy theme for study and analysis. Mr. Baermann's playing of the first movement was, we must admit, so astonishing in several ways, so new, in a word, that we may well be pardoned for not being quite able to fall in with his conception of the music at first. When the movement was over, our first feeling was an imperative wish that he would play it right over again, to give us a chance thoroughly to enjoy it. As it was, our enjoyment only began the next morning as we rehearsed his performance over in our memory. It is dangerous to look behind the scenes in such a case, and try to determine what the secret springs are which move a player to take a great composition in this way or that. At best, one can only analyze the impression the performance has made upon one's self, and give the result for what it is worth. To us it seems as if Mr. Baermann played so much from instinct, that it is hard to imagine his convictions concerning the true character of the music to be the result of careful, purely objective study (as was the case with Von Bülow), so much as of an imperative, personal feeling. In so far as he stands as an interpreter, he seems to show the audience how the music affects his individual, emotional nature, rather than what conclusions he has arrived at by a mixed intellectual and emotional process. What removes his playing from the so-called "subjective" playing of other pianists we have heard, is that, in impressing his own individuality upon the music, he does not do so with any apparent premeditation, but wholly spontaneously and because he cannot help it. His generally very fast tempo in the first movement of the concerto seemed at first so strange that we felt ill at ease in listening to it; yet, on reconsidering the performance, we cannot but feel the power and beauty of his rendering. It was overwhelmingly grand, if it was not quite convincing. So grand, in fact, that, although we should not like to hear any one else play it so fast, or perhaps with such marked variations in tempo, we cannot but feel that we should be very sorry to hear him play a single note otherwise than he did on Saturday evening. In the second movement, and especially in the final rondo, he fairly carried us away. A more positively superb rendering of the rondo we cannot remember. In the solo pieces he played, Mozart's C minor Rondo, a Ballad by Rheinberger, and Liszt's "Venezia e Napoli,"—Mr. Baermann was simply superb. Such playing is as rare as it is admirable. The enthusiasm of the audience was unbounded, and every one felt that surely here was a player of genius.

At the next concert the programme will be—

Scottish Overture, "In the Highlands,".....Gade.
Recitative and Air, "Don Giovanni".....Mozart.
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, Op. 16.....Hensel.
Songs with Piano.
a. "The Dew it Shines" (Op. 72, No. 1).....Rubinstein.
b. "The Sunny Beam" (Op. 29, No. 5).....Henschel.
Symphony in A. No. 7, Op. 92.....Beethoven.
Miss Fanny Kellogg and Mr. John A. Preston will be the soloists.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA—FOURTEENTH CONCERT.

The symphony concert of Saturday evening being intended to be in some sense a commemoration of Mozart, its date being almost coincident with that of his birth, the opening number of the programme was (according to a certain originality of choice) nothing less than funeral, as though in celebration of his death. His own "Masonic Funeral Music" was the particular selection, and was given in its entirety; although, considering its gravity, and that it might, from its place in the concert somewhat, influence the general feeling of the audience, it might reasonably have been abbreviated. It was nobly played, however, with such a sense of its purport that the more sensitive listeners must have felt subdued and almost saddened by it. But the general temper of these Saturday night audiences is sweetly favorable to everything, and so the solemn strains were followed with the usual round of cheerful applause.

But it was not the regular and—if we may permit ourselves to use so uncompromising an epithet—undiscriminating applause which followed the next number. On the contrary, it was that whole-souled tribute which a great audience of really fine composition pays when its admiration and its sympathy have been conquered suddenly and splendidly, and when, instead of merely approving what it supports as a favorite cult of its own, it bursts into spontaneous plaudits no less honorable to itself than to the art or the artist that evoked them. Professor Carl Baermann, introduced to Boston a few weeks ago by the Philharmonic Society, and who had been heard at the rehearsal of Friday afternoon by an audience of almost three thousand people, had just finished Beethoven's E flat concerto for piano-forte, and the Music hall fairly resounded with a recall which was again and again repeated, and to which the burly, genial-mannered pianist responded with a simple pleasure in the delight he had given, rare enough to witness in these days of affectation and study for effect. We have no fear of being charged with exaggeration when we assert that no pianist superior to Professor Baermann—probably none his equal—has ever been heard in this country. There is no quality which one expects in the truly great artist which he does not possess, and none which he displays in excess. His power makes grandeur mighty, but it never deals a blow as with the hammer of Thor, shattering as well as enforcing; his delicacy and finesse are airiness itself, but the thread of sound is never a floating, inconsistent film; his intelligence is keen and exact, but never argumentative or dictatorial; his feeling is tender and touching, but never melodramatic or sentimental; his technique, which we rank last among his characteristics, is astounding for its celerity, its grasp, and its absolute lucidity, but it never is anything but the means to an end, and—an almost unique experience in pianism—the greater is his necessary use of this means, the more exalted in our estimation becomes the purpose for which such strength, such dexterity are exerted. Not graceful at the instrument, and often bending strangely low over the keyboard, or again raising high his head, with an upturned look, while his fingers fly with a level motion that misleads the inexperienced into thinking that they are tripping through facile phrases,—the one chief impression that Professor Baermann must make, as musician and as man, is that of high sincerity. While he could not play as he does were he less positively individual, it is his playing always, and never himself, that we feel. Hence his performance of this "Emperor" concerto was oftentimes like a revelation. He was playing not merely what his part set down for him, but he was playing according to the meaning of the whole score, and the work became at once a complete symmetrical unity, not the more or less happy congruity of dialogue which such compositions oftenest appear to be. Occasional isolated chords appeared no longer as irrelevant interjections, but gave the impulse to an orchestral fight, or set the seal of certainty upon an orchestral assertion. The swift-darting octaves of the allegri and the long arpeggi of the adagio, ceased to be as it were studies from an exercise-book; one saw at once that they belonged in the places they occupied, and each figure among them was so enlightened and expressed, that its own light and form gave new brightness and meaning to the orchestral passages with which it was coincident. The whole concerto was one continuous illustration of what a master mind can accomplish when with rare fortune it is untrammelled by weakness or imperfection of expressive means. Not less remarkable in their several ways, but less interesting to ourselves for the reasons we have just hinted at, were the selections played by Professor Baermann later in the evening. These were that sweet and almost pathetic fantasy in C minor, dedicated by Mozart to his wife; a ballad, with two strongly contrasted themes, respectively of cavaleresque brilliancy and of courtly sentiment, by Rheinberger; and that group of little fantasies on Italian themes which its author, Liszt, calls "Venezia e Napoli." There was the same close and convincing adherence to truth in the portrayal of the various moods therein represented, as in the concerto, and we again found occasion to admire that insight and art which enabled the artist to give to the Liszt music all its peculiar effectiveness of mechanical arrangement, without ever failing to make plain the themes which most performers of that strange author are so sure to lose in mastering the difficulties of the language in which he has concealed or at least involved his subjects.

This programme presented one novelty,—more exactly, perhaps a curiosity,—being a nocturne-serenade by Mozart, for four small orchestras. The first band was based upon a composition of six violins and three double-basses, and each subsequent band was smaller, until the last was but an echo-like diminutive of the first. The themes, which were of extreme tenacity and harmonized with the most ingenuous faith in the beauty of simple chords, were passed on from orchestra to orchestra in an arithmetically progressive diminuendo, until they almost died upon the ear. The effect was entertaining enough for a little while, and pleasantly puzzled as to whether the conceit were serious or a whim; but a single movement would have been an ample taste of the quality. If Mr. Henschel had given only the minuetto, which has the most decided character of all the three movements, he would have illustrated the subject sufficiently, and would not have moved us to intimate that perhaps the andante and the allegretto grazioso might have had a better effect and done fairer justice to their writer if they had not been played in almost precisely the same time.

The symphony of the evening, which was Mozart's in D, had an unusual and infelicitous place on the programme, being the last number of all. The concert was an unprecedentedly long one, and the symphony was not begun until half-past nine o'clock. Many circumstances, therefore, militated against a thoroughly satisfactory performance; the audience had been all excited by the great event of the evening, and were all more or less weary from the extreme attention and enthusiasm they had given and experienced, while many were necessarily making their way across the hall in order to catch their trains. It was not to be wondered at, then, that the musicians should share in the quite general feeling of satiety and desire to be gone; and we can almost forgive the conductor for hustling his opening allegro into a more swift and unelastic presto than is even his wont. Especially as the short following andante was read commendably well, with good discretion and reserve, while the final presto, though dashing and eager to the last justifiable degree, did not overpass the limit, and so finished vigorously, and yet decorously, the memorable evening. Our notice, however, would be incomplete if we did not pause to chronicle the generally fine playing of the orchestra in the concerto, which Mr. Henschel conducted with evident and earnest care, and with equally apparent success.

The next concert will be none too light, we fear, and the symphony (Beethoven's seventh) must again suffer, in hearing if not in playing, by coming after everything else. Gade's Scotch overture, "In the Highlands," will be the first number, followed by the Donna Anna air from "Don Giovanni," sung by Miss Kellogg, who will also contribute to the second part two songs by Rubinstein and Henschel. The first part will include Henschel's piano-forte concerto in F minor, the solo part in which has been assigned to Mr. John A. Preston.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 4TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

SYMPHONY in A. No. 7, Op. 92. BEETHOVEN.

Poco sostenuto; Vivace.—Allegretto.—

Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.—Allegro con brlo.—

RECITATIVE and AIR. (Don Giovanni.) MOZART.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE, in F Minor, Op. 16 . HENSELT.

Allegro patetico; Religioso; Tempo primo.—

Larghetto.—Allegro agitato.—

SONGS WITH PIANO.

a. "THE DEW IT SHINES" (Op. 72, No. 1.) . RUBINSTEIN.

b. "THE SUNNY BEAM" (Op. 29, No. 5.) . HENSCHEL.

SCOTTISH OVERTURE "In the Highlands." GADE.

SOLOISTS:

MISS FANNY KELLOGG,

MR. JOHN A. PRESTON.

MR. PRESTON will use a CHICKERING PIANO.

RECITATIVE AND AIR. (Don Giovanni.) MOZART.

RECIT: Crudele? Ah nò, mio bene! Troppo mi spiace, Allontanarti ben che lungamente la nostr' alma desia. Mai il mondo . . . oh Dio! Non sedur la mia costanza nel sensibil mio core! Abbastanza per te mi parla amore!

LARGHETTO: Non mi dir, bel idol mio,
Che son io crudel con te;
Tu ben sai quant' io t'amai,
Tu conosci la mia fè.

ALLEGRETTO: Calma, calma il tuo tormento,
Se di duol non vuoi ch'io mora!
Forse un giorno il cielo ancora
Sentirà pietà di me!

Two Songs with Piano.

a. THE DEW IT SHINES. RUBINSTEIN.

The dew it shines on the long grass at night,
The moon sheds o'er all things her solemn light,
The nightingale singeth out yonder:
There floats o'er the fields in the twilight air
The breath of spring with odors so rare,
Sweet night for lovers to wander.
How fair, so fair is the sweet spring tide!
When 'mid blooming delights, close side by side
Two lovers together are wending,
With the first sweet kiss, while the stars they gleam,
They quite believe in the old foolish dream
That their love hath never an ending.

b. "THE SUNNY BEAM." HENSCHEL.

The sunny beam of flow'ry May,
It sends into my heart a ray
That fills it o'er with pleasure,
And on the mead so fresh and green
I run and dance a measure.

Thereat doth laugh my lovely maid,
Who walks demure with dainty tread;
Oh, would I now were near her!
It is the greatest joy I know
Within my heart to bear her.

Through leafy woods I late did ride,
Sweet carolling birds therein did bide,
Its own song each upraises.
Sing on, sing loud, ye pretty birds,
Sing all my true love's praises.

(Old German Poem, translated by Mrs. Macfarren.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There was an unusually small audience present at the symphony concert of Saturday night, but (as the regulation phrase has it) "they made up in enthusiasm what they lacked in numbers," and showered the rain of their applause on the just and on the unjust with a noble impartiality worthy of the entire usual company. So far as the symphony—Beethoven's seventh, in A—is concerned, this commendation was generally merited. Mr. Henschel had wisely reconsidered his proposition to place the symphony at the end of the programme, and had transferred it to the first place, putting at the end Gade's bright but not particularly Scotch overture, "In the Highlands." Players and listeners took it up with complete freshness, and the conductor seemed to concentrate himself more seriously than usual upon the work itself, as if with the intention of giving first importance to the equability and steadiness of his reading. The orchestra seconded him, as they now are wont to do, with technical obedience, and only now and then gave an old habitual accentuation in place of some variation indicated by him. The first movement opened smoothly with its poco sostenuto, and was well upheld, the change to vivace was not felicitously done, a good many bars elapsing before the new tempo had fairly asserted itself; but from there to the end the time was held steadily, and, excepting some cloudiness in the responses near the finale, was very creditably performed. The second movement, allegretto, began in nice taste, with refinement of tone and phrasing; the long development of the subject, from its introduction in the middle voices, on through the first violins to the ensemble, was excellently worked out, without haste and without roughness, and the slight falling off in the rate toward the close may pass without much criticism, since the general character of the movement was just and pleasant. The third movement, with its presto and assai meno presto, was also well read; but the fourth movement, allegro con brio, was less satisfactory. The band got through all that was set down for them in safety, as we now expect them to do, although they were pretty hardly driven at times; but the tone was not often lightsome and cheery, and the drums and all the brass except the horns were much too prominent in many places. This, with the uniformity of color derived from the constant and unshaded fortissimo of the latter part, produced rather the effect of a battle piece than anything else. But, reviewing the symphony as a whole, we should pronounce it the conductor's best attempt hitherto in Beethoven's music. If one doesn't go into the water he surely cannot learn to swim; and yet, in going into the water, even to learn to swim, he may be drowned. So, if a young pianist does not try his skill upon the greater orchestral works, he will never master them, while, if he undertakes them, he runs great risk of insuccess. Unfortunately there is no school for such experience here, except the concert-room; hence it behooves both public and critic to be cautious and chary in comment, lest they overpraise the player for his attempt, or overblame him for his lack of full accomplishment. Mr. John A. Preston had a trying task in the number of the programme assigned him, which was no less than Henselt's great and difficult concerto in F minor, opus 16—more difficult, perhaps, in the spiritual interpretation which it needs, having the religioso, the patetico and the agitato all indicated within it, than the merely technical problems which it presents for resolution. And another test had to be encountered by Mr. Preston, because he followed, with only a week's interval, the performance (unexpected when he was engaged) of Professor Baermann, who must long stand first of an exponent of what a piano-forte concerto really is. We wish we could say that this performance went well and smoothly as a whole, but it did not; for although there were many passages of admirable phrasing and tone, there were also others in which there were horrible discrepancies between soloist and orchestra, and when nobody from the conductor down seemed to know what the reading ought to be, or how to get at it; the tuning of the band even was not exact, and in the last allegro the heavier brass was often blatantly bad. The broad and almost grandiose instrumental opening was good, however, in quality and in shape, and it is a pity that of the orchestra could not maintain that standard throughout. Mr. Preston played with an honesty and earnestness that promise for him by and by, when his artistic youth shall have ripened and his experience extended, such a result in the field of professional labor as shall quite satisfy himself and others. Most of those effects of expression and feeling which he did not attain are yet intrinsically beyond him, and beyond any youth but that of genius. The original introductions of the themes, and even their subsequent varied forms, found adequate representation at his hands; they were read out with good understanding, and with a touch clear, well-balanced, firm and yet yielding. But when the piano-forte part was interlaced with the orchestral, now following a figure of the latter with shapely and swift arpeggi now returning a brief answer, and now marking by some note almost lost in its setting a change in thought or in trait of character,—the pianist could not do all that the author meant should be done, and his playing became—what the playing of such music so often becomes—an independent and irrelevant performance, which makes the hearer debate at which he should wonder most, the skill of the writer who managed to contrive the combination, or that of the player who succeeds in executing so laborious a part of it. But Mr. Preston has no reason to regret this evening; for if he did not accomplish all that he and we might wish,—less, we are disposed to think than he might have done with more rehearsal and a nearer union in the band,—he has yet done enough to show of what stuff he is made, and to give hopeful trust in him as one of the strongest and most faithful of our younger men. And certainly both his reception and his recall had an element of personal favor in them which was complimentary and encouraging.

The concert was strengthened further by the singing of Miss Fanny Kellogg. Her first selection was that scene from the latter part of "Don Juan" in which Donna Anna puts aside, firmly yet regretfully, the suit of Don Ottavio, until the murder of her father shall have been avenged. This beautiful scene is not well suited to Miss Kellogg, although she sang its every note purely and brightly. There are shades of tender feeling in it that require not only a singer, but a dramatic artist to give them their meaning. The very first line, with its one word "Cruel!" caught reprovingly from Ottavio, and followed instantly by the phrase "Ah no, my darling!" together with the gently reasoning largo which succeeds, leading still again into the pleadings of the andante, are instinct with love and pathos, while the allegretto which ends the scene is quick with the hope of a happier, though perhaps far distant, future. To sing the first part with placid ease, and the latter with cheerful grace, is indeed to vocalize charmingly, but it is not giving any notion of Donna Anna as Mozart has here presented her. Miss Kellogg made some few slips in her Italian, which made the oddest nonsense of several important lines, and struck us all the more because her enunciation is so remarkably neat and distinct. But if she was not at her best in Donna Anna's love passages, Miss Kellogg was unexceptionable in the two songs by Rubinstein and Henschel, which she sang later; these had a fine intelligence and a nicety of style which made many beside ourselves regret that she had not as many more to sing. The first was peaceful and soft, "The Dew it Shines," the high ending of which, full of difficult words, was a bit of perfect musical and verbal delivery; the second was an old German madrigal, set to a thoroughly original and free conceit. Handsome in melody and harmony, full of joy and brightness; both were perfectly sung, as we have said, and charmingly accompanied by Mr. Henschel.

Among the new men who from time to time appear in the orchestra, we noticed with pleasure Mr. Liebe, the violoncellist; but we noticed with regret the absence of Mr. Wulf Fries. There are rumors of a disagreement which has led to this gentleman's withdrawal; of these we neither know nor care; but we do know that Mr. Fries was a representative and respected musician in our city when Mr. Henschel was but a child, and we simply query whether it would not be both graceful and good for the younger man and the stranger to waive punctilio, to make some concession, and to gratify the public—for whom, rather than for ourselves, we speak—by recalling Mr. Fries to a place which he is certainly competent to occupy.

The symphony for the next concert will be Schubert's unfinished B minor one, and the other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," the ballet music from the "Sylvia" of Delibes, and extracts from Wagner's "Mastersingers." The soloist will be Miss Mary H. How, whom not to know, perhaps, argues ourselves unknown, but of whom at this writing we can say only that she is to sing Berlioz's reverie for contralto, "The Captive," and a rhapsody for the same voice, with male choir and orchestra, written by Brahms, and now to be given here for the first time.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert last night presented points good, bad and indifferent. Among the former may be classed the first three movements of the Beethoven seventh symphony. The introduction was well shaded and the allegretto was admirably executed; the strings, (upon whom the chief work of the movement rests,) worked together with perfect precision and the horns did finely in the trio. Why after giving such an excellent reading, Mr. Henschel should have chosen to take the last movement so fast that only the accented notes of the string figures could be heard, must remain a mystery. It was certainly a scramble and the motto of the movement as given might well have been saute qui peut, or freely translated "the devil take the hindmost." Miss Fanny Kellogg in a Mozart aria, sang very acceptably, and seems to have discarded the explosive style which formerly marked her work. Her singing of Rubinstein's Es Blinkt der Thau (in a rather poor English translation) was marked by intelligence and true feeling. Her last success was, however, made in the light, playful vein of which she has long been an excellent exponent. The song The Sunny Beam, by Mr. Henschel, is quite in the old English vein which began with Purcell and seems to have died with Bishop. It is naive and simple in construction, quaint and sudden in modulation, and was sung by Miss Kellogg with all the beauty possible. Only in the upper notes of her songs, the tones at times seemed hard and thin. As to the Henschel concerto, as performed by Mr. Preston, we cannot speak in praise. Mr. Preston has done good work in Boston concerts before, but in attempting a work of this magnitude and difficulty he seems to have been over ambitious. The work has been given by the greatest of artists, both here and in New York, and is at present Joseffy's cheval de bataille, and comparisons must inevitably be drawn. The delicacy of the work was not brought out, and, although the last movement contained some good octave work and careful phrasing, its end degenerated into a vague and blurred stretto. The whole was (with this exception) correct, but lacked in color. The concert ended with Gade's Scottish Overture, which was of characteristic beauty. The next concert will be one of the most interesting of the whole series thus far, as it presents the following varied and broadly catholic programme: Overture (Coriolanus), Beethoven; Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra (first time), Brahms; Symphony in B-minor (unfinished), Schubert; Ballet Music (Sylvia), Delibes; La Captive, Reverie for Contralto, Berlioz; Introduction to the Third Act, dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs, from The Master Singers of Nuremberg, Wagner; with Miss Mary H. How (contralto) as soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The fifteenth orchestra concert of the Boston Symphony Series was given on Saturday evening, at Music Hall, to an audience of fair size, whose enthusiasm over-balanced the raging storm and deepening drifts. Beethoven's seventh symphony—a composition almost unrivalled in classic music—was the opening number. The first three movements of this selection, notwithstanding some minor defects, were finely rendered; but in the last the tempo was hurried till its notes were so crowded together as to lose all significance. The soloists of the evening were Mr. John A. Preston and Miss Fanny Kellogg. Mr. Preston interpreted Henschel's concerto in F minor, opus 16,—a number including the religioso, the patetico and the agitato that are touched in it and which presents, thereby, a difficult problem. Mr. Preston's rendering, while falling below many of the artistic requirements, was yet one of marked excellence in some respects. Miss Kellogg gave a recitative and air from "Don Giovanni" with dramatic expression and good tone. The few slips of her Italian made nonsense only revealed to the initiated, and while Miss Kellogg did not entirely identify herself with the true spirit of the impersonation, she gave her notes with a clearness and precision that was at times brilliant in expression. Not at her best as Donna Anna, she rendered the two songs from Rubinstein and Henschel with marked intelligence and an exquisite finish of style. The first was titled "The Dew it Shines," and the second—an old German Madrigal—is called "The Sunny Beam." The overture, which was the last number on the programme, was charmingly rendered. Miss Mary How will be the soloist at the next concert, whose programme will be: Overture ("Coriolanus"), Beethoven; rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra (first time), Brahms; symphony in B minor (unfinished), Schubert; ballet music (Sylvia), Delibes; La Captive, reverie for contralto, Berlioz; introduction to the third act, dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner.

On dit, that Mr. Wulf Fries was absent from his usual place in the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening last, and that he has resigned his position as a member of the orchestra. It is generally believed that he has been unjustly treated by the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that his resignation is the outcome of the treatment he has received. At all events his place will be a very difficult one to fill. In his skill as a performer on the violoncello Mr. Fries has not a peer in this vicinity, and his personal qualities are such that he has a host of friends who are fond of referring to him as above reproach or criticism in every respect.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 15th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Symphony in A, No. 7, Op. 92.....Beethoven.
Recitative and air ("Don Giovanni").....Mozart.
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, Op. 16..Henschel.
Songs with piano:

a. "The Dew, it Shines," (Op. 72, No. 1). Rubinstein.
b. "The Sunny Beam," (Op. 29, No. 5).....Henschel.
Scottish overture, "In the Highlands,".....Gade.

The rearrangement of the programme from the original announcement resulted most favorably, as the placing of the overture at the last left a pleasing impression of the evening's work, this being, upon the whole, the most satisfactory effort of the entire programme. In the symphony, the work of the orchestra was uniformly good in the first three movements, but in the finale the musicians, either from fatigue, lack of sufficient rehearsal or some other cause, became somewhat demoralized, and the playing of this movement was rough and lacking in expression and clearness, though it was given with a certain dash and vigor which appeared highly pleasing to the audience. Miss Fanny Kellogg was the vocalist of the evening, and her success in pleasing the audience was all that the lady could desire. The "Don Giovanni" recitative "Crudele! ah no!" and aria, "Non mi dir, bel idol mio," appeared to tax the abilities of the singer severely. The largo movement of the aria was sung with good expression, but the recitative was badly phrased and was marred by false intonations, while, in the allegretto movement of the aria, the execution was almost amateurish. The Rubinstein song was rendered in an artistic fashion, but the singer was hardly as successful in the bright little vocal gem composed by Mr. Henschel, who kindly played the accompaniments to these numbers. Mr. John A. Preston was the pianist, and his rendering of the pianoforte score in the concerto had many excellent points. He plays with rare expression, and the composer's ideas were clearly and intelligently presented. Mr. Preston, however, lacks something in the clearness of his touch, and his shading is not always as delicate as is desirable, but possibly these defects in his playing would have appeared less prominent, had it not been that Herr Bearman's brilliant success was still in the minds of his audience. His rendering of the "Allegro Agitato" was the best evidence of his ability, and the audience gave him a very marked expression of its recognition of his merits, recalling him after the concerto by a hearty round of applause. The furious driving snow storm caused the first lack of a large attendance during the entire series, large numbers of season subscribers absenting themselves for the first time.

The concert was strengthened further by the singing of Miss Fanny Kellogg. Her first selection was that scene from the latter part of "Don Juan" in which Donna Anna puts aside, firmly yet regretfully, the suit of Don Ottavio, until the murder of her father shall have been avenged. This beautiful scene is not well suited to Miss Kellogg, although she sang its every note purely and brightly. There are shades of tender feeling in it that require not only a singer, but a dramatic artist to give them their meaning. The very first line, with its one word "Crudele!" caught reprovingly from Ottavio, and followed instantly by the phrase "Ah no, my darling!" together with the gently reasoning largo which succeeds, leading still again into the pleadings of the andante, are instinct with love and pathos, while the allegretto which ends the scene is quick with the hope of a happier, though perhaps far distant, future. To sing the first part with placid ease, and the latter with cheerful grace, is indeed to vocalize charmingly, but it is not giving any notion of Donna Anna as Mozart has here presented her. Miss Kellogg made some few slips in her Italian, which made the oddest nonsense of several important lines, and struck us all the more because her enunciation is so remarkably neat and distinct. But if she was not at her best in Donna Anna's love passages, Miss Kellogg was unexceptionable in the two songs by Rubinstein and Henschel, which she sang later; these had a fine intelligence and a nicety of style which made many beside ourselves regret that she had not as many more to sing. The first was peaceful and soft, "The Dew It Shines," the high ending of which, full of difficult words, was a bit of perfect musical and verbal delivery; the second was an old German madrigal, set to a thoroughly original and free conceit, Handelsque in melody and harmony, full of joy and brightness; both were perfectly sung, as we have said, and charmingly accompanied by Mr. Henschel.

Among the new men who from time to time appear in the orchestra, we noticed with pleasure Mr. Liebe, the violoncellist; but we noticed with regret the absence of Mr. Wulf Fries. There are rumors of a disagreement which has led to this gentleman's withdrawal; of these we neither know nor care; but we do know that Mr. Fries was a representative and respected musician in our city when Mr. Henschel was but a child, and we simply query whether it would not be both graceful and good for the younger man and the stranger to waive punctilio, to make some concession, and to gratify the public—for whom, rather than for ourselves, we speak—by recalling Mr. Fries to a place which he is certainly competent to occupy.

The symphony for the next concert will be Schubert's unfinished B minor one, and the other orchestral numbers will be Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," the ballet music from the "Sylvia" of Delibes, and extracts from Wagner's "Mastersingers." The soloist will be Miss Mary H. How,—whom not to know, perhaps, argues ourselves unknown, but of whom at this writing we can say only that she is to sing Berlioz's reverie for contralto, "The Captive," and a rhapsody for the same voice, with male choir and orchestra, written by Brahms, and now to be given here for the first time.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert last night presented points good, bad and indifferent. Among the former may be classed the first three movements of the Beethoven seventh symphony. The introduction was well shaded and the allegretto was admirably executed; the strings, (upon whom the chief work of the movement rests,) worked together with perfect precision and the horns did finely in the trio. Why after giving such an excellent reading, Mr. Henschel should have chosen to take the last movement so fast that only the accented notes of the string figures could be heard, must remain a mystery. It was certainly a scramble and the motto of the movement as given might well have been saute qui peut, or freely translated "the devil take the hindmost." Miss Fanny Kellogg in a Mozart aria, sang very acceptably, and seems to have discarded the explosive style which formerly marked her work. Her singing of Rubinstein's Es Blinkt der Thau (in a rather poor English translation) was marked by intelligence and true feeling. Her last success was, however, made in the light, playful vein of which she has long been an excellent exponent. The song The Sunny Beam, by Mr. Henschel, is quite in the old English vein which began with Purcell and seems to have died with Bishop. It is naive and simple in construction, quaint and sudden in modulation, and was sung by Miss Kellogg with all the beauty possible. Only in the upper notes of her songs, the tones at times seemed hard and thin. As to the Henschel concerto, as performed by Mr. Preston, we cannot speak in praise. Mr. Preston has done good work in Boston concerts before, but in attempting a work of this magnitude and difficulty he seems to have been over ambitious. The work has been given by the greatest of artists, both here and in New York, and is at present Joseffy's cheval de bataille, and comparisons must inevitably be drawn. The delicacy of the work was not brought out, and, although the last movement contained some good octave work and careful phrasing, its end degenerated into a vague and blurred stretto. The whole was (with this exception) correct, but lacked in color. The concert ended with Gade's Scottish Overture, which was of characteristic beauty. The next concert will be one of the most interesting of the whole series thus far, as it presents the following varied and broadly catholic programme: Overture (Coriolanus), Beethoven; Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra (first time), Brahms; Symphony in B-minor (unfinished), Schubert; Ballet Music (Sylvia), Delibes; La Captive, Reverie for Contralto, Berlioz; Introduction to the Third Act, dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs, from The Master Singers of Nuremberg, Wagner; with Miss Mary H. How (contralto) as soloist.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The fifteenth orchestra concert of the Boston Symphony Series was given on Saturday evening, at Music Hall, to an audience of fair size whose enthusiasm over-balanced the raging storm and deepening drifts. Beethoven's seventh symphony—a composition almost unrivalled in classic music—was the opening number. The first three movements of this selection, notwithstanding some minor defects, were finely rendered; but in the last the tempo was hurried till its notes were so crowded together as to lose all significance. The soloists of the evening were Mr. John A. Preston and Miss Fanny Kellogg. Mr. Preston interpreted Henschel's concerto in F minor, opus 16,—a number including the religioso, the pateico and the agitato that are touched in it and which presents, thereby, a difficult problem. Mr. Preston's rendering, while falling below many of the artistic requirements, was yet one of marked excellence in some respects. Miss Kellogg gave a recitative and air from "Don Giovanni" with dramatic expression and good tone. The few slips of her Italian made nonsense only revealed to the initiated, and while Miss Kellogg did not entirely identify herself with the true spirit of the impersonation, she gave her notes with a clearness and precision that was at times brilliant in expression. Not at her best as Donna Anna, she rendered the two songs from Rubinstein and Henschel with marked intelligence and an exquisite finish of style. The first was titled "The Dew It Shines," and the second—an old German Madrigal—is called "The Sunny Beam." The overture, which was the last number on the programme, was charmingly rendered. Miss Mary How will be the soloist at the next concert, whose programme will be: Overture ("Coriolanus"), Beethoven; rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra (first time), Brahms; symphony in B minor (unfinished), Schubert; ballet music (Sylvia), Delibes; La Captive, reverie for contralto, Berlioz; introduction to the third act, dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner.

On dit, that Mr. Wulf Fries was absent from his usual place in the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Saturday evening last, and that he has resigned his position as a member of the orchestra. It is generally believed that he has been unjustly treated by the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and that his resignation is the outcome of the treatment he has received. At all events his place will be a very difficult one to fill. In his skill as a performer on the violoncello Mr. Fries has not a peer in this vicinity, and his personal qualities are such that he has a host of friends who are fond of referring to him as above reproach or criticism in every respect.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Fifteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 15th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Symphony in A. No. 7, Op. 92.....Beethoven.
Recitative and air ("Don Giovanni").....Mozart.
Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, Op. 16.....Henschel.
Songs with piano:

a. "The Dew, It Shines," (Op. 72, No. 1), Rubinstein.
b. "The Sunny Beam," (Op. 29, No. 5).....Henschel.
Scottish overture, "In the Highlands,".....Gade.

The rearrangement of the programme from the original announcement resulted most favorably, as the placing of the overture at the last left a pleasing impression of the evening's work, this being, upon the whole, the most satisfactory effort of the entire programme. In the symphony, the work of the orchestra was uniformly good in the first three movements, but in the finale the musicians, either from fatigue, lack of sufficient rehearsal, or some other cause, became somewhat demoralized, and the playing of this movement was rough and lacking in expression and clearness, though it was given with a certain dash and vigor which appeared highly pleasing to the audience. Miss Fanny Kellogg was the vocalist of the evening, and her success in pleasing the audience was all that the lady could desire. The "Don Giovanni" recitative "Crudele! ah no!" and aria, "Non mi dir, bel idol mio," appeared to tax the abilities of the singer severely. The largo movement of the aria was sung with good expression, but the recitative was badly phrased and was marred by false intonations, while, in the allegretto movement of the aria, the execution was almost amateurish. The Rubinstein song was rendered in an artistic fashion, but the singer was hardly as successful in the bright little vocal gem composed by Mr. Henschel, who kindly played the accompaniments to these numbers. Mr. John A. Preston was the pianist, and his rendering of the pianoforte score in the concerto had many excellent points. He plays with rare expression, and the composer's ideas were clearly and intelligently presented. Mr. Preston, however, lacks something in the clearness of his touch, and his shading is not always as delicate as is desirable, but possibly these defects in his playing would have appeared less prominent, had it not been that Herr Bearmann's brilliant success was still in the minds of his audience. His rendering of the "Allegro Agitato" was the best evidence of his ability, and the audience gave him a very marked expression of its recognition of his merits, recalling him after the concerto by a hearty round of applause. The furious driving snow storm caused the first lack of a large attendance during the entire series, large numbers of season subscribers absented themselves for the first time.

The Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 7, of which the three first movements were excellently interpreted. In fact, Mr. Henschel gave the most satisfactory reading of his season in this connection. He fell into his old fault, however, in the finale, which was hurried at such a galloping pace that even the violin phrases did not come out clearly. The other purely orchestral selection was Gade's "In the Highlands" overture, which was excellently rendered. There were two soloists, Miss Fanny Kellogg and Mr. J. A. Preston. Miss Kellogg sang the recitative and aria "Crudele"—"Un mio dir," from "Don Giovanni," in a large and broad style, with fine dramatic expression; and two short songs, "The Dew it shines," a charming little gem by Rubinstein, and "The Sunny Beams," a bright and dainty trifle by Mr. Henschel, in both which she was heard to great advantage. Mr. Preston performed Henselt's Concerto in F minor in a painstaking manner, and with commendable correctness as far as the notes were concerned; but the interpretation, as a whole, was hard, insipid, and mechanical in conception; heavy, expressionless, and uninteresting in style, and, save in respect to the mere note-playing, inadequate. The attempt was, unfortunately, an over-ambitious one for the artist. At the next concert a Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus, and orchestra, by Brahms, will be given here for the first time, together with other important works. Miss Mary H. How is to be the soloist.

Sardie

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS.

—The fifteenth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening last. The hall was by no means full, but the small audience, who had had the courage to brave one of the most violent and drifting of snow storms, were well repaid for their attendance. The programme consisted of Symphony in A, No. 7, Beethoven; Recitative and Air from Mozart's Don Giovanni, sung by Miss Fanny Kellogg; Concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 16, Henselt,—played by Mr. John A. Preston; songs with piano, "The dew it shines," op. 72, No. 1, Rubinstein; "The sunny beam," op. 29, No. 5, Henschel; and Gade's Scottish overture, "In the Highlands." Beethoven's seventh symphony has been performed so many times in Boston by this same orchestra, that it was not surprising that it received a very finished rendering. The old mistake of misconception, and of excessively rapid tempo was only noticeable in the final allegro. That the orchestra played this movement clearly we do not deny, but that they can play clearly when making one of Beethoven's allegro movements a presto is no excuse for doing so. In the rendering of the allegretto, though it was a beautiful performance, regarded as a whole, several of the most delicate "nuances" were missed. In one passage particularly, the entry of the horns was not succeeded by the perfect crescendo and decrescendo that we have a right to expect from a faultless performance. Mr. Henschel is improving in his lead, but he should be still more conscientious in observing the marks of expression indicated in the score. At the rehearsal, if not at the concert, he is more responsible than any one else for the neglect of every sfz, every cres, and every dim. The orchestra is at his command, and he is almost as accountable for its shortcomings as though it were a single instrument upon which he played. The next event in the concert, after the symphony, was the singing by Miss Kellogg of the Mozart recitative and aria from Don Juan. It was rendered in a very creditable manner. She labored somewhat with the aria, but she delightfully exhibited an artistic understanding of the noble school of song to which it belongs. She was more fortunate in rendering the spirit and beauty of Mr. Henschel's song, and both this and the Rubinstein number were admirably given. In hearing Mr. Preston perform the Henselt concerto we were impressed with the feeling that he had made a most conscientious study of a very difficult work; but we could not discover that the performance was in any true sense of the term an artistic one. The tone he produced in the cantabile passages was weak and unmusical. His octave playing was rapid, and the notes of the work were correctly played; but he did not enter into the spirit of the music with sufficient con amore. In the religious movement there was no variety of tone coloring suggested by the performance, and his method of playing from a theoretical standpoint was faulty,—responsible perhaps for the unsatisfactory effect of his entire performance. We did not derive great enjoyment from the performance of Gade's "In the Highlands"; in fact we have often wondered why the work itself should be played so frequently in our concert rooms. It is neither a rigorous nor an impassioned work, and its themes are simply pleasing as far as they go.

At the concert this evening, Miss Mary H. How will make her debut in a rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53 (first time), by Brahms; and she will also render a reverie for contralto, by Berlioz. The programme will also include the overture to Coriolanus, by Beethoven; Schubert's symphony in B minor (unfinished); Ballet music by Delibes; and introduction to the third act of Wagner's Meistersinger. How Journal

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The fifteenth concert, on Saturday evening, was very largely attended, in spite of the storm; a good sign of how genuine the public interest in these concerts is. The first number on the programme was Beethoven's A major symphony, No. 7. Of all performances of Beethoven's symphonies that Mr. Henschel has given us this winter, this one seemed to us to be by far the finest. The orchestra played generally with precision, delicacy and fire, with a nice regard for shading and a fine quality of tone. None of the fortissimo passages were played so violently that no vigor was left to italicize sforzando accents, and the more intricate passages were given with admirable clearness. We noticed with especial pleasure in the allegretto that Mr. Henschel did not allow the primary theme of the movement (the one first given out by the violas, 'celli and basses) to be wholly sacrificed to the melodious cantilena which is added to it as a counter-theme. The tempi struck us as excellent, with one exception, and more consistently maintained than is sometimes the case with Mr. Henschel. At the beginning of the Pivace in the first movement, and of the allegretto, it seemed (as it often has before) as if Mr. Henschel gradually settled down into his intended tempo, instead of boldly asserting it at the outset, but this apparent indecision was of short duration in both cases. The one thing to which we feel inclined to take exception was the unusually rapid tempo of the famous phrase in D major in the third movement, and its consequent lack of contrast with the Presto, into which it is intercalated. With the somewhat moderate tempo of the Presto itself we have no wish to quarrel, for the orchestra played it so lightly that the movement made the due impression of nimble agility. But the passage to which we especially refer (really the trio of the scherzo), was so nearly in the same tempo, that we cannot imagine how Mr. Henschel justifies his reading to himself, in face of Beethoven's perfectly plain direction, "assai meno presto" (much less fast). The metronome marks in the score (Peters edition) are: 132 for a dotted half-note in the Presto, and 84 in the assai meno presto; a very marked contrast. Whether these figures were written by Beethoven or not we do not know; but they certainly seem in keeping with the Italian directions given by him. Miss Fanny Kellogg sang the recitative "Crudele! ah, no, mio ben!" and the aria "Non mi dir, bel idol mio, (generally known as the "letter aria") from "Don Giovanni," with excellent comprehension of the music, and with no little truth of feeling. Her singing was also highly praiseworthy from a technical point of view; yet it must be admitted that the high tessitura of the aria is not very well suited to Miss Kellogg's voice, and one's enjoyment of the music was somewhat marred by an uncomfortable sense of effort which it was impossible to overcome. Later in the concert, she appeared to far greater advantage, in Rubinstein's "The dew, it shines," and especially in Mr. Henschel's "The Sunny Beam," a thoroughly charming song, which Miss Kellogg sang with admirable grace and sprightly sentiment. Mr. John A. Preston played Henselt's F minor concerto. To attempt this, in many ways remarkable work, is a piece of no mean daring on the part of a pianist. Not merely because the work is exceptionally taxing and difficult, demanding the most brilliant virtuosity in the performer, but also, and principally, because the effect of the music depends so entirely upon the manner in which it is played. Henselt's concerto, with all its beauties and fine workmanship, is, after all, not one of those works of commanding genius which hold the listener captive by their intrinsic musical beauty and power. It is a work which gives the supreme artist admirable and quite unique opportunities for exhibiting almost all his finest qualities; but, to be really interesting, it requires absolutely to be played by a pianist of genius, and of a genius, too, of that peculiarly graceful and sentimental type with which Henselt himself was gifted in abundant measure. To meet the technical requirements of the work, Mr. Preston was armed at every point, and for the rest, his inborn intensity of musical feeling, good artistic judgment, and a certain heroic style, for which his playing is notable, stood him in good stead. Yet the concerto needs more than these fine qualities in a player, or perhaps we should say, far different qualities. A certain rather sophisticated grace and charm, a highly finished elegance of style (qualities in which Mr. Preston is somewhat deficient), go far more in this case than spontaneous fire and vigor. Mr. Preston's playing, which would be wholly in place in compositions of more genuine musical inspiration—say in Beethoven, Schubert or Schumann—does not quite accord with Henselt's more artificial charm. One point in his reading we were rather surprised at, and this was his marked variations in tempo in the first movement. Henselt has printed the following very plain direction in the score: "The first movement of the concerto must be played, without change of tempo, as far as possible, strictly in time, with the exception of the few places indicated." When an artist finds that the full development of his conception of a work necessitates running counter to any "stage direction," it is a pretty sure sign that something is fundamentally wrong in his conception. But, after all, it must be said emphatically that Mr. Preston's performance was so fine as to make all this searching criticism worth while; in those portions of the work in which his own musical instincts were most in harmony with the composer's ideal, in the great crescendo of the Larghetto, and the more fiery parts of the last movement, for instance, he was really superb. The "religioso" part of the first movement, with its brilliant accompanying arpeggi, was given with wonderful vigor and power. As for brilliancy, there was hardly a phrase in the whole concerto, save some of the octave passages in the slow movement, that was not played as brilliantly as could have been desired. Mr. Preston was very warmly received by the audience, and as warmly applauded at the end. Gade's beautiful overture, "In the Highlands," brought the concert to a delightful close.

At the next concert the programme will be—
Overture to "Coriolanus," op. 62.....Beethoven
Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53 (first time).....Brahms
Symphony in B minor (unfinished).....Schubert
Ballet music from "Sylvia".....Delibes
La Captive. Reverie for contralto (op. 12).....Berlioz
Introduction to the third act, dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs. From the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
Miss Mary H. How will sing the solos.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last Saturday, pleased the audience greatly, and in good part merited the enthusiasm which it awoke.

It began with the overture to "Oberon," which was somewhat boisterously performed, but without any errors. The "Symphony in C," by Schubert, was the piece de resistance of the program, and was finely given. This great work was given twice in Boston last season, but failed of its effect both times, once because the edifice (the Brattle Street Church) had very poor acoustical properties, and consequently brought the musicianly work of Mr. Lang and his well-trained orchestra to naught, and the second time because the orchestra had not had sufficient rehearsals to become acquainted with the reading, or the conducting of Dr. Maas. On this occasion these shortcomings were both absent, and the consequence was a performance of much worth.

The Scherzo was a little too noisy, the brasses being too prominent, and in the last movement, the strings sometimes anticipated the conductor's beat, but the latter instruments did finely in the florid passages, and did not blur in spite of the rapid rush of the close. The four great chords of the last movement came like the thunder strokes of a Titan, with the full force of the orchestra. It is in working up such climaxes, that Mr. Henschel excels. He is continually endeavoring to instill a bold type of playing into his men, and the fiery character of the last movements suits well to his own bold and impetuous nature.

Mr. Charles R. Adams was the soloist. I have so often spoken of the huskiness of his voice, that it is with real pleasure I write that on this occasion he sang as only a great artist can. He did not fail in reaching a single high note (and there were plenty in his arias), and though sometimes obliged to use the falsetto, he employed it in a most skillful manner, and both these and his chest notes were sweet and full.

At the close of the "Farewell Song," from "Lohengrin," he seemed a little fatigued, and became somewhat throaty, but he gave the varying emotions with true artistic and dramatic effect.

But I pass (as the gentleman said when he held but one small pair), I pass to the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, last Saturday. This began with the Seventh Beethoven Symphony. Anything much better than the first three movements of this symphony has seldom been heard in Boston. The string quartet which is the important part of the allegretto movement was practically flawless. The Introduction was shaded with a refinement that was a credit alike to conductor and orchestra. The last movement was quite the reverse of this perfection. It was taken so fast that the beautiful violin figures were totally lost, only the accented notes (the first of each group) being audible. Although no other disaster attended the rapid pace (for the orchestra is so well drilled that it is able to follow the most eccentric tempo), yet the enjoyment of the other movements was decidedly marred by this exaggerated speed.

The vocalist of this concert was Miss Fannie Kellogg, whose style of singing has much improved during the last year. She seems to have discarded the explosive method which she formerly used, and has substituted a more expressive and less sudden missa di voce. Her first number was the grand aria of Donna Anna, from Don Giovanni. This she sang with much feeling and a very appropriate legato style, quite in keeping with Mozart's vein. Only in the upper register her voice seemed hard and thin, and lost all its pleasing quality. In two short songs which she sang subsequently, she made a fine success, especially in a quaint English song by Mr. Henschel, "the Sunny Beam," in which the pretty naivete of the word was enhanced by her manner of rendering it. Mr. Preston was the pianist of the concert. He played the Henselt Concerto (F), which you have recently heard Joseffy perform at the Philharmonic concerts in your city. I cannot say that I was enraptured by the performances. It was as correct as the behavior of a Presbyterian Synod; but it lacked color and character, and at its close it degenerated into something very like a scramble.

The second movement was not without grace and beauty, but one movement cannot make a Concerto. Mr. Preston had evidently chosen too ambitious a work, and he can scarcely expect to avoid the comparisons between his performance and the interpretations of Mme. Essipoff and Mr. Joseffy. The concert closed with Gade's "Scottish Overture," which is not essentially Scottish, and is all the better for it. The next concert promises a varied program, with much Wagner at its close, like a wasp, which is not very exciting until its tail is reached.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XVI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 11TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Coriolanus.) Op. 62. BEETHOVEN.

RHAPSODY FOR CONTRALTO, MALE CHORUS
AND ORCHESTRA, op. 53. (First time.) . . . BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY in B-minor. (Unfinished.) SCHUBERT.
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.

INTRODUCTION TO THE THIRD ACT, DANCE OF THE apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs.
From "The Master Singers of Nuremberg." . . . WAGNER.

LA CAPTIVE. Rêverie for Contralto. (Op. 12.) . . . BERLIOZ.

BALLET-MUSIC (Sylvia.) DELIBES.
Intermezzo et Valse lente.—Pizzicati.—

SOLOIST:

MISS MARY H. HOW.

RHAPSODY.

Aber abseits, wer ist's?
In's Gebüsch verliert sich sein Pfad -
Hinter ihm schlagen die Sträucher zusammen.
Das Gras steht wieder auf,
Die Oede verschlingt ihn.
Ach wer heilet die Schmerzen
Dess, dem Balsam zu Gift ward.
Der sich Menschenhass
Aus der Fülle der Liebe trank?
Erst verachtet, dann ein Verächter.
Zehrt er heimlich auf seinen eignen Wert
In ungnügender Selbstsucht.
Ist auf deinem Psalter,
Vater der Liebe,
Ein Ton, seinem Ohre vernehmlich,
O, so erquickte sein Herz!
Oeffne den unwölkten Blick
Ueber die tausend Quellen
Neben dem Durstenden in der Wüste!

(Aus Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter.")

BRAHMS.

But who goes there apart?
In the brake his pathway is lost.
Close behind clash the branches together.
The grass rises again,
The desert engulfs him,
Who can comfort his anguish,
Who, if balsam be deathly?
If the hate of men
From the fulness of love be drained?
He that was scorned turned to a scorner,
Lonely now devours all he hath of worth
In a barren self-seeking.
But if from thy Psalter,
All loving Father,
One strain can but come to his hearing,
Oh, enlighten his heart,
Lift up his o'erclouded eyes
Where are the thousand fountains
Hard by the thirsty one in the desert.

(From Goethe's "Winter Journey in the Hartz-Mountains." Translated by R. H. Benson.)

LA CAPTIVE.

Were I not captive lying,
I should adore this land;
This sea, with soft plaints sighing;
These golden fields at hand;
These stars, unnumbered, beaming;
If 'twere not, that while dreaming,
Thro' darkling shadows gleaming,
I see the Spahi's brand!

I'm not of Tartar rearing,
That slaves of ebon hue,
To me my lute are bearing,
Holding my glass to view!
Far from these realms benighted,
In our lands happier lighted,
With pleasant youths united,
Talk we when falls the dew.

That shore my heart still pleases
That winter doth not know;
Where never icy breezes
Thro' open windows blow;

(From the French of Victor Hugo by Theodore T. Barker.)

Where warm are summer showers,
Where insects, 'mong the flowers
Float thro' emerald tinted bowers,
And 'neath the green grass glow!

Sweet 'tis on moss bed lying,
Singing light songs of Spain;
While friends with footsteps flying,
Dance to the gay refrain!
They're the legion of pleasure,
Where smiles abound without pressure;
Whirl they thro' life's gay measure,
Free from sorrow or pain!

More than all, when the soft breeze
Fans me, while 'neath the trees,
At night, when all is silent,
Seated, I sweetly dream,
I gaze with sweet devotion,
While pale, and without motion,
The moon spreads o'er the ocean
Her fan-like, silvery gleam.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme last evening was essentially a modern one. Berlioz, Brahms and Wagner were represented, and in compositions which had many points in common, and even the ballet music of Delibes, reminded in some degree of effects which have been used in the most modern school, although not in such a simple and melodious manner. The concert began with Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus, which was well played throughout, the abrupt pauses in melodic phrases and the shading and pizzicato effects being given with entire unanimity. Similar effects with the same instruments (the strings) were equally well done in the unfinished Schubert symphony, which received a very fine interpretation, being clear in its execution and effective in its reading. The introduction to the third act of the Master Singers at Nuremberg, with the uncouth dance of the apprentices, and the glorious processional march had good and bad points. The slow tempo of the first part, although clear in all its instruments, seemed to lack the broad swellings of tone (what an Italian would call the vibrazione) which give so much effect to the Wagnerian works. The imitations were well brought out, however. At the introduction to the dance, the violins were unclear in attack in a very important passage where the attack comes in highest register fortissimo, and the subsequent passage showed some raspiness. The dance itself was finely played. It is a very effective picture, with its coarse, rude touches of mediæval merriment, while the tenderer sub-theme is full of beauty as it entwines with the skipping dance rhythm. Immediately after this comes the approach of the crowd, and the orchestra portrays the hurly-burly with graphic effect. Only here we had hoped for more effect from the three trumpets, which were to have made their first appearance in the orchestra on this occasion. We doubt whether they were played at all, or if played it must have been with much timidity, for the clear, cutting trumpet tone was not especially perceptible in this part of the work, where it would have made a telling effect. But nevertheless, the march was given with pompous effect and was the finest portion of the evening's performance. The singer of the concert was Miss Mary H. How, whose rendering of Berlioz's Le Captive calls for high praise. In this song her voice was sympathetic and her shading and expression, all that could be desired. The orchestra did its part excellently in this. The instrumental part of the picture is vastly important in this work. As the captive describes the quiet night, the violins breathe out a most beautiful theme which fits the words in an exquisite manner, when she thinks of distant Spain, a bolero rhythm in the orchestra heightens the effect of the thought and thus through the entire song the instruments are made to round out the suggestion of the vocal part. In a Rhapsody by Brahms, Miss How seemed overweighted. The work itself is one of those modern ones which "swim in a sea of tone," from which the unfortunate singer has sometimes to be fished out; and in this case the vocalist seemed to be feeling her way with great caution, and even then made a bad slip in going from deep to high register, although in the repetition of the same passage she did much better. The male chorus sang securely and refinedly in this number. The concert closed with two selections from Delibes' Sylvia (a work which contains several beautiful numbers for strings, both solo and concerted), the latter of which—a pizzicato—will become as popular as Amaryllis or Traumerel, as played by Thomas's violins. The next concert gives the eighth Beethoven symphony, the Leonora (No. 1) overture, and Massenet's overture to Phedre. Miss How is to repeat the Brahms work, and M. de Seve will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Why, instead of the repetition, M. de Seve does not play a brilliant violin solo, is a mystery to us.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Sixteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A thoroughly enjoyable programme was presented at Music Hall, last evening, by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, the soloist being Miss Mary A. How, and the several numbers as follows:

Overture (Coriolanus), op. 62.....Beethoven
Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53.....Brahms
Symphony in B minor (unfinished).....Schubert
Introduction to the third act. Dance of the Apprentices, Procession and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
La Captive, reverie for contralto (op. 12).....Berlioz
Ballet Music (Sylvia).....Delibes

The admirable contrasts afforded by this arrangement of the evening's selection will be readily seen, and Mr. Henschel's return to his original plan in the programmes of the series was fully appreciated, the brilliant ballet music at the end proving a source of rest and pleasure to players and hearers alike. The novelty of the evening was the Brahms "Rhapsody" for contralto, chorus and orchestra, the merits of which failed to fully appear, the composition having apparently a somewhat indefinite idea, or an idea not readily grasped by the forces engaged in its presentation. Possibly its beauties may be made apparent by the additional hearings to be afforded next week, when it is announced for repetition, but while, like all of this composer's work, it shows the hand of a skilled musician, its vagueness and fragmentary themes do not afford much satisfaction. The soloist, chorus and orchestra appeared to be alike in doubt as to a full understanding of the score, and the ill success attending its presentation was about evenly shared by all participating. Miss How, the soloist, proved to be a singer of excellent promise. Her voice is well and evenly developed, of large ability and more than good quality, and in its use she shows the result of careful and intelligent study. It still lacks much than can come only with a larger experience, but the intelligence and taste shown in the rendering of Berlioz's "La Captive" gives good reason to anticipate a brilliant future for this lady. She made her first public effort in the concert halls of this city on this occasion, though she has held a position in the choir, under Mr. B. J. Lang's direction, at Dr. Hale's church for some time. Of the orchestral work it need only be said that, with a very few exceptions, the several numbers were thoroughly well played. The performance of the overture and the symphony lacked little from being perfect, and the success attending the rendering of the ballet music must have caused more than one member of the audience to wonder whether a "Strauss waltz" for a concluding number some evening would cause any disastrous results, from an educational standpoint. The Wagner selection showed the result of much and well directed labor on the part of the band, as the masterly composition was given with magnificent effect. As a whole, the concert was certainly a very brilliant success.

RHAPSODY.

BRAHMS.

Aber abseits, wer ist's?
In's Gebüsch verliert sich sein Pfad -
Hinter ihm schlagen die Sträucher zusammen.
Das Gras steht wieder auf,
Die Oede verschlingt ihn.
Ach wer heilet die Schmerzen
Dess, dem Balsam zu Gift ward.
Der sich Menschenhass
Aus der Fülle der Liebe trank?
Erst verachtet, dann ein Verächter.
Zehrt er heimlich auf seinen eignen Wert
In ungnügender Selbstsucht.
Ist auf deinem Psalter,
Vater der Liebe,
Ein Ton, seinem Ohre vernehmlich.
O, so erquickte sein Herz!
Oeffne den unwölkten Blick
Ueber die tausend Quellen
Neben dem Durstenden in der Wüste!

(Aus Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter.")

But who goes there apart?
In the brake his pathway is lost.
Close behind clash the branches together.
The grass rises again,
The desert engulfs him,
Who can comfort his anguish,
Who, if balsam be deathly?
If the hate of men
From the fulness of love be drained?
He that was scorned turned to a scorner,
Lonely now devours all he hath of worth
In a barren self-seeking.
But if from thy Psalter,
All loving Father,
One strain can but come to his hearing,
Oh, enlighten his heart,
Lift up his overclouded eyes
Where are the thousand fountains
Hard by the thirsty one in the desert.

(From Goethe's "Winter Journey in the Hartz Mountains." Translated by R. H. Benson.)

LA CAPTIVE.

BERLIOZ.

Were I not captive lying,
I should adore this land;
This sea, with soft plaints sighing;
These golden fields at hand;
These stars, unnumbered, beaming;
If 'twere not, that while dreaming,
Thro' darkling shadows gleaming,
I see the Spahi's brand!

I'm not of Tartar rearing,
That slaves of ebony hue,
To me my lute are bearing,
Holding my glass to view!
Far from these realms benighted,
In our lands happier lighted,
With pleasant youths united,
Talk we when falls the dew.

That shore my heart still pleases
That winter doth not know;
Where never icy breezes
Thro' open windows blow;

(From the French of Victor Hugo by Theodore T. Barker.)

Where warm are summer showers,
Where insects, 'mong the flowers
Float thro' emerald tinted bowers,
And 'neath the green grass glow!
Sweet 'tis on moss bed lying,
Singing light songs of Spain;
While friends with footsteps flying,
Dance to the gay refrain!
They're the legion of pleasure,
Where smiles abound without pressure;
Whirl they thro' life's gay measure,
Free from sorrow or pain!

More than all, when the soft breeze
Fans me, while 'neath the trees,
At night, when all is silent,
Seated, I sweetly dream,
I gaze with sweet devotion,
While pale, and without motion,
The moon spreads o'er the ocean
Her fan-like, silvery gleam.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme last evening was essentially a modern one. Berlioz, Brahms and Wagner were represented, and in compositions which had many points in common, and even the ballet music of Delibes, reminded in some degree of effects which have been used in the most modern school, although not in such a simple and melodious manner. The concert began with Beethoven's overture to Coriolanus, which was well played throughout, the abrupt pauses in melodic phrases and the shading and pizzicato effects being given with entire unanimity. Similar effects with the same instruments (the strings) were equally well done in the unfinished Schubert symphony, which received a very fine interpretation, being clear in its execution and effective in its reading. The introduction to the third act of the Master Singers at Nuremberg, with the uncouth dance of the apprentices, and the glorious processional march had good and bad points. The slow tempo of the first part, although clear in all its instruments, seemed to lack the broad swellings of tone (what an Italian would call the vibrazione) which give so much effect to the Wagnerian works. The imitations were well brought out, however. At the introduction to the dance, the violins were unclear in attack in a very important passage where the attack comes in highest register fortissimo, and the subsequent passage showed some raspiness. The dance itself was finely played. It is a very effective picture, with its coarse, rude touches of mediæval merriment, while the tenderer sub-theme is full of beauty as it entwines with the skipping dance rhythm. Immediately after this comes the approach of the crowd, and the orchestra portrays the hurly-burly with graphic effect. Only here we had hoped for more effect from the three trumpets, which were to have made their first appearance in the orchestra on this occasion. We doubt whether they were played at all, or if played it must have been with much timidity, for the clear, cutting trumpet tone was not especially perceptible in this part of the work, where it would have made a telling effect. But nevertheless, the march was given with pompous effect and was the finest portion of the evening's performance. The singer of the concert was Miss Mary H. How, whose rendering of Berlioz's Le Captive calls for high praise. In this song her voice was sympathetic and her shading and expression, all that could be desired. The orchestra did its part excellently in this. The instrumental part of the picture is vastly important in this work. As the captive describes the quiet night, the violins breathe out a most beautiful theme which fits the words in an exquisite manner, when she thinks of distant Spain, a bolero rhythm in the orchestra heightens the effect of the thought and thus through the entire song the instruments are made to round out the suggestion of the vocal part. In a Rhapsody by Brahms, Miss How seemed overweighted. The work itself is one of those modern ones which "swim in a sea of tone," from which the unfortunate singer has sometimes to be fished out; and in this case the vocalist seemed to be feeling her way with great caution, and even then made a bad slip in going from deep to high register, although in the repetition of the same passage she did much better. The male chorus sang securely and refinedly in this number. The concert closed with two selections from Delibes' Sylvia (a work which contains several beautiful numbers for strings, both solo and concerted), the latter of which—a pizzicato—will become as popular as Amaryllis's or Traumerel, as played by Thomas's violins. The next concert gives the eighth Beethoven symphony, the Leonora (No. 1) overture, and Massenet's overture to Phedre. Miss How is to repeat the Brahms work, and M. de Seve will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto. Why, instead of the repetition, M. de Seve does not play a brilliant violin solo, is a mystery to us.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Sixteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

A thoroughly enjoyable programme was presented at Music Hall, last evening, by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, the soloist being Miss Mary A. How, and the several numbers as follows:

Overture (Coriolanus), op. 62.....Beethoven
Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53.....Brahms
Symphony in B minor (unfinished).....Schubert
Introduction to the third act. Dance of the Apprentices, Procession and Homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg".....Wagner
La Captive, reverie for contralto (op. 12).....Berlioz
Ballet Music (Sylvia).....Delibes

The admirable contrasts afforded by this arrangement of the evening's selection will be readily seen, and Mr. Henschel's return to his original plan in the programmes of the series was fully appreciated, the brilliant ballet music at the end proving a source of rest and pleasure to players and hearers alike. The novelty of the evening was the Brahms "Rhapsody" for contralto, chorus and orchestra, the merits of which failed to fully appear, the composition having apparently a somewhat indefinite idea, or an idea not readily grasped by the forces engaged in its presentation. Possibly its beauties may be made apparent by the additional hearings to be afforded next week, when it is announced for repetition, but while, like all of this composer's work, it shows the hand of a skilled musician, its vagueness and fragmentary themes do not afford much satisfaction. The soloist, chorus and orchestra appeared to be alike in doubt as to a full understanding of the score, and the ill success attending its presentation was about evenly shared by all participating. Miss How, the soloist, proved to be a singer of excellent promise. Her voice is well and evenly developed, of large ability and more than good quality, and in its use she shows the result of careful and intelligent study. It still lacks much than can come only with a larger experience, but the intelligence and taste shown in the rendering of Berlioz's "La Captive" gives good reason to anticipate a brilliant future for this lady. She made her first public effort in the concert halls of this city on this occasion, though she has held a position in the choir, under Mr. B. J. Lang's direction, at Dr. Hale's church for some time. Of the orchestral work it need only be said that, with a very few exceptions, the several numbers were thoroughly well played. The performance of the overture and the symphony lacked little from being perfect, and the success attending the rendering of the ballet music must have caused more than one member of the audience to wonder whether a "Strauss waltz" for a concluding number some evening would cause any disastrous results, from an educational standpoint. The Wagner selection showed the result of much and well directed labor on the part of the band, as the masterly composition was given with magnificent effect. As a whole, the concert was certainly a very brilliant success.

162
Boston Symphony Orchestra. The concert on Saturday may fairly be counted as one of the most enjoyable of the current course. The variety was large, though there were but six numbers on the programme, and no piece presented was of a tiresome length. The most familiar compositions were Beethoven's overture to Collin's tragedy, "Coriolan," and the two movements of the eighth or unfinished symphony of Schubert. The playing of these works was exceptionally fine. It was inspiring to hear the first phrases of the overture given out with such well-directed energy; the fortissimo burst, with all the wind added, after the long-drawn note, in unison, was like a shout by a hundred tuneful stentors. The Schubert fragments were given with admirable smoothness and clearness. Less satisfactory was the performance of the selections from Wagner's "Master-Singers." But the difficulties of this number, simple as it is compared with much that has come from the master, are enormous. The sudden changes in key and rhythm, to say nothing of the harsh dissonances in those phrases which precede the march, are peculiarly distracting. The march itself, however, was delivered with most impressive dignity. The orchestra also played two movements—a slow waltz and a polka, the latter with all the strings pizzicati—from Leo Delibes's ballet, "Sylvia," delightful musical trifles, and coming last were favorably placed for dismissing the audience in the best of humor. Miss Mary H. How was the soloist. She sang, first, in a rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, by Brahms, the words of which are from Goethe's "Winter Journey in the Hartz Mountains." Like nearly everything by its author which has been heard here, vagueness pervades much of the work, especially in the first part, where the solo voice and the orchestra are apparently groping in the dark, without aim or purpose, and finding—nothing. Something like tangible form appears as the male chorus join in the prayer at the close. Miss How's voice is clear and brilliant, and her style shows intelligence and good training. Though she gave no evidence of a want of self-possession, it was probably through nervousness that she sometimes sang a little sharp. She appeared to better advantage in Berlioz's "La Captive," which she sang with excellent judgment. This song, which is called by its author "a ravery," is altogether unique. Departing from the usual method followed by writers of the romantic school, the melody for each verse is nearly the same, while to the orchestra is assigned the task of expressing or suggesting the sense of the text. In other words, the orchestra furnishes a varying background on which appear successively the musical illustrations of the poem. The work is an excellent instance to cite for the sake of showing what elegant results with ordinary resources are possible with one whose technical acquirements are so thorough that to think an orchestral score has become a second nature; and one who, with this power, has also at his command inventive faculties which never fail in service. The scoring of this song has more ideas, and new ideas too, than are found in some works of a hundred times its bulk which are called great. The orchestra played their parts in this work with surpassing elegance, and perhaps some of the violinists were led to perceive the charming effect, produced in those phrases which have a bolero form, by playing with bounced bows, "illegitimate" as the method may be.

At the concert next Saturday, the Brahms's rhapsody will be repeated, with Miss How for soloist, and Mr. De Sève will play Mendelssohn's violin concerto. The orchestral works will be Beethoven's "Lore" overture, No. 1, and his eighth symphony, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre."

The Symphony Concert.

The concert which delighted the large audience at Music hall on Saturday evening was the sixteenth in the series of symphony concerts. Mr. Henschel returned to his original plan and gave the overture first. It was Beethoven's Coriolanus, which was exceedingly well played, the shading and various effects being given with an artistic nicety and correct finish that charmed the audience. The "Rhapsody" (Brahms) for contralto, chorus and orchestra, was not a success. Miss How appeared to less advantage in this, than in her other numbers. The Rhapsody is to be repeated at the rehearsal and concert of this week, and doubtless its real beauties will be brought out. At any rate, it will be improved upon, by the orchestra and chorus, as well as by the soloist. The fair debutante scored her grand success of the evening in the rendering of Berlioz's "La Captive." Her voice was then shown at its best. Her shading and expression elicited praise from all lips, and at the evenness of its development even those who have watched her career were happily surprised. Miss How is destined to take high rank in her profession. The orchestra's part in "La Captive" was also finely performed. The introduction to the third act of the "Master Singers at Nuremberg" was fairly rendered; the dance of the apprentices particularly well. The closing number consisted of a couple of selections from Delibes's "Sylvia," brilliant ballet music which was played finely to the great enjoyment of the large audience.

—At the close of the Symphony Concert Saturday evening a pair of somewhat mud-begrimed overshoes took advantage of the fact that their wearer had his head turned away to speak to an acquaintance to plant themselves firmly on a yard and a half of velvet which a high-bred dame was trailing behind her. Polite people had kept at a distance from this moving advertisement of bad taste, with much inconvenience to themselves, but these uncultured overshoes had been longing for just such an opportunity. There was a movement, a ripping sound, an angry exclamation followed by a "beg your pardon," and one of the overshoes betook itself to one side. Then came another movement, another rip, longer and louder than the first, and an inch or two of some white undergarment became visible. More smothered exclamations and other confused apologies followed, and the overshoes, taking advantage of a break in the crowd, bore their owner rapidly into the air, where they chuckled to themselves hilariously and congratulated each other on a duty well performed. The moral of this paragraph? Why, never wear overshoes into a public hall, of course.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sixteenth concert of the Symphony orchestra series, given on Saturday evening, was thoroughly delightful. Certainly the most enjoyable of the course thus far, it reflected honor upon all who had part in it, and rightfully satisfied both the exacting and the easy-going listeners.

The first number was Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture, so broadly suggestive of its great subject and the contradictory phases of his troubled life. The sharp chords that bite like strenuous sword-blows; the murmur and bustle, as of tumult and clamor; the few moments of softer and, as it were, domestic mood; the swift and decisive climax, succeeded by the brief and simple threnody;—all these were admirably presented with an animation and dramatic effect that made them vivid without ever diminishing the tragic stateliness of the general tone. The next orchestral number included the two movements from Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor—movements so beautiful that we are almost better pleased that their author should have added nothing to them, because he might not have equalled them. The allegro moderato begins with the faintest of sounds, which rises like a warning hand, and then suddenly sinks into silence, as the main subject begins to speak from the violoncelli (what a pity, we thought, that they should be divided!), and then passes on to the violins. This subject is of much delicacy and of sympathetic cast; yet it holds its own nobly when the full orchestra receives it and delivers it, almost fragmentarily with many comments and responses. Even the forceful episodic entrance of the deeper brass does not drive it from remembrance or interest, so that its final return, floating high over sonorous harmonies, is no less vital and potent than its first appeal. The andante con moto has almost the character of a religious march in its temper and its rhythm, and is treated with a more contained eloquence and with less variety of orchestral effect. Both movements were read with fine intelligence and appreciative feeling; pleasant tempi were taken and excellently maintained, while the conductor's management of the allegro was especially favorable to the principal subject, every new phase of which was in turn made justly manifest. A third selection was from Wagner's "Master Singers of Nuremberg," and gave the introduction to the third act, the "Dance of the Apprentices," the "Procession," and the "Homage to Hans Sachs." That Mr. Henschel was here perfectly at home, goes without saying; as also it needs not to be said that in such scenes Wagner shows, perhaps, his best characteristics. When, as in the "Introduction," he invokes the deeper elements of the orchestra, he fills the ear with a volume of tone that seems to be not made of human breath, but to come from some great organ, while his contrasting use of the higher ranges gives, as the spirit of the hour dictates, a certain mystic or idyllic sense that others may imitate, but which is his original possession. With what a rush from every corner and by-way then comes precipitately down all that boisterous life which shall soon take on a rhythmic motion in the dance—a dance indeed eccentric and irregular, but still bound by a common motive and a common force. Then, from the hurly-burly which follows, as if from the breaking-up of the festivity, a gradual revolution takes place, and the martial beat, at first but indicated, soon overrides all else, and with serious sound and steady pace carries away all lighter elements in its train, and merges them in the full tide of its grave and noble choric harmony. Leader and orchestra were true to author and to one another in all this changeable succession, and the sequence became to the imaginative mind almost as picturesque as if it had been palpably enacted upon a stage. In a far different vein were cast the two movements of ballet-music from the "Sylvia" of Delibes, with which the programme concluded. Of these the first—intermezzo e valser lento—is so seductive and mobile that even the sternest old players wagged their heads to its sway, while the younger fiddlers nearly giggled aloud as the pizzicati of the second movement tinkled out from under their fingers in measures that reminded us of the spirit (though not in the least of the shaping) of Paladilhe's fascinating Roman serenade, "La Mandolinata." We do not remember to have heard the orchestra read anything so daintily and so playfully as this same ballet music, and we should hold it for a triumph if they could perform in such a vein the scherzo and the fairy music of the "Midsummer Nights' Dream" of Mendelssohn. The audience were so delighted with the number and the playing that they seemed loth to rise from their seats, as if unwilling to believe that the end had really come, and so prove once again the perennial wisdom of Mr. Samuel Weller's answer to his father's criticism upon the prospective disadvantage of a "werry sudden pull-up" in their evident "wish there vas more of it."

163

When the overture was finished, a dozen or fifteen of our club singers slipped in between the orchestra and the organ-desk, and Mr. Henschel led to the front of the platform a pale, blonde lady, who was received with that deliberate and depressing recognition in which Boston is pre-eminently skilled. Fortunately for the lady—Miss Mary H. How—she has had ample opportunity since she left her Cincinnati home two years ago, for the purpose of studying with Mr. Charles R. Adams, to note this local trait, and so was not apparently disconcerted by it. The composition, to be given for the first time here, was a "Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra," opus 53, by Brahms, and it certainly merits its title. It is built upon a subject chosen from Goethe's "Winter Journey in the Hartz Mountains," and—to be brief—first depicts a lonely and anguished wanderer astray in the desert, and then appeals to heaven that he may be enlightened and saved. It will, perhaps, be guessed that the application is rather spiritual than material, and the setting must be rather suggestive than descriptive. Therefore, all the earlier portion—in which, by the way, the male voices bear no part—is really a rhapsodical study upon the germinal idea of the words, which are set in a quasi recitative, while the instrumentation is filled with suspended chords and doubtful, searching, tentative phrases of minor mode and vague, gloomy character. As a study it is interesting and ingenious; in performance, it is such a prelude as makes all the more welcome the freer and more exalted feeling of the second part, when the dignified measures of the contralto are sustained by the full major harmony of the male voices, and all is lightened and cheered by the accompaniment of the violoncelli in soft pizzicato. Miss How sang her part so serenely and so fittingly that her listeners were ready enough to treat her with the warmth which they had kept to themselves at first. Her voice is large and full, equal in quantity and quality, and delivered without any effort, seeming rather to flow than to be given out. Her reading and singing were tempered by a shade more of reserve than we should have desired; but, apart from the fact that this is a fault, on the right side, much must be allowed for the influence of a first appearance; and then why should the audience have all the calm on their side? Later in the evening Miss How sang that expressive song of Berlioz, "The Captive," with chaste and true effect, giving a rendering of remarkably high character. The pensiveness of this soliloquy, laden with fond memories, was really present in the quiet and well poised sostenuto of the singer, whose voicing lacked nothing but a more fervid feeling to make it perfect.

At the next concert Miss How will repeat the "Rhapsody," Mr. De Seve will play Mendelssohn's E minor violin concerto, Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture, and Massenet's "Phedre" will be given, and the symphony will be Beethoven's eighth.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening, when the following programme was presented: Overture, "Coriolanus," op. 62, Beethoven; Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53, first time, Brahms; Symphony in B minor, unfinished, Schubert; Introduction to the third act, dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner; La Captive, Réverie for Contralto, op. 12, Berlioz; Ballet Music, "Sylvia," Delibes. This programme had plenty of variety, and was, in general, well performed. The most interesting feature was the unfinished Schubert symphony, which was unusually well expressed, a particular success being gained in the way in which the inner spirit of melody was brought out amid the sturdiness of the main motive. The Wagner music, which is very expressive of the rude gaiety and simple manners of the times it describes, was given with all the force it demands, and the Beethoven overture, if calling for no marked comment, was at least satisfactorily performed. The chief novelty of the evening was the rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, by Brahms, the principal part of which was sung by Miss Mary H. How, who appeared on this occasion for the first time in Boston. Her singing was delightfully pure and true, correct in method and simple in its adornment, although she did not appear to such good advantage in the rhapsody as in the Berlioz selection later in the evening. The work by Brahms opens heavily and slowly, and seems expressionless and hard, but the latter part is rich and strong in melody and expression and delightful in its emotional power. It will be repeated by Miss How at the next concert, which affords a pleasant anticipation, for it is a composition which deserves more than one hearing. In regard to Miss How's singing satisfaction may be expressed at the distinctness of her enunciation, which is a merit not always noticed even in the most famous vocalists. At the next concert Beethoven's Eighth symphony will be performed, also his Leonore Overture No. 1, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Mendelssohn's violin concerto is also to be played by Mr. Alfred de Seve.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on a firmer footing than ever next season. It promises eventually to be a really permanent orchestra, after the manner of the Kapellen of Europe.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The programme was a very good one, and the work of both conductor and orchestra was, taken altogether, the best of the series this fall. Not only this, but it was, in addition, admirable in almost every respect. A remarkably interesting and sympathetic reading of Schubert's unfinished symphony was given. It was clear, consistent and gracefully colored, and there was much to admire in the distinctness with which the inner parts came out, especially in the andante. Among the novelties was a Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, by Brahms, which was heard here for the first time on this occasion. The opening portion of the work is not particularly attractive, but is dry and deliberate music in the composer's most premeditated and most soulless manner; but the second subject is a flowing, expressive and really charming melody, beautifully developed and enriched by masterly treatment in harmony and instrumentation. The soloist was Miss Mary H. How, who has a smooth, full and sympathetic contralto voice, even through its whole compass, and delightful in its penetrating quality. Her phrasing is always thoughtful and artistic, her intonation very true, and in all that she did she manifested purity of taste, delicacy of expression, refinement of feeling and excellent schooling. Her interpretation of Berlioz's "The Captive," later in the evening, was, on the whole, the most effective and the most expressive that work has ever received here. Miss How placed herself at once in the esteem of her audience, and achieved a most flattering success. The orchestral selections we have not as yet mentioned were Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," the introduction to the third act of "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," together with the dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs, from the same work, and some ballet music by Delibes. These were all finely performed. The light and pretty dance music that ended the concert met with marked success. At the next concert Beethoven's Eighth Symphony will be performed, also his Leonore Overture No. 1, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Mendelssohn's violin concerto is to be played by Mr. Alfred de Seve, and Miss How will be heard again in the Brahms Rhapsodie, which is to be repeated.

Sarcelle

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The grand orchestra under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction has never thus far been heard to better advantage than at the Sixteenth Symphony concert of the series at Music Hall on Saturday evening. Sceldom has such good music been given in Boston as that produced by playing the overture "Coriolanus" by this orchestra of seventy odd musicians. Beethoven's noble composition was interpreted with great beauty of expression and descriptive power than has ever been hitherto performed here. The following was the complete programme presented. Overture, "Coriolanus," op. 62, Beethoven; Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53, first time, Brahms; Symphony in B minor, unfinished, Schubert; Introduction to the third act, dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner; La Captive, Réverie for contralto, op. 12, Berlioz; Ballet Music, "Sylvia," Delibes. At the conclusion of the overture Miss Mary H. How, of Cincinnati, and a pupil here for the past two years of Mr. Charles R. Adams, sang the "Rhapsody," assisted by a male chorus of about a dozen singers, who stood in the rear of the accompanying orchestra. Miss How appeared somewhat reserved, even shy—it was her first appearance—in this number and did not make the pronounced impression which she unquestionably did in the Berlioz selection, "La Captive," later in the programme. She received, however, a fair share of applause from an audience quick to catch the excellence of her voice to be thereafter shown. The playing of Schubert's unfinished symphony scored another triumph for Mr. Henschel and his orchestra, which was repeated in the exquisite performance of Wagner's "Master Singers of Nuremberg" and the ballet music by Delibes. The "Rhapsody," by Brahms, will be repeated at both the rehearsal and concert of the Boston orchestra this week, and it is probable that Miss How will more than retrieve the slight faults of her rendition on Saturday evening last. The programme for the next concert, in addition to the "Rhapsody," will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, also his Leonore Overture No. 1, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Mendelssohn's violin concerto is also to be played by Mr. Alfred de Seve. Franklin

SIXTEENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

—The sixteenth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening last. There was the usual full and brilliant attendance; or, to use the common phrase, limiting it of course, to people in the musical world, "everybody was there," and the greatest interest prevailed. The programme was of such strong interest that the most confirmed musical hermit was undoubtedly drawn out of his cell by it. One very interesting novelty and another no less interesting revival formed the specialties of the concert. The former was Brahms' "Rhapsodie" for alto solo and male chorus (op. 53). The words of this remarkable composition are to be found in Goethe's "Harzreise in Winter." The lines are descriptive of a misanthrope wandering in solitude over the mountains, and conclude with a prayer to the "all-loving Father," to comfort his heart. It is scarcely such a subject as would have been selected by any other composer for treatment. Brahms, however, is so eccentric in his genius that the subject seems exactly suited to his peculiar style of expression. He has created in the "Rhapsodie" a work which scarcely contains within itself the elements of popularity. It is, however, of refined beauty and appeals strongly to the feelings of a cultivated musician. The piece commences in the key of C-minor. The opening recitative and air, commencing, "Who can comfort his anguish," are impressed with a profound melancholy; and the sudden change to C major with the entry for the first time of the chorus pianissimo, in the final movement, is one of the most striking points in the work. The solo part was excellently sung by Miss Mary H. How, a lady who made her Boston debut at this concert, and the chorus was well given by male voices. Miss How's voice is inheringly one of rare beauty, and she exhibits a perfect control of it that indicates her early training to have been modelled after the very best traditions. In her rendering of Berlioz's song, "The Captive," she displayed an excellent cantabile as well as finesse, and though her style was not sufficiently impassioned and sympathetic, her singing in every other respect left nothing to be desired. One of the most enjoyable performances of the evening was that of Schubert's unfinished symphony in B-minor. It is a well known symphony upon which the beautiful yet singular individuality of the composer is most markedly impressed; it being likewise full of those "heavenly lengths" about which Schumann was wont to go into raptures, a feeling which was evidently shared by the present audience, whose plaudits after each movement testified to the maturity of their musical appreciation. Another welcome number of the concert was the Dance of the Apprentices, the Procession, and the Homage to Hans Sachs, from Wagner's "Master Singers." There is much characteristic writing in the score of the work, and at the same time there are but few of the inequalities, and none of that tendency to diffuseness of treatment which are observable in most of Wagner's music. There was the slight aggravation resulting from a concert performance of operatic music, but at no time did it entail dullness and weariness; and the orchestra contributed a liberal share of artistic and effective work. The concert concluded with some light and pleasing ballet music by Delibes, which had, however, nothing more than the ear-tickling tune element to commend it. It were hypercritical to find the slightest fault with Mr. Henschel's conducting at this concert, for it was exceptionally accurate and artistic.

At the concert this evening, Beethoven's eighth symphony and his Leonore overture, No. 1, will be performed, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Miss How will repeat the Rhapsody by Brahms, and Mr. Alfred DeSeve will perform Mendelssohn's concerto in E-minor for the violin. Home Journal on the right side, much must be allowed for the influence of a first appearance; and then why should the audience have all the calm on their side? Later in the evening Miss How sang that expressive song of Berlioz, "The Captive," with chaste and true effect, giving a rendering of remarkably high character. The pensiveness of this soliloquy, laden with fond memories, was really present in the quiet and well poised sostenuto of the singer, whose voicing lacked nothing but a more fervid feeling to make it perfect.

At the next concert Miss How will repeat the "Rhapsody," Mr. De Séve will play Mendelssohn's E minor violin concerto, Beethoven's first "Leonore" overture, and Massenet's "Phedre" will be given, and the symphony will be Beethoven's eighth.

Sixteenth Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall Saturday evening, when the following programme was presented: Overture, "Coriolanus," op. 62, Beethoven; Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53, first time, Brahms; Symphony in B minor, unfinished, Schubert; Introduction to the third act, dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner; La Captive, Réverie for Contralto, op. 12, Berlioz; Ballet Music, "Sylvia," Delibes. This programme had plenty of variety, and was, in general, well performed. The most interesting feature was the unfinished Schubert symphony, which was unusually well expressed, a particular success being gained in the way in which the inner spirit of melody was brought out amid the sturdiness of the main motive. The Wagner music, which is very expressive of the rude gait and simple manners of the times it describes, was given with all the force it demands, and the Beethoven overture, if calling for no marked comment, was at least satisfactorily performed. The chief novelty of the evening was the rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, by Brahms, the principal part of which was sung by Miss Mary H. How, who appeared on this occasion for the first time in Boston. Her singing was delightfully pure and true, correct in method and simple in its adornment, although she did not appear to such good advantage in the rhapsody as in the Berlioz selection later in the evening. The work by Brahms opens heavily and slowly, and seems expressionless and hard, but the latter part is rich and strong in melody and expression and delightful in its emotional power. It will be repeated by Miss How at the next concert, which affords a pleasant anticipation, for it is a composition which deserves more than one hearing. In regard to Miss How's singing satisfaction may be expressed at the distinctness of her enunciation, which is a merit not always noticed even in the most famous vocalists. At the next concert Beethoven's Eighth symphony will be performed, also his Leonore Overture No. 1, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Mendelssohn's violin concerto is also to be played by Mr. Alfred de Séve.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on a firmer footing than ever next season. It promises eventually to be a really permanent orchestra, after the manner of the Kapellen of Europe.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The programme was a very good one, and the work of both conductor and orchestra was, taken altogether, the best of the series this fall. Not only this, but it was, in addition, admirable in almost every respect. A remarkably interesting and sympathetic reading of Schubert's unfinished symphony was given. It was clear, consistent and gracefully colored, and there was much to admire in the distinctness with which the inner parts came out, especially in the andante. Among the novelties was a Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, by Brahms, which was heard here for the first time on this occasion. The opening portion of the work is not particularly attractive, but is dry and deliberate music in the composer's most premeditated and most soulless manner; but the second subject is a flowing, expressive and really charming melody, beautifully developed and enriched by masterly treatment in harmony and instrumentation. The soloist was Miss Mary H. How, who has a smooth, full and sympathetic contralto voice, even through its whole compass, and delightful in its penetrating quality. Her phrasing is always thoughtful and artistic, her intonation very true, and in all that she did she manifested purity of taste, delicacy of expression, refinement of feeling and excellent schooling. Her interpretation of Berlioz's "The Captive," later in the evening, was, on the whole, the most effective and the most expressive that work has ever received here. Miss How placed herself at once in the esteem of her audience, and achieved a most flattering success. The orchestral selections we have not as yet mentioned were Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," the introduction to the third act of "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," together with the dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs, from the same work, and some ballet music by Delibes. These were all finely performed. The light and pretty dance music that ended the concert met with marked favor. At the next concert Beethoven's Eighth Symphony will be performed, also his Leonore Overture No. 1, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Mendelssohn's violin concerto is to be played by Mr. Alfred de Séve, and Miss How will be heard again in the Brahms Rhapsodie, which is to be repeated.

Sorotte

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The grand orchestra under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction has never thus far been heard to better advantage than at the Sixteenth Symphony concert of the series at Music Hall on Saturday evening. Seldom has such good music been given in Boston as that produced by playing the overture "Coriolanus" by this orchestra of seventy odd musicians. Beethoven's noble composition was interpreted with great beauty of expression and descriptive power than has ever been hitherto performed here. The following was the complete programme presented. Overture, "Coriolanus," op. 62, Beethoven; Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53, first time, Brahms; Symphony in B minor, unfinished, Schubert; Introduction to the third act, dance of the apprentices, procession and homage to Hans Sachs, from "The Master Singers of Nuremberg," Wagner; La Captive, Réverie for contralto, op. 12, Berlioz; Ballet Music, "Sylvia," Delibes. At the conclusion of the overture Miss Mary H. How, of Cincinnati, and a pupil here for the past two years of Mr. Charles R. Adams, sang the "Rhapsody," assisted by a male chorus of about a dozen singers, who stood in the rear of the accompanying orchestra. Miss How appeared somewhat reserved, even shy—it was her first appearance—in this number and did not make the pronounced impression which she unquestionably did in the Berlioz selection, "La Captive," later in the programme. She received, however, a fair share of applause from an audience quick to catch the excellence of her voice to be thereafter shown. The playing of Schubert's unfinished symphony scored another triumph for Mr. Henschel and his orchestra, which was repeated in the exquisite performance of Wagner's "Master Singers of Nuremberg" and the ballet music by Delibes. The "Rhapsody," by Brahms, will be repeated at both the rehearsal and concert of the Boston orchestra this week, and it is probable that Miss How will more than retrieve the slight faults of her rendition on Saturday evening last. The programme for the next concert, in addition to the "Rhapsody," will include Beethoven's Eighth Symphony, also his Leonore Overture No. 1, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Mendelssohn's violin concerto is also to be played by Mr. Alfred de Séve. Traveller

SIXTEENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

—The sixteenth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening last. There was the usual full and brilliant attendance; or, to use the common phrase, limiting it of course, to people in the musical world, "everybody was there," and the greatest interest prevailed. The programme was of such strong interest that the most confirmed musical hermit was undoubtedly drawn out of his cell by it. One very interesting novelty and another no less interesting revival formed the specialties of the concert. The former was Brahms' "Rhapsodie" for alto solo and male chorus (op. 53). The words of this remarkable composition are to be found in Goethe's "Harzreise in Winter." The lines are descriptive of a misanthrope wandering in solitude over the mountains, and conclude with a prayer to the "all-loving Father," to comfort his heart. It is scarcely such a subject as would have been selected by any other composer for treatment. Brahms, however, is so eccentric in his genius that the subject seems exactly suited to his peculiar style of expression. He has created in the "Rhapsodie" a work which scarcely contains within itself the elements of popularity. It is, however, of refined beauty and appeals strongly to the feelings of a cultivated musician. The piece commences in the key of C-minor. The opening recitative and air, commencing, "Who can comfort his anguish," are impressed with a profound melancholy; and the sudden change to C major with the entry for the first time of the chorus pianissimo, in the final movement, is one of the most striking points in the work. The solo part was excellently sung by Miss Mary H. How, a lady who made her Boston debut at this concert, and the chorus was well given by male voices. Miss How's voice is inheringly one of rare beauty, and she exhibits a perfect control of it that indicates her early training to have been modelled after the very best traditions. In her rendering of Berlioz's song, "The Captive," she displayed an excellent cantabile as well as finesse, and though her style was not sufficiently impassioned and sympathetic, her singing in every other respect left nothing to be desired. One of the most enjoyable performances of the evening was that of Schubert's unfinished symphony in B-minor. It is a well known symphony upon which the beautiful yet singular individuality of the composer is most markedly impressed; it being likewise full of those "heavenly lengths" about which Schumann was wont to go into raptures, a feeling which was evidently shared by the present audience, whose plaudits after each movement testified to the maturity of their musical appreciation. Another welcome number of the concert was the Dance of the Apprentices, the Procession, and the Homage to Hans Sachs, from Wagner's "Master Singers." There is much characteristic writing in the score of the work, and at the same time there are but few of the inequalities, and none of that tendency to diffuseness of treatment which are observable in most of Wagner's music. There was the slight aggravation resulting from a concert performance of operatic music, but at no time did it entail dullness and weariness; and the orchestra contributed a liberal share of artistic and effective work. The concert concluded with some light and pleasing ballet music by Delibes, which had, however, nothing more than the ear-tickling tune element to commend it. It were hypercritical to find the slightest fault with Mr. Henschel's conducting at this concert, for it was exceptionally accurate and artistic.

At the concert this evening, Beethoven's eighth symphony and his Leonore overture, No. 1, will be performed, and Massenet's overture to "Phedre." Miss How will repeat the Rhapsody by Brahms, and Mr. Alfred de Séve will perform Mendelssohn's concerto in E-minor for the violin. Home Journal

FEBRUARY 20.—“What makes the lamb love Mary so?”
 The children all d d cry!
 “Oh! Mary loves the lamb, you know,”
 The teacher did reply.

For Mary, read Henschel; for the lamb, read Boston Symphony Orchestra, and you have a tolerably correct picture. The musicians are very fond of their leader, and thoroughly dislike the naughty critics, when they find fault with him. This makes criticism in Boston very lively, and gives a degree of excitement to the writing of reviews, which prevents the critic from suffering from ennui. This fermentation occasions a mild surprise in London, where the Musical World blandly remarks: “Henschel is still in vogue in Boston.” The expression, “in vogue,” does not express it by any means. He is a creed—devoutly accepted by some; scornfully rejected by others. The last concert, February 18th, occurred on the occasion of his birthday (he was thirty-two years old), and was not celebrated, as those of Mozart and Beethoven had been, by a series of compositions from the pen of the maestro; but the orchestra, nevertheless, observed the occasion by presenting him with a silver salad set, after the conclusion of the symphony. It was a fitting recognition, and one which we were glad to see made in public. Those who carp at its publicity should remember the many tokens which Mr. Zerrahn has received under similar circumstances. I, for one, am glad to recognize the great merit and services of this conductor. He has done more for Boston's music than any other man has accomplished in the same space of time. I earnestly hope he may stay to reap the result of the harvest he has sown. And as the blind, unreasoning flattery of his too enthusiastic admirers fades out, the antagonism which it awakes in the critics will also die away, and the real worth of the great musician stand more firm than ever.

Spite of the enthusiasm of the audience at the concert Saturday night, the occasion was by no means flawless.

The Symphony (Beethoven's 8th), in its second and last movements, had more than a few touches of coarseness, and both the brass, and the contrabassi and 'celli, gave their work without steadiness or good shading. I must except the trio of the “Minuet,” in which the horns did very well. The first movement of the work was exceedingly well done; the two themes, the first with full orchestra, and the second with violins, being well enunciated, and the effective ritenuti of the latter showing how well the orchestra is under control. The violin embellishments to the wood-wind phrases, were given with much delicacy, and the quaint cadence on the first theme was neatly rendered. The chief fault seemed to be a lack of lightness in the ballet-like theme of the second movement.

Massenet's “Overture to Phedre” was a broad, richly-scored work, in which sad themes and heavy march rhythms are alternated in strong contrast.

Clarinet and oboe have some tender and pathetic passages, and the work is in the modern school, although it is not as vague as many French orchestral works of later days are. Brahms' “Rhapsody” was repeated, and became clearer and more beautiful on a second hearing. It was better performed, too, and Miss Mary H. How made an artistic though not a popular success in the complex work.

The popular success of the concert was won by Mr. Alfred de Seve, the violinist, who gave Mendelssohn's rather stale Concerto in a most brilliant and fiery manner. His tones were very pure, and, spite of the rapidity of his pace, his cadenzas and runs were never blurred. The Andante was given very effectively, although an overuse of portamento was visible. M. de Seve is a virtuoso who sometimes takes liberties with tempi, and sometimes “runs away” in the style of Joseffy.

This made the final movement of the concert a very interesting one. The instruments started off together, but it was soon apparent that the soloist was gaining—conductor wildly waving and whipping up the orchestra—trom bone seven bars behind—noble spurt of the strings—they catch up with the soloist, and for a moment it is neck and neck—a blanket would have covered them both—oboe, in making a sudden turn, slips and falls—soloist, amid the confusion, shoots three bars ahead—clarinet falls down in a fit—De Seve is now the favorite against the field—contrabasses make a hurdle race of it, and skip bar after bar—Mr. Dwight offers ten to one on De Seve—this is at once taken by Messrs. Lane, Parker, and others—the horns, in turning the quarter post, “break” badly, and are distanced—home stretch—rapid “runs”—wind instruments out of wind—conductor's arm out of joint trying to hold De Seve in—and the latter wins by several lengths, the strings coming in second, all save the double basses, which have not yet come in. Seriously speaking, it is wonderful that the orchestra could keep up at all, and it is strange how wrought up the public became at the dash and rapidity of the movement. M. de Seve received an enthusiastic ovation at its close.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHER, Conductor.

XVII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 18TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Leonore.) No. 1, op. 138. . . . BEETHOVEN.

RHAPSODY FOR CONTRALTO, MALE CHORUS
 AND ORCHESTRA, op. 53. . . . BRAHMS.

SYMPHONY in F. No. 8, op. 93. . . . BEETHOVEN.

Allegro vivace e con brio.—Allegretto scherzando.—
 Tempo di Menuetto.—Allegro vivace.—

CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN in E-minor. Op. 64. MENDELSSOHN.

Allegro molto appassionato. Andante.
 Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace.—

OVERTURE. (Phedre.) [First time.] . . . MASSENET.

SOLOISTS:

MISS MARY H. HOW,

MR. ALFRED DE SÈVE.

RHAPSODY.

BRAHMS.

Aber abseits. wer ist's?
 In's Gebüsch verliert sich sein Pfad.
 Hinter ihm schlagen die Sträucher
 zusammen,
 Das Gras steht wieder auf,
 Die Oede verschlingt ihn.
 Ach wer heilet die Schmerzen
 Dess, dem Balsam zu Gift ward.
 Der sich Menschenhass
 Aus der Fülle der Liebe trank?
 Erst verachtet, dann ein Verächter,

Zehrt er heimlich auf seinen eignen
 Wert

In ung'nügender Selbstsucht.
 Ist auf deinem Psalter.
 Vater der Liebe,
 Ein Ton, seinem Ohre vernehmlich.

O, so erquicke sein Herz!
 Oeffne den umwölkten Blick
 Ueber die tausend Quellen
 Neben dem Durstenden in der Wüste!

(Aus Goethe's "Harzreise im Winter.")

But who goes there apart?
 In the brake his pathway is lost,
 Close behind clash the branches together,
 The grass rises again,
 The desert engulfs him.
 Who can comfort his anguish,
 Who, if balsam be deathly?
 If the hate of men
 From the fulness of love be drained?
 He that was scorned, turned to a scorner,

Lonely now devours all he hath of worth

In a barren self-seeking.
 But if from thy Psalter,
 All loving Father,
 One strain can but come to his hearing,

Oh, enlighten his heart,
 Lift up his o'erclouded eyes
 Where are the thousand fountains
 Hard by the thirsty one in the desert.

(From Goethe's "Winter Journey in the Hartz-Mountains." Translated by R. H. Benson.)

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Manfred.) Op. 115. . . . SCHUMANN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in C-minor. . . SAINT-SAËNS.
 No. 4, op. 44.

Allegro moderato. Andante.—Allegro vivace. Andante. Allegro.—

SYMPHONY in D. No. 2, op. 73. . . . BRAHMS.

Allegro non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.—
 Allegretto grazioso. (Quasi Andantino.) Presto ma non assai. Tempo primo.—
 Allegro con spirito.—

CHACONNE ET RIGODON. (Aline.) . . . MONSIGNY.

OVERTURE. (Leonore.) No. 2, op. 72. . . . BEETHOVEN.

SOLOIST:

MME. MADELINE SCHILLER.

gdw =
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, given on Saturday evening last, was an uneven and unequal performance,—so much so that we must pronounce it to have been, upon the whole, the least satisfactory of the series. Nor do we think that we herein speak only our own opinion; for the audience, usually so unreserved in approbation, found only one number sufficiently stimulant to arouse enthusiastic applause.

Of all Beethoven's symphonies none is so bright and free as the eighth, none whose themes appeal more directly to natural and to cultivated tastes, none which ought of itself to win from leader and players a more vital and beautiful rendering. The other symphonies have movements as true, as touching and as vivid; but in none is there so continuous a flow of clear and yet strong thought, of fanciful and yet chastened expression. We were both surprised and saddened to hear this lovely work so badly read; we had confidently expected something much better, especially when we remembered how well Mr. Henschel carried through the Schubert movements at the previous concert, and it was a great disappointment to have a rendering little, if any, better than the same conductor's misstatement of the "Eroica." With all Mr. Henschel's talents and his scholarship, he certainly falls far short of an understanding of Beethoven—if we may judge fairly his understanding by his delivery, which is not always—more's the pity!—a perfect test. For many of whom it cannot justly be said, that they "see the right, but still the wrong pursue," yet fail to find the true entente cordiale between their insight and purpose and their expressive act. But to return: the opening allegro, which is almost comic in its turn of phrase and its piquant responses, which we might almost call repartees, was dull and dry, and the life and lightness of it, when for a little they began to shine, were quenched by some relaxation of time or spirit. The second movement, the allegretto scherzando—than which no part of any Beethoven symphony can be better known and none a greater favorite—was read cleanly and honestly, but without an atom of sparkle or inspiration; it would have been capital for a sentimental serenade, but as touching the climax of airy pleasure in this all-buoyant symphony, it was only too remote from truth or probability. The other movements—tempo di minuetto and allegro vivace—were not without good points, of course; so decided a leader and so obedient a band could not go altogether wrong. In the third movement, which was generally hard and unelastic, the horns were exceedingly pure and good, but the other brass was often snappy and thick in tone. The last movement, taken up at its inception in almost precisely the time in which the third finished, gradually achieved—and sometimes overpassed—a more consistent pace, and was well sustained by the orchestra, who, nevertheless, having often to choose between correct reading of their notes and nicety of expression, decided in favor of the former, and gave a good deal of powerful, but rough, playing.

The overtures, which were Beethoven's "Leonora" number one and Massenet's "Phédre," were given with marked ability. It will be remembered that this "Leonora," when played before a few connoisseurs at Prince Lichnowsky's, was rejected as being inadequate to introduce that grand drama "Fidelio," and was only brought forward after Beethoven's death. The opening movement, with its searching, aspiring melody, resting at first upon the solitary note in the bass, and the adagio ma non troppo, grave and fervent, like a noble hymn, were admirably given; but the allegro passages struck us as rather forced—as though the conductor were trying by dint of might and speed to give them the potency and expressiveness which their author and his contemporaries knew they lacked. It was, we thought, a sort of putting of new wine into old bottles, whose texture, though not rifted, was sorely strained. Massenet's overture, with which the concert ended, is indeed a Phédre, but not a Phædra. It is melodramatic and "intense" to the last degree. It begins with gloomy, clanging chords, and wild-harsh unisons, out of which soon evolves itself a melancholy minor melody for the clarinet, rather staggily emphasized by an occasional tap upon the kettle-drums. The first thought then returns with redoubled force, rising in high and turbulent language; then the movement quickens to a sharp allegro, whose musical character may be not unfairly indicated as a hoarse murmuring, interspersed with shrieks; upon this comes most agreeably a moment of relief, while a sad, slow bit of melody issues from the clarinet and the violoncelli, and then the whole thing comes to a furious end in shrill outcries, ponderous clashing and roaring, raving basses. M. Massenet has indubitably provided a deal of new sensation in this composition, which would suit a melodrama to a dot, but which is as far away from the spirit of the dreadful Grecian tragedy than is France from Greece, and which few in the audience would ask to hear again, even though played with the vivid coloring of the symphony orchestra.

For solo music there was a repetition of the Brahms' "Rhapsody," which it was well to hear a second time, although the new presentation differed in no special sense from the first. The plan of the author was more apparent and could be followed more closely through its intricacies of fantasy in setting. Miss How sang with the same clear coolness of style and tone as before, and made again a favorable impression, which might have been much strengthened—could she have given a fervid feeling to the devotional petition of the last few lines; and to this it would seem as though the full, sustaining quality of the male chorus might have encouraged her. The only great applause of the evening was for Mr. Alfred de Sève, who came from his modest place in the orchestra to play that great E minor violin concerto of Mendelssohn, — and this applause was rather excited by the nervous and irrepressible enthusiasm of the player than by the intrinsic qualities of his playing. The work itself needs no recalling, we are sure, to the minds of our readers, who must have heard it from many hands, and loved and admired it from their first hearing. Had it all been like its first movement, molto appassionato, Mr. De Sève's performance might have passed unchallenged. But the fierce energy and tremendous elan with which he dashed into and through all parts but the andante made sad havoc with Mendelssohn's tenderer thoughts and fragile fancies of phrasing. It seemed at times as though even the player's remarkable control of technique would be unequal to the demands he was making upon it, and in the last allegro one might have been excused for thinking that he was playing Liszt or Paganini. The andante was satisfactorily performed, however, its close being unexceptionably clear and fine, and much of Mr. De Sève's work, regarded as a mere exhibition of what he can do, was highly commendable. He may yet make a violinist of the first rank, if he will be sufficiently severe with himself and subordinate his talents and means to art. The orchestra kept up very well with the soloist, who fairly dominated them and their leader too, who was quite put upon his mettle to follow with his baton the rushing sweep of the player's tempi; the obbligati in the andante were especially creditable.

A pleasant feature of the evening was the informal presentation to Mr. Henschel, on the occasion of his birthday and on behalf of the orchestra, of some silver plate. A "floral tribute" was also sent up by some personal friends.

At the next concert Brahms' second symphony will be the pièce de résistance; the overtures will be Schumann's "Manfred" and Beethoven's "Leonora," number two, and a Chaconne and Rigodon from Monsigny's "Aline" will be added. Saint Saëns' fourth piano-forte concerto will be played by Madame Schiller, who will be more fortunate, we hope, in the choice of an instrument than she was at the last Harvard concert.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert last night began with the Leonore Overture (No. 1), by Beethoven, which will be followed by both the others, probably, in the succeeding concerts. It was well played, and the strings gave out their strong theme with steadiness and good shading. The Brahms Rhapsody was repeated, and seemed more beautiful on a second hearing and was excellently performed and sung. The quaint and humorous Eighth Symphony of Beethoven was not entirely even, but its merits far outweighed its defects. The first and second themes of the first movement were most delicately given, but the second and last movements were less beautiful, the brass and the deeper strings being coarse and too prominent. The minuet was well rendered, even the horn theme of the Trio being smooth and steady. Massenet's overture to Phédre was broadly and nobly given. It is alternately majestic and mournful, and deals in Wagnerian themes, which are however not indefinitely treated. The well-worn Mendelssohn violin concerto was played by M. de Sève in a manner that created a popular furore. The tones were always pure and the passages, however rapid, were free from blur. The two faults of the performance were a too free use of portamento, and a hurrying of time in the last movement, which made it almost impossible for the orchestra to follow the soloist. That they did so without a serious break, is to their credit and that of Mr. Henschel. The entente cordiale which exists between this conductor and his men was happily illustrated at this concert, by the presentation of a fine piece of plate to Mr. Henschel by the orchestra, in honor of his birthday. Madame Schiller is to be the next soloist, and Saint Saëns' piano concerto in C minor, is to be played as well as Brahms' second symphony and other interesting works.

Conver

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Transcript
Boston Symphony Orchestra. The seventeenth concert, on Saturday evening, began with Beethoven's overture to "Leonore," commonly known as No. 1. Some discussion has arisen lately as to the true chronological order of the three "Leonore" overtures in C. Not many years ago it was generally understood to have been discovered that the overture known as "No. 1" was really composed after those known as Nos. 2 and 3. Upon what ground the genuineness of this discovery is now doubted by some of our resident musicians we do not know; the historical evidence that Beethoven wrote the (so-called) "No. 1" for the performance of the opera in Prag, because the Prag orchestra found Nos. 2 and 3 too long and difficult, is very strong. If these doubts are based upon internal evidence merely—and it is alleged that Beethoven could hardly have written the comparatively light No. 1 after the grander and more dramatic No. 3—it may safely be answered that such a proceeding on Beethoven's part is not even improbable, for he is known to have written the still lighter "Fidelio" overture (No. 4, in E) after all the others. Brahms' beautiful Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra (with Miss Mary H. How singing the solo) was repeated, and made an even deeper impression than at its first hearing. Beethoven's eighth symphony came next, and was excellently played. Mr. Henschel's tempo, in the Allegretto scherzando, a movement which is usually taken too fast, struck us as admirable. Would only that he could have made the orchestra really feel the tempo as he did; for, although they followed his beat well enough, one could not help feeling that they were aching to play a little faster all the while.

In the course of the evening there occurred a pleasant surprise for Mr. Henschel, in the presentation by Mr. Strasser, on behalf of his fellow players, of a silver salad service. Friday being Mr. Henschel's birthday, the moving cause of this testimonial of regard may be guessed at. Some personal friends of Mr. Henschel also showed their interest in the occasion by the presentation of flowers.

Of Mr. De Sève's playing of the Mendelssohn violin concerto one is forced to speak in terms of mingled admiration and abhorrence. There were absolutely and overwhelmingly superb moments in it; notably in the more fiery passages; a wonderful warmth and genuineness of sentiment pervaded the whole performance; we have rarely heard anything more dazzlingly brilliant than Mr. De Sève's playing of the last twenty measures or so of the finale. The performance was electric, in a word. But, on the other hand, it must be owned that the tempo of the first movement was unconscionably rapid, while the Rondo was pushed to a breakneck pace which made it a sheer scurry and scramble, and the Andante was so bedevilled with accelerandos and ritardandos as hardly to be recognizable as a composition by Mendelssohn. To use a common expression, the performance did more honor to the player's heart than to his head. The concert closed with Massenet's overture to "Phèdre," a marvellously effective work, full of beautiful and vigorous dramatic touches, and astoundingly finely scored, albeit the thematic development in it is not discoverable at a single hearing, if indeed there be any theme at all.

At the next concert the programme will be—

Overture to "Manfred," op. 115.....Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte in C minor.....Saint-Saëns
No. 4, op. 44.
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms
Chaconne et Rigodon, from "Aline".....Monsigny
Overture. (Leonore.) No. 2, op. 72.....Beethoven
Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the pianist.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Overture, "Leonore," No. 1, op. 138, Beethoven; Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53, Brahms; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven; Concerto for violin in E-minor, op. 64, Mendelssohn; Overture, "Phèdre," first time, Massenet. The overture was in general well played by the orchestra, although the rapidity with which the time was taken forced it to commit some faults of incompleteness and roughness in intricate parts. The symphony was beautifully performed so far as the first two numbers were concerned, but the minuet and finale received a very coarse and unsatisfactory interpretation. The first and second halves of the composition did not hang together at all under this treatment, and the work, as a whole, quite failed to receive the justice due to its delightful character. This fault was the more marked from the fact that this symphony is one of the easiest of description in the list of Beethoven's works of this class. The Massenet overture was shown to be a showy but inexpressive work, and to have little that is valuable in it. Miss Mary H. How was again heard in the Brahms rhapsody, and confirmed the favorable impression she made at the previous concert. The work also shows a deeper value on rehearing, and is undoubtedly a composition of deep feeling and unusual beauty and power. The violin concerto was played by Mr. Alfred De Seve, who produced a decided impression by his performance. His effort was, in general, to be strongly commended, for, barring a rapidity of playing in the first and third measures, which caused the accompaniment of the orchestra to degenerate into an anxious scramble to keep up with him, he gave an excellent interpretation of the melodious and difficult work and showed himself to be an artist of unusual power. There was, perhaps, an evidence of an excessive fondness for technical skill for its own sake, and too marked an expression of self-appreciation on the part of the performer, but for all that he gave a performance which had many unusually good features. During the evening a handsome piece of plate and a rich bouquet of flowers were presented to Mr. Henschel, the conductor, in honor of his birthday. There were no speeches and Mr. Henschel received the gift with evident surprise and pleasure.

The next concert will offer the following programme: Overture, "Manfred," op. 115, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in C minor, No. 4, op. 44, Saint Saëns; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; Chaconne et Rigodon, "Aline," Monsigny; overture, "Leonore," No. 2, op. 72, Beethoven. Madame Madeline Schiller will be the soloist on this occasion.

Journal

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was largely attended at Music Hall last night. The orchestral works were Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 1; his Symphony in F, No. 8, and an overture to "Phèdre," by Massenet, which was given for the first time here. The "Leonore" overture was subjected to the rapid tempo which Mr. Henschel would seem to deem essential whenever he has a Beethoven allegro to conduct. There were many rough places in the performance, and there was not that unity and precision to be desired among the strings. The view Mr. Henschel took of the symphony was as strange and as unappreciative of the true character of the work as have been his readings of the other seven symphonies. All of the movements were hurried. The dainty andante was deprived of its delicate sprightliness by the coarse playing of the basses, and the lovely minuet was, comparatively speaking, roared through rather than sung and its force and dignity destroyed. The finale was noisy and expressionless, and the over-animated beating of the conductor carried his orchestra away into roughness of playing, particularly among the strings. The interpretation of this finale was among the worst examples of bad taste among the many others that Mr. Henschel has shown in connection with his readings of Beethoven. In so plain-sailing a symphony, which tells its own story in so clear a manner, we cannot conceive how it is possible to blunder into such a rendering as was instigated on this occasion. Miss Mary H. How was again heard in the Brahms Rhapsody in which she sang last week. The work improved on a second hearing, and the singer enhanced even the fine impression she created on her debut. Mr. Alfred De Seve also appeared as soloist, and performed Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. It was a very remarkable effort in many respects, but in none more than the impetuous manner in which the artist hurried through it. If he had been running a race with the orchestra to see which should reach the goal first, he could not have bestirred himself more. It was as much as the players could do to follow him, and he placed the conductor in almost as bad a plight. The many admirable moments that Mr. De Seve vouchsafed were neutralized by the wild and senseless rapidity and the mere virtuoso spirit that marked the rest of his work. Fortunately, it was soon over. It is but fair to add that the appreciative public went into raptures over the performance. They liked it, at least. The Massenet overture ended the concert. It is a brilliant, but noisy and rather uninteresting work, and of but little musical value. A pleasing feature of the evening was the presentation of a handsome piece of plate to Mr. Henschel by the orchestra, in honor of his birthday. There was no speech-making, but the gift was presented modestly, and as modestly received, Mr. Henschel having been manifestly taken by surprise. At the next concert, Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the soloist, and will perform Saint-Saëns's Fourth Concerto for piano.

Saxton

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Seventeenth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 17th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloists being Miss Mary H. How, contralto, and Mr. Alfred De Seve, violinist. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 1, op. 138.....Beethoven
Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53.....Brahms
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven
Concerto for violin in E minor, op. 64.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "Phèdre".....Massenet

The repetition of the Brahms "Rhapsody" gave an opportunity for a more intelligent understanding of the composition, as its interpretation by the soloist, chorus and orchestra was far more perfect than that given the previous week. Miss How's work was particularly pleasing, and the very slight interest caused by this number was largely due to her careful and intelligent singing of the contralto rôle. The Mendelssohn concerto is a severe test for a violinist of Mr. De Seve's abilities, but the audience gave evidence of a very keen appreciation of his interpretation of this composition. His playing in the "andante" movement deserved all the commendation given by his listeners, but in the more brilliant "allegro" and the concluding movements he failed to meet the demands of the work with equal success. His style has a certain brilliancy and dash, but it lacks the finish and character which will unquestionably come with more extended study and experience, as Mr. De Seve has all the talent necessary for success if it is properly cultivated. The "Phèdre" overture was heard for the first time, and proved to be a very brilliant and taking composition, though so strongly resembling the modern German school as to pass for the work of Richard Wagner. The symphony was well played, particularly in the first two movements, but lack of space prevents any more extended comment. A pleasant event of the evening, and one showing the kindly feeling between Mr. Henschel and his musicians, was the presentation from the members of the orchestra to their conductor of an elegant solid silver salad set, suitably inscribed, upon the occasion of his birthday. An elegant floral tribute was also presented Mr. Henschel by some other friend or friends, both gifts being bestowed in an informal way as he took his place to lead the symphony performance.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The seventeenth Boston Symphony orchestra concert took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening last. The overture to Leonore, No. 1, op. 138, opened the concert, it being one of the four overtures that Beethoven wrote to his opera Fidelio. No. 1 was discarded by the composer after private trial without having been associated with the performance of the opera, which was produced in 1805, with the overture now called No. 2.—This piece has but one point of analogy with that which it superseded—the introduction of the adagio movement of Florastina's scena in the opera. The discarded overture is a fine dramatic prelude, full of dignity, expression and passion; and it would have been thought not unworthy of the opera had it had no successors. No. 2, however, as far transcends No. 1 as it is surpassed by No. 3. The third overture is deservedly the most popular of the series of four, it being wrought out with such increased vigor, such sublimity, beauty and amplitude as leave all other dramatic overtures far behind. Only one more of Beethoven's symphonies remains to be given at the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. At this concert the eighth symphony (in F) was given;—that fine work which the composer has unaccountably described as his "little symphony" (kleine symphonie). It is not so uniformly grandiose nor so elaborately developed, as that which immediately preceded, still less so than that which followed it; but it is full of power and elevated sentiment in juxtaposition with its pervading flow of exquisite melodiousness. About all that can be said in favor of the execution of the work is that the notes were correctly played; but mere correctness of execution will no more realize the spirit of a Beethoven symphony than mere verbal accuracy will suffice in the utterance of the sublime poetry of Milton or Shakespeare, the difficulty being even greater in the former than in the latter case, as involving consentaneous expression by many interpreters. There was not noticeable the perfect fusion of effect, precision, delicacy and light and shade effects which one has a right to demand in the rendering of any one of the grandest series of tone-pictures ever produced by musical poet, the symphonies of Beethoven. A repetition of the Brahms rhapsody and chorus for contralto, male chorus and orchestra was a very welcome feature of this concert. The work was better understood, and certainly more admired as the result of a second performance. Miss How, who again interpreted the solo part, sung with much feeling and judgment, and the delightful quality of her voice called forth many well merited plaudits. Another soloist at this concert was Mr. Alfred De Seve. If Mr. De Seve by his brilliant and in many respects pretentious performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto, simply intended to excite the awe of the public he could not have succeeded better. The command he displayed of the instrument and his virtuosity were of a most alluring and brilliant type. And here all praise must cease. The opening movement of the concerto was hurried to an inordinate degree, and he rendered the quiet, poetic and tranquil music of the andante in an excessively impassioned and rhapsodical style. In the final allegro molto vivace the erratic tendencies of the performer were even more conspicuous, and Mr. Henschel and his orchestra seemed sorely tried in their attempts to afford the capricious yet talented soloist anything like a suitable accompaniment. The concert concluded with a performance of the Phèdre overture by Massenet, a highly effective, rigorous and well-scored work.

At the concert this evening, the programme will be as follows: Overture (Manfred), Schumann; Concerto for pianoforte in C-minor, Saint-Saëns; Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; Chaconne et Rigodon, Monsigny; and Beethoven's Leonore overture, No. 2, op. 72. Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the soloist.

more honor to the player's heart than to his head. The concert closed with Massenet's overture to "Phèdre," a marvellously effective work, full of beautiful and vigorous dramatic touches, and astoundingly finely scored, albeit the thematic development in it is not discoverable at a single hearing, if indeed there be any theme at all.

At the next concert the programme will be—
Overture to "Manfred," op. 115.....Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte in C minor.....Saint-Saëns
No. 4, op. 44.
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms
Chaconne et Rigodon, from "Aline".....Monsigny
Overture. (Leonore.) No. 2, op. 72.....Beethoven
Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the pianist.

Seventeenth Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Overture, "Leonore," No. 1, op. 138, Beethoven; Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53, Brahms; Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93, Beethoven; Concerto for violin in E-minor, op. 64, Mendelssohn; Overture, "Phèdre," first time, Massenet. The overture was in general well played by the orchestra, although the rapidity with which the time was taken forced it to commit some faults of incompleteness and roughness in intricate parts. The symphony was beautifully performed so far as the first two numbers were concerned, but the minuet and finale received a very coarse and unsatisfactory interpretation. The first and second halves of the composition did not hang together at all under this treatment, and the work, as a whole, quite failed to receive the justice due to its delightful character. This fault was the more marked from the fact that this symphony is one of the easiest of description in the list of Beethoven's works of this class. The Massenet overture was shown to be a showy but inexpressive work, and to have little that is valuable in it. Miss Mary H. How was again heard in the Brahms rhapsody, and confirmed the favorable impression she made at the previous concert. The work also shows a deeper value on rehearing, and is undoubtedly a composition of deep feeling and unusual beauty and power. The violin concerto was played by Mr. Alfred De Seve, who produced a decided impression by his performance. His effort was, in general, to be strongly commended, for, barring a rapidity of playing in the first and third measures, which caused the accompaniment of the orchestra to degenerate into an anxious scramble to keep up with him, he gave an excellent interpretation of the melodious and difficult work and showed himself to be an artist of unusual power. There was, perhaps, an evidence of an excessive fondness for technical skill for its own sake, and too marked an expression of self-appreciation on the part of the performer, but for all that he gave a performance which had many unusually good features. During the evening a handsome piece of plate and a rich bouquet of flowers were presented to Mr. Henschel, the conductor, in honor of his birthday. There were no speeches and Mr. Henschel received the gift with evident surprise and pleasure.

The next concert will offer the following programme: Overture, "Manfred," op. 115, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in C minor, No. 4, op. 44, Saint Saëns; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; Chaconne et Rigodon, "Aline," Monsigny; overture, "Leonore," No. 2, op. 72, Beethoven. Madame Madeline Schiller will be the soloist on this occasion.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventeenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was largely attended at Music Hall last night. The orchestral works were Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 1; his Symphony in F, No. 8, and an overture to "Phèdre," by Massenet, which was given for the first time here. The "Leonore" overture was subjected to the rapid tempo which Mr. Henschel would seem to deem essential whenever he has a Beethoven allegro to conduct. There were many rough places in the performance, and there was not that unity and precision to be desired among the strings. The view Mr. Henschel took of the symphony was as strange and as unappreciative of the true character of the work as have been his readings of the other seven symphonies. All of the movements were hurried. The dainty andante was deprived of its delicate sprightliness by the coarse playing of the basses, and the lovely minuet was, comparatively speaking, roared through rather than sung and its force and dignity destroyed. The finale was noisy and expressionless, and the over-animated beating of the conductor carried his orchestra away into roughness of playing, particularly among the strings. The interpretation of this finale was among the worst examples of bad taste among the many others that Mr. Henschel has shown in connection with his readings of Beethoven. In so plain-sailing a symphony, which tells its own story in so clear a manner, we cannot conceive how it is possible to blunder into such a rendering as was instigated on this occasion. Miss Mary H. How was again heard in the Brahms Rhapsody in which she sang last week. The work improved on a second hearing, and the singer enhanced even the fine impression she created on her debut. Mr. Alfred De Seve also appeared as soloist, and performed Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto. It was a very remarkable effort in many respects, but in none more than the impetuous manner in which the artist hurried through it. If he had been running a race with the orchestra to see which should reach the goal first, he could not have bestirred himself more. It was as much as the players could do to follow him, and he placed the conductor in almost as bad a plight. The many admirable moments that Mr. De Seve vouchsafed were neutralized by the wild and senseless rapidity and the mere virtuoso spirit that marked the rest of his work. Fortunately, it was soon over. It is but fair to add that the appreciative public went into raptures over the performance. They liked it, at least. The Massenet overture ended the concert. It is a brilliant, but noisy and rather uninteresting work, and of but little musical value. A pleasing feature of the evening was the presentation of a handsome piece of plate to Mr. Henschel by the orchestra, in honor of his birthday. There was no speech-making, but the gift was presented modestly, and as modestly received, Mr. Henschel having been manifestly taken by surprise. At the next concert, Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the soloist, and will perform Saint-Saëns's Fourth Concerto for piano.

Saxton

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Seventeenth Concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 17th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloists being Miss Mary H. How, contralto, and Mr. Alfred De Seve, violinist. The programme was as follows:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 1, op. 138.....Beethoven
Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53.....Brahms
Symphony in F, No. 8, op. 93.....Beethoven
Concerto for violin in E minor, op. 64.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "Phèdre".....Massenet

The repetition of the Brahms "Rhapsody" gave an opportunity for a more intelligent understanding of the composition, as its interpretation by the soloist, chorus and orchestra was far more perfect than that given the previous week. Miss How's work was particularly pleasing, and the very slight interest caused by this number was largely due to her careful and intelligent singing of the contralto rôle. The Mendelssohn concerto is a severe test for a violinist of Mr. De Seve's abilities, but the audience gave evidence of a very keen appreciation of his interpretation of this composition. His playing in the "andante" movement deserved all the commendation given by his listeners, but in the more brilliant "allegro" and the concluding movements he failed to meet the demands of the work with equal success. His style has a certain brilliancy and dash, but it lacks the finish and character which will unquestionably come with more extended study and experience, as Mr. De Seve has all the talent necessary for success if it is properly cultivated. The "Phèdre" overture was heard for the first time, and proved to be a very brilliant and taking composition, though so strongly resembling the modern German school as to pass for the work of Richard Wagner. The symphony was well played, particularly in the first two movements, but lack of space prevents any more extended comment. A pleasant event of the evening, and one showing the kindly feeling between Mr. Henschel and his musicians, was the presentation from the members of the orchestra to their conductor of an elegant solid silver salad set, suitably inscribed, upon the occasion of his birthday. An elegant floral tribute was also presented Mr. Henschel by some other friend or friends, both gifts being bestowed in an informal way as he took his place to lead the symphony performance.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The seventeenth Boston Symphony orchestra concert took place in Music Hall on Saturday evening last. The overture to Leonore, No. 1, op. 138, opened the concert, it being one of the four overtures that Beethoven wrote to his opera Fidelio. No. 1 was discarded by the composer after private trial without having been associated with the performance of the opera, which was produced in 1805, with the overture now called No. 2.—This piece has but one point of analogy with that which it superseded—the introduction of the adagio movement of Florestina's scena in the opera. The discarded overture is a fine dramatic prelude, full of dignity, expression and passion; and it would have been thought not unworthy of the opera had it had no successors. No. 2, however, as far transcends No. 1 as it is surpassed by No. 3. The third overture is deservedly the most popular of the series of four, it being wrought out with such increased vigor, such sublimity, beauty and amplitude as leave all other dramatic overtures far behind. Only one more of Beethoven's symphonies remains to be given at the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra. At this concert the eighth symphony (in F) was given;—that fine work which the composer has unaccountably described as his "little symphony" (kleine symphonie). It is not so uniformly grandiose nor so elaborately developed, as that which immediately preceded, still less so than that which followed it; but it is full of power and elevated sentiment in juxtaposition with its pervading flow of exquisite melodiousness. About all that can be said in favor of the execution of the work is that the notes were correctly played; but mere correctness of execution will no more realize the spirit of a Beethoven symphony than mere verbal accuracy will suffice in the utterance of the sublime poetry of Milton or Shakespeare, the difficulty being even greater in the former than in the latter case, as involving simultaneous expression by many interpreters. There was not noticeable the perfect fusion of effect, precision, delicacy and light and shade effects which one has a right to demand in the rendering of any one of the grandest series of tone-pictures ever produced by musical poet, the symphonies of Beethoven. A repetition of the Brahms rhapsody and chorus for contralto, male chorus and orchestra was a very welcome feature of this concert. The work was better understood, and certainly more admired as the result of a second performance. Miss How, who again interpreted the solo part, sung with much feeling and judgment, and the delightful quality of her voice called forth many well merited plaudits. Another soloist at this concert was Mr. Alfred De Seve. If Mr. De Seve by his brilliant and in many respects pretentious performance of Mendelssohn's violin concerto, simply intended to excite the awe of the public he could not have succeeded better. The command he displayed of the instrument and his virtuosity were of a most alluring and brilliant type. And here all praise must cease. The opening movement of the concerto was hurried to an inordinate degree, and he rendered the quiet, poetic and tranquil music of the andante in an excessively impassioned and rhapsodical style. In the final allegro molto vivace the erratic tendencies of the performer were even more conspicuous, and Mr. Henschel and his orchestra seemed sorely tried in their attempts to afford the capricious yet talented soloist anything like a suitable accompaniment. The concert concluded with a performance of the Phèdre overture by Massenet, a highly effective, rigorous and well-scored work.

At the concert this evening, the programme will be as follows: Overture (Manfred), Schumann; Concerto for pianoforte in C-minor, Saint-Saëns; Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; Chaconne et Rigodon, Monsigny; and Beethoven's Leonore overture, No. 2, op. 72. Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the soloist.

Boston Symphony Concert.

As Mr. George Henschel stepped to his place to assume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music hall on Saturday evening, he was pleasantly surprised by the presentation from the members of the orchestra of a solid silver salad set, with appropriate inscription; also an elaborate floral tribute by other friends, both tributes of love and esteem on the occasion of Mr. Henschel's birthday. The opening number on the programme of the evening was Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 1, which was not performed with the smoothness or precision that should have characterized the work of the orchestra. The rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, by Brahms, was again given, and, as we predicted would be the case, much more acceptably than on the occasion of the first rendering. Miss How scored a grand success, and was even more enthusiastically received than on Saturday last. The orchestra and chorus also improved decidedly upon their last performance. The symphony in F, by Mendelssohn, was fairly played as a whole, although all of the movements were rushed, and the last was exceedingly noisy and harsh. Mr. De Seve performed Mendelssohn's concerto for violin in E minor in a remarkably brilliant and dashy style, which seemed to greatly please the majority of his auditors; it was played too rapidly, however, and lacked finish, lamentably. The closing number, the "Phedre" overture by Massenet, was performed, perhaps, as well as it could be. At the eighteenth concert, Saturday evening next, Mme Schiller will be the soloist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Owing to the pressure on our columns last week, we could not speak of the seventeenth concert, which was given last Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 1, Op. 138....Beethoven
Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 53.....Brahms
Symphony in F, No. 8, Op. 53.....Beethoven
Concerto for Violin in E minor, Op. 64.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "Phedre".....Massenet

The Rhapsody, performed for the first time at the sixteenth concert, was accorded a second hearing, and its remarkable beauties were made fully apparent to the audience, who enjoyed it heartily. Miss May H. How was again notably successful in the rendition of its difficult solo part, but not until she has acquired a distinct utterance of her text may she take rank among our more eminent vocalists. The performance of the Symphony was very uneven. The third movement was almost wholly ruined by the inexcusable recklessness of the horns and the 'cellos; the concluding movement was finely given. Mr. De Seve achieved a brilliant success. There were some slight flaws in point of technique and tonal accuracy, artistic phrasing and strict rhythm, all due to his excessive ardor; but, notwithstanding, he moved his hearers to great enthusiasm. After the Symphony Mr. Henschel was surprised with a silver salad set of elegant and tasteful workmanship, the gift coming from the members of the orchestra, and the occasion being Mr. Henschel's birthday. A beautiful floral token from private friends was presented at the same time.

The programme of the concert that took place last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred." Op. 115.....Schumann
Concerto for Pianoforte in C minor. No. 4, Op. 44.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony in D. No. 2, Op. 73.....Brahms
Chaconne et Rigodon. "Aline".....Monsigny
Overture, "Leonore." No. 2, Op. 72..Beethoven
Soloist, Mme. Madeline Schiller.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Manfred.) Op. 115. . . . SCHUMANN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in C-minor. . SAINT-SAËNS.
No. 4, op. 44.

Allegro moderato. Andante.—Allegro vivace. Andante. Allegro.—

SYMPHONY in D. No. 2, op. 73. . . . BRAHMS.

Allegro non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.—
Allegretto grazioso. (Quasi Andantino.) Presto ma non assai. Tempo primo.—
Allegro con spirito.—

PIANO SOLO.

BALLAD in A flat, op. 47. . . . CHOPIN.

OVERTURE. (Leonore.) No. 2, op. 72. . . . BEETHOVEN.

SOLOIST:

MME. MADELINE SCHILLER.

MME. SCHILLER will use a STEINWAY PIANO.

Boston Symphony Concert.

As Mr. George Henschel stepped to his place to assume the conductorship of the Boston Symphony orchestra at Music hall on Saturday evening, he was pleasantly surprised by the presentation from the members of the orchestra of a solid silver salad set, with appropriate inscription; also an elaborate floral tribute by other friends, both tributes of love and esteem on the occasion of Mr. Henschel's birthday. The opening number on the programme of the evening was Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 1, which was not performed with the smoothness or precision that should have characterized the work of the orchestra. The rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, by Brahms, was again given, and, as we predicted would be the case, much more acceptably than on the occasion of the first rendering. Miss How scored a grand success, and was even more enthusiastically received than on Saturday last. The orchestra and chorus also improved decidedly upon their last performance. The symphony in F, by Mendelssohn, was fairly played as a whole, although all of the movements were rushed, and the last was exceedingly noisy and harsh. Mr. De Seve performed Mendelssohn's concerto for violin in E minor in a remarkably brilliant and dashy style, which seemed to greatly please the majority of his auditors; it was played too rapidly, however, and lacked finish, lamentably. The closing number, the "Phedre" overture by Massenet, was performed, perhaps, as well as it could be. At the eighteenth concert, Saturday evening next, Mme Schiller will be the soloist.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Owing to the pressure on our columns last week, we could not speak of the seventeenth concert, which was given last Saturday evening, with the following programme:

Overture, "Leonore," No. 1, Op. 138....Beethoven
Rhapsody for Contralto, Male Chorus and Orchestra, Op. 53.....Brahms
Symphony in F, No. 8, Op. 53.....Beethoven
Concerto for Violin in E minor, Op. 64.....Mendelssohn
Overture, "Phedre".....Massenet

The Rhapsody, performed for the first time at the sixteenth concert, was accorded a second hearing, and its remarkable beauties were made fully apparent to the audience, who enjoyed it heartily. Miss May H. How was again notably successful in the rendition of its difficult solo part, but not until she has acquired a distinct utterance of her text may she take rank among our more eminent vocalists. The performance of the Symphony was very uneven. The third movement was almost wholly ruined by the inexcusable recklessness of the horns and the 'cellos; the concluding movement was finely given. Mr. De Seve achieved a brilliant success. There were some slight flaws in point of technique and tonal accuracy, artistic phrasing and strict rhythm, all due to his excessive ardor; but, notwithstanding, he moved his hearers to great enthusiasm. After the Symphony Mr. Henschel was surprised with a silver salad set of elegant and tasteful workmanship, the gift coming from the members of the orchestra, and the occasion being Mr. Henschel's birthday. A beautiful floral token from private friends was presented at the same time.

The programme of the concert that took place last evening was as follows:

Overture, "Manfred," Op. 115.....Schumann
Concerto for Pianoforte in C minor. No. 4, Op. 44.....Saint-Saëns
Symphony in D. No. 2, Op. 73.....Brahms
Chaconne et Rigodon. "Aline".....Monsigny
Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, Op. 72..Beethoven
Soloist, Mme. Madeline Schiller.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XVIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Manfred.) Op. 115. . . . SCHUMANN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANOFORTE in C-minor. . SAINT-SAËNS.
No. 4, op. 44.

Allegro moderato. Andante.—Allegro vivace. Andante. Allegro.—

SYMPHONY in D. No. 2, op. 73. . . . BRAHMS.

Allegro non troppo.—Adagio non troppo.—
Allegretto grazioso. (Quasi Andantino.) Presto ma non assai. Tempo primo.—
Allegro con spirito.—

PIANO SOLO.

BALLAD in A flat, op. 47. . . . CHOPIN.

OVERTURE. (Leonore.) No. 2, op. 72. . . . BEETHOVEN.

SOLOIST:

MME. MADELINE SCHILLER.

MME. SCHILLER will use a STEINWAY PIANO.

Admission

We remember hearing Charles Reade say once that the Americans were yet to write the greatest of all romances and novels. When asked for the basis of his opinion, he replied that the American mind was the most ingeniously creative of all; and that, when America was no longer young and in need of pragmatic invention, her people's peculiar talent, still lively and stimulated by long exercise, would turn to literature and art, and therein lead the world. Hearing such a programme as Mr. Henschel had prepared for Saturday night's symphony concert, we could but recall Mr. Reade's words, and wonder as in turn the conductor presented to us Schumann, Saint-Saëns and Brahms, whether the metaphysical and almost mystical period through which Central Europe has been passing had not in some occult way affected the musical mind of the age. We hear such compositions as were given us then, —the "Manfred" overture, the C-minor concerto, and the second symphony, in the order of authorship which we have just named,—and we find that they present themselves to us in two ways. The one is as a sequence of strains to which we may listen thoughtlessly, and which bears us on in such sensuous satisfaction as we feel in drifting slowly down a shadowy summer stream. But the other is as a problem of thought and intention, which puzzles us until we are obliged to leave it unsolved, promising ourselves to return it some day. The best critics among us say that such music needs more study; that it appears incoherent; that the orchestra were at fault here and there; that the author's meaning is involved and tantalizing; that after another hearing a better judgment can be given, and so on through all the category of oracular remark. But may there not be something deeper than the surface and more vital than formal expression, which must be found and brought to light, before we can any of us speak confidently and with authority? May it not be that a special insight or a special training is needed to enable a director or a player to put such music before us just as its author saw it and felt in his creative mood? And that when this shall be done, all that is doubtful and confused may shine clear and give rational and abiding pleasure? For instance, in literature many a faithful student has given up much of Robert Browning as incomprehensible, only to find that Mr. Thaxter, with no elocutionary profession, can yet so read those pages that the sense seems unmistakable, and the casting of it almost the only natural one. And what can be done in music. Professor Baermann has shown us in his readings of concertos and of Liszt,—which author particularly who has not heard played with perfect integrity as to the notes, and with exact regard to every dynamic and temporal indication, while yet there was scarcely an atom of coherence or intelligibility in the whole thing? If to give this revealing interpretation be difficult and unusual when only a simple vehicle of communication—words—is chosen, how much greater must be the task when that complex instrument, the orchestra, is substituted! The thought flies for expression to a score of voices, each having its own peculiar quality to impress, and each perhaps speaking but a fragment of the thought, and that while other voices, distracting but harmonious, are speaking also. The elder writers were direct and plain-spoken, while modern resources and modern elaboration, although following the standard formulae of composition, have yet so altered its effect that in passing from Beethoven, Haydn and Mozart to the French, Germans and Russians of our own day, we seem to be entering into a new world. May we not, then, all admit, critics as well as laymen, players and conductors as well as listeners, that this dubious frame of mind is just, natural and anything but discreditable to us; that the last word in musical delivery has not yet been said, may not be said in our time; and that it behooves us to try to learn something new every day, and confess that our opinions and our readings, however firmly we may and should maintain them, are but tentative and preliminary to that better understanding and clearer statement which we anticipate and mean to work for?

We have said thus much "for the satisfaction of our thought," because in all but the "Manfred" overture, which has settled into a semi-conventional form of rendering and of explanation, there seemed to be a frequent groping on the part of everybody to make out what they ought to say and how they ought to say it; while, on the other hand, the audience were for much of their evening apparently rather under the effect of the sound upon their nerves than in one or another particular mood compelled by a recognizable and influential mood in the music. This was particularly the case in the concerto, in which the piano-forte and the band seemed often to be in strange contradiction to each other, and many passages which should have been but confirmation or support, came out with the strongest self-assertion and domination, while in the symphony the strings, in their determination to force themselves forward, were sometimes violent and coarse. The third movement of the symphony, however, with its pretty alternations of time from a quasi andantino to a tempered presto, was admirably conceived by the director and delightfully played by the orchestra with a most agreeable color of sentiment. As a whole, indeed, the orchestral work was technically good in these selections, if we pass over a moment of queer confusion in the allegro vivace of the concerto; the players were obedient and earnest, as usual, and, upon our own showing, we must not be too exacting in asking of them that lucidity of statement which they cannot yet feel and give. We must all have something to live for! When the closing overture, Beethoven's second "Leonore," began, there was at once apparent in players and in audience a lighter and brighter feeling, as though they might now enjoy sensation and sense together—grand, direct thoughts in unmistakable simplicity of language. Accordingly, the overture went off to general content, with much sweetness and smoothness in the slower portions and an energy in the allegri which was still a little too heated for true dignity.

The soloist of the evening was Madame Madeline Schiller, who was most warmly greeted and applauded, but whom we have heard to better advantage on other occasions. These columns have so often testified in almost unqualified terms to the interest and favor we bear Madame Schiller, that she must pardon us if today we pass hastily over the great technical mastery she showed in the concerto,—in which were certain wonderful flights of octaves for the left hand, and a memorable octave trill,—and the appropriately fine and ardent reading of the Chopin ballad in A flat, opus 47, to speak of what we think it deeply concerns her to consider. Madame Schiller has now reached what may be, as she chooses, the highest point in her career, or but a halting-place on her way to as great heights as a woman may achieve in pianism. But if she is to reach those heights it must be as a woman, and not by attempting to prove that she can do what a man can do as a man might do it. Perhaps we have ourselves helped to mislead her by praising so much as we have her resources of power; if so, we are anxious to help her back into the right way. In the concerto, passage after passage seemed but a mere contest between player and instrument to see how much noise could be got out of it. The bass notes in the variations of the opening allegro were indiscribably harsh, and even the grave though simple theme of the andante was produced not by a powerful "touch," but by blows which might have been dealt by a mere machine so far as any sweetness of tone or unity of phrasing were concerned. Let Madame Schiller think for an instant what Camilla Urso's playing would be if she tried to force from her violin such mighty tones as Wilhelmj's bow draws with scarcely an effort from his, and she will see the perilous verge on which she stands in trying to equal the absolute mass of tone which some men can elicit from a piano-forte. A man may strike, but a woman must pound, to do this, and in doing this, she loses at once elasticity and sympathy. Music should appeal to mind and soul, and not to the bodily ear and eye; and if a woman makes that appeal in her own way and within the limitations of her own nature, she is so far peer of any man; let her try to do more, by violence to the traits of her sex, and she is no longer even that sex's chief. And it especially concerns Madame Schiller to think of these things if she be, as we understand, committed for the present to the Steinway piano-forte. For those instruments, while they often possess a full and pure middle register and limpid upper tones, cannot be forced at all without making painfully apparent the dull thud of the hammer and the strident wiry jar of the string.

At this week's concert we are to hear in Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasy," with orchestra, a new pianist—Miss Marie Heimlicher of Basle. The orchestra will play Moscheles's overture to "Maid of Orleans," and Beethoven's "Leonore," number three, as also Schumann's B-flat symphony, number one. Miss Matilda Phillips is to sing, but her services could well be dispensed with if she cannot contribute anything else to the programme than the contralto air from "Orfeo," which even Miss Cary could scarcely render acceptable in its threadbare antiquity at the first concert.

Eighteenth Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, was devoted to the following programme: Overture, "Manfred," op. 115, Schumann; Concerto for Pianoforte in C minor, Saint-Saëns, No. 4, op. 44; Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; Piano solo, Ballad in A flat, op. 47, Chopin; Overture, "Leonore," No. 2, op. 72, Beethoven. The general complexion of the evening's entertainment was grave, not to say heavy, although the work of the orchestra was unusually well done. Mr. Henschel's acquaintance with Brahms stands him in good stead in interpreting his works, as also does the public's ignorance of them, as compared with the symphonies of Beethoven. His reading of the symphony was earnest and intelligent, although he certainly gave the work no added impressiveness as a piece of intellectual writing. It is profound in its knowledge of composition, learned in its style and impressive as a work of art, but it has little interest or charm, and seemed to lack almost entirely the deeper insight into the capabilities and mission of music which the symphonies of Beethoven, and, to a less degree of Schumann, show. The composer seems always to have in view the fullest expression of art rather than of feeling, and sentimentalizes and aggravates by his evidently studied pains not to resort to harmony and emotional expression. The symphony is profitable to listen to as a study, but for pleasure one resorts, if he can, to something more spontaneous. The overtures which began and ended the concert were well performed, particularly the former, with its passionate bursts of feeling and its expressions of despair and calm.

Madame Schiller's performance of the Saint-Saëns concerto was extremely skillful and polished, and like the composition itself in lack of emotional force. The more refined manner which she has at command was given opportunity and scope in the selection from Chopin, which was played with great expression. The concert next Saturday evening will present the following programme: Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," op. 91, Moscheles; air, "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B flat, No. 1, op. 38, Schumann; Hungarian Fantasy, for pianoforte and orchestra, Liszt; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72, Beethoven. The soloists will be Miss Mathilde Phillips, contralto, and Miss Marie Heimlicher, pianoforte.

The Henschel Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was given on Saturday evening at Music Hall, before a very large audience. The opening number was the "Manfred" overture, by Schumann, a composition that is remarkable for its monotony and for the fact that no matter by whom performed it fails to move an audience to enthusiasm. Mme. Schiller achieved two successes—first, in the concerto, which was played with her characteristic brilliancy and delicacy of touch, and second, in the rendition of Chopin's ballad in A-flat, op. 47. At the conclusion of each performance the fair artiste was the recipient of a genuine outburst of applause. The symphony was Brahms's No. 2, in D, as cold-blooded a composition, so to speak, as was ever created. It has one movement, however, which is marked by uninterrupted melody, and fortunately it is the finale. As a whole the symphony was given a vigorous and faithful rendition. The concluding number of the evening was Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 2, which was exceedingly well performed, with the single exception (which we keep constantly in type during the Henschel season) that it was put through at a double quick pace.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night was again largely in the modern vein, and although none of its numbers were new to Boston, none save the piano solo were familiar. The overture to Manfred, with its depth of sadness and gloom and bursts of pride and pomp, was well given, and the strings (which Schumann uses so gloriously in this work) were in the main finely shaded and phrased. The overture to Leonora (Number 2) is not so great as Number 3 (to be given next week), but it is the most massive and heavy of the three, and its fortissimo effects and sudden chords, its trumpet calls and anxious interrupted phrases, were graphically brought out. The Symphony was the second of Brahms', and was clearly given spite of its great complexity. Mr. Henschel seems thoroughly familiar with the meaning of the work, and there were no marked faults in the orchestra. We are sorry to be unable to go into details regarding this work and the fourth St. Saëns' concerto, as played by Mme. Madeline Schiller. The latter is a bold and fiery work, and, in its last movement, has a very effective chief theme, as square-cut and intelligible as a Gluck chorus or an old chorale, but its development is less clear. The floriture of the last movement, and the difficult double octave work, culminating in a trill in the second, were both excellently done, and Mme. Schiller's entire work of the evening was artistic, with the exception of a little overforcing and hardness at the commencement, and an exaggeration of both tempi and shading of the Chopin ballade. The piano was heard to much better advantage than recently in the Museum, and was brilliant and penetrating in its tones, and effective in pianissimo passages, as well as in the broad phrases of the first and last movements of the concerto. The next concert presents Miss Mathilde Phillips as vocalist, and Mlle. Marie Heimlicher as pianist. The Hungarian Fantasia (Liszt) will be given, and the symphony is to be the beautiful op. 38 of Schumann.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The orchestral works presented at Saturday's concert made, in combination, a peculiarly oppressive programme. Three such solid works as Schumann's overture to "Manfred," Brahms's second symphony, and one of Beethoven's "Leonore" overtures are enough to test the digestive powers of the stoutest musical gourmand. Schumann's overture has been justly characterized as unique. In this the composer has succeeded in picturing the emotions with which by turns the hero of the drama was affected, in a manner that is at once masterly and a proof of the deep impression made upon the sensitive musician by Byron's appalling poem. Manfred is set before us, restless, a victim of anguish, a battler with evil spirits, and at last quieted—in short, a series of illustrations of the tragedy, like the overture to "Tannhäuser," which gives us the whole story of the knight, led astray, repentant, forgiven. There is this difference between the two overtures to be noted, however: That by Wagner is always physical in its suggestions, while Schumann treats his subject entirely from the standpoint of a psychologist. The Brahms symphony was first played in Boston, at a Harvard concert, in January, 1879, and repeated at a subsequent concert of that season. It was shown then that the composer had not entirely redeemed himself from the charge of turgidness preferred on the occasion of the production of his first symphony. Thematic development is pushed to an extreme point, and though the themes are generally delightful, this constant iteration, combined with the composer's manner of orchestral treatment, produces a wearisome effect. The more pleasant features of the work are the contrasts in movement and rhythm which occur in the third movement—the Vienna admirers of the composer called one of these, the dance tune, "pure gold," and compared it to Haydn; the sceptical hinted at a resemblance to Gungl—and the splendid earnestness of the last movement, which, beginning gently enough, goes on with steadily augmented orchestration until the coda is reached, when there begins a crescendo of wonderful power, whose force is not spent until the close and after exciting the hearer to the utmost pitch. Of the finale, Hanslick, the great Viennese critic, said that its veins are filled with the blood of Mozart—an opinion the honesty of which none may question, though there will probably be few who will share it. The "Leonore" overture, known as No. 2—though really the first of the four preludes to the opera in the order of composition—is exceedingly interesting in itself, and also as a study in comparison with the familiar No. 3. The resemblances between the two are many, but the points of difference are more striking, the most notable of these being the episode marked adagio, just before the presto at the close, in which the orchestra after repeating the theme of the initial movement pauses as it were to take breath for the rushing finale. Mme. Schiller was the soloist of the evening. She appeared in Saint-Saëns's fourth piano concerto, a work that is more interesting than edifying; the incessant repetition of the theme—apparently an old hymn—impresses one as purposeless, except as a subject for variations. It has the great merit of clearness, one of the composer's distinguishing characteristics, the orchestration is dainty and captivating, also after Saint-Saëns's own manner, and the finale is very brilliant. Mme. Schiller's playing gave the impression of coldness and dryness to one who recalled the warmth and animation exhibited by her on former occasions. All of her charming manner was exhibited, however, in her solo performance, Chopin's ballad, op. 47. She was recalled after each appearance with great enthusiasm.

The nineteenth concert will be given on Saturday evening. The following will be the programme: Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," op. 91, Moscheles; air, "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B-flat, No. 1, op. 38, Schumann; Hungarian fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra, Liszt; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72, Beethoven. Soloists, Miss Mathilde Phillips, contralto; Miss Marie Heimlicher, pianoforte. The usual public rehearsal will take place on Friday afternoon.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—In the presence of the usual large audience at Music Hall on Saturday evening, the following programme was performed by Mr. Henschel's orchestra and Madame Schiller the pianoforte soloist: Overture, "Manfred," op. 115, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in C minor, Saint-Saëns, No. 4, op. 44; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; piano solo, Ballad in A flat, op. 47, Chopin; overture, "Leonore," No. 2, op. 72, Beethoven. Schumann's rather dull and monotonous overture had the advantage of being well performed by the orchestra, otherwise it is difficult to say what would have been the result. As it was, it received a few feeble expressions of applause at its finish. But Madame Schiller restored life and interest to the entertainment by her delightful performance of the Saint-Saëns concerto in C minor. This was played with a brilliancy and delicacy of touch which elicited the warmest admiration from the audience. Likewise the skilful artist achieved another triumph in the Chopin ballad in A flat, being recalled to bow her acknowledgments again and again. The concluding number, Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, was finely rendered, though there did not seem to be so much necessity for hurrying through at such a pace as Mr. Henschel decided upon from first to last. Of the principal number on the programme it is not easy to speak with equanimity. Brahms is, without doubt, a very learned scholar and composer of music; his erudition is, probably, of the most profound character, but it would appear as though he might afford occasionally to put a little more melody into his work—just a little now and then for a change. The performance of his symphony in D Saturday evening gave the impression, throughout three-quarters of its rendition, that the composer was either endeavoring all the while to get as near as possible to harmonic sounds without reaching them; or that he was unable to find any whatever. Finally toward the finish of the work the melody was caught and absolutely retained to the end; and all the people gave a sigh for that much relief and rest. Of course the orchestra did their work handsomely. The following programme will be performed at the concert next Saturday evening: Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," op. 91, Moscheles; air, "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B flat, No. 1, op. 38, Schumann; Hungarian Fantasy, for pianoforte and orchestra, Liszt; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72, Beethoven. The soloists will be Miss Mathilde Phillips, contralto, and Miss Marie Heimlicher, pianoforte.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night, before the usual large audience. The programme was lacking in variety and was somewhat too dry in its general tone. It opened with Schuman's "Manfred" overture, one of the most monotonous and disjointed of its composer's works, which was followed by Saint-Saëns's fourth concerto in C-minor, a composition that does not present any point of marked interest or value until the brilliant and exciting finale is reached. Brahms's symphony No. 2, in D, came next. This work does not improve greatly upon acquaintance. It is learned, finely put together, and superbly scored, but it is very hard and deliberate in style, and, like most of Brahms's music, is without heart or spontaneity. Something in the shape of flowing melody is constantly promised, but never realized. Thematic development is carried to its extreme limits, and everything else is sacrificed to it. The result is to excite wonder at the composer's command over the technicalities of his art, and disappointment at the meagreness of his inspiration in a more imaginative direction. The last movement is the most satisfying portion of the work, owing to the greater continuity of its ideas and the simpler straightforwardness of its treatment. It was performed with much vigor, but in a generally coarse and noisy manner. The rasping of the string instruments was at times almost painfully unpleasant to listen to. The "Manfred" overture received much better treatment, and was clearly and gracefully interpreted. The concert concluded with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 2, which was spiritedly performed, though at Mr. Henschel's customary rattling Beethoven pace. Madame Schiller's playing of the concerto was characterized by all of her well-known brilliancy of style and technical ability; but it seems to us that she has lost something in delicacy of touch and grace of expression during her absence, and has fallen into a formality and rigidity strangely in contrast with her earlier flexibility. In her apparent desire to give marked distinctness to every note, she has almost eliminated legato playing from her method, which suffers in consequence. In the concluding movement she was heard at her very best, and with fine effect. The applause that rewarded her at its conclusion was well earned and wholly deserved. Her other contribution to the concert was Chopin's Ballad in A-flat, op. 47, in which the more sentimental qualities of her playing were displayed to their fullest advantage. At the next concert Miss Marie Heimlicher will make her first appearance in this country, and will perform Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasia." The symphony is to be Schuman's first and best.

EIGHTEENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

—The principal event at the eighteenth symphony concert was the performance of Saint-Saëns' concerto in C-minor. It was played by Mme. Madeline Schiller with an earnestness and artistic finish which indicated that she estimated the work at a higher value than did a majority of her auditors. We cannot certainly say that definite themes are wanting in the concerto, but many of them are uncouth and appear to have been thrown together as if the composer had resolved to use up all the melodies he had jotted down at various times in his sketch-book. Occasionally we have some excellent writing, and the orchestration is exceedingly brilliant in many parts; but the composition left a sense of weariness upon the audience which somewhat checked the well-merited applause which the executant received at the conclusion of her difficult task. The symphony in D by Brahms was well played by the orchestra, but we cannot regard it as a great work of art. To say that Brahms' music is worthless would be absurd. Indications of real power exist throughout, but the eccentricity and even mannerism of this class of composition which now seems to rule "young Germany" cannot be talked away by the most energetic disciples of the "music of the future," and the last note produced a feeling of relief amongst the hearers which few attempted to conceal. Mme. Schiller was not especially happy in her rendering of Chopin's Ballad in A-flat. Of course in point of technique her performance was all that could have been desired, but her interpretation of the work was not sufficiently Chopinesque, too strong contrasts being made, and a morbid sentimentality of expression greatly detracted from the artistic effect of her entire performance. The concert concluded with a performance of Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 2, op. 72.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Eighteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 18th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, Mme. Madeline Schiller being the solo pianist, and the programme as follows:

Overture (Manfred). Op. 115.....Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte in C minor.....Saint-Saëns
No. 4, op. 44.
Symphony in D. No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms
Piano solo.....
Ballad in A flat, op. 47.....Chopin
Overture. (Leonore.) No. 2, op. 72.....Beethoven

The programme was not a particularly brilliant one, and lacked the light and restful element altogether. The Saint-Saëns concerto was the novelty of the evening, and proved to be a very interesting one, though the work seemed to have less of the usual forms of such compositions than might be expected from such a composer. It has but two movements, the first opening with an "allegro moderato," and followed by an "andante," the second beginning with an "allegro vivace," followed by a short "andante," and closing with a still faster "allegro." It is, throughout, a brilliant, melodious and musicianly composition, recalling in its characteristics many of this composer's works which have enriched the concert performances of the last few years. Mme. Schiller's interpretation of the pianoforte score was as charming an illustration of the perfection of her art as might be expected from such a player, and in the brilliant work of the finale her brilliant technique was thoroughly enjoyable. The Brahms symphony was more fully appreciated than when it was played here a few years ago, because of the generally excellent interpretation given the work, but the first two movements can hardly be made interesting, however much care may be given their performance. The playing of the overtures of the programme was thoroughly good, the "Leonore" eliciting hearty applause from the audience. Mme. Schiller was cordially greeted upon her entrance, and was recalled with much enthusiasm after the concerto, as well as at the conclusion of her admirable rendering of the Chopin ballad.

NOT AMONG THE NUMBERS.

A Well-Known Lawyer of State Street Soundly Thrashed at Music Hall for an Alleged Insult to a Lady—No Arrests.

A scene occurred last evening at Music Hall during the progress of the Symphony concert which created quite a breeze for the time being. It seems that Mrs. George F. Hall, wife of the senior member of the firm of Hall & Co., No. 5 Chauncy street, and residing at 143 Newbury street, has been in the habit of attending the concerts, accompanied by other members of her family. The party occupied seats 30, 31 and 32. Mr. Charles Eustis Hubbard is a lawyer and notary public at 28 State street, room 39, and resides at 339 Marlboro street. Mr. Hubbard and lady occupied seats 33 and 34. Mrs. Hall complained to Mr. Peck, superintendent of the hall, that Mr. Hubbard made a practice of insulting her. Last evening Mr. Hall accompanied his wife to the hall, but did not go inside, and gave his wife instructions, it annoyed, to leave the auditorium. The performance had been in progress but a short time before she did leave the hall. A few moments later an usher waited upon Mr. Hubbard and informed him that a gentleman desired to speak with him in the entry. He went out and there found Mr. Hall, who, without saying a word, proceeded to give Mr. Hubbard a rough and tumble battle of the liveliest description. The combatants were separated after a few moments, but Mr. Hubbard had a black eye, cut lip, etc. He refused to make a complaint against his assailant, called out his lady and departed. Mr. Hall was extremely anxious that a complaint should be brought against him, and it is said offered an officer $50 if he would get Mr. Hubbard to enter a complaint for assault and battery.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE EIGHTEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—In the presence of the usual large audience at Music Hall on Saturday evening, the following programme was performed by Mr. Henschel's orchestra and Madame Schiller the pianoforte soloist: Overture, "Manfred," op. 115, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in C minor, Saint-Saens, No. 4, op. 44; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73, Brahms; piano solo, Ballad in A flat, op. 47, Chopin; overture, "Leonore," No. 2, op. 72, Beethoven. Schumann's rather dull and monotonous overture had the advantage of being well performed by the orchestra, otherwise it is difficult to say what would have been the result. As it was, it received a few feeble expressions of applause at its finish. But Madame Schiller restored life and interest to the entertainment by her delightful performance of the Saint-Saens concerto in C minor. This was played with a brilliancy and delicacy of touch which elicited the warmest admiration from the audience. Likewise the skilful artist achieved another triumph in the Chopin ballad in A flat, being recalled to bow her acknowledgments again and again. The concluding number, Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, was finely rendered, though there did not seem to be so much necessity for hurrying through at such a pace as Mr. Henschel decided upon from first to last. Of the principal number on the programme it is not easy to speak with equanimity. Brahms is, without doubt, a very learned scholar and composer of music; his erudition is, probably, of the most profound character, but it would appear as though he might afford occasionally to put a little more melody into his work—just a little now and then for a change. The performance of his symphony in D Saturday evening gave the impression, throughout three-quarters of its rendition, that the composer was either endeavoring all the while to get as near as possible to harmonic sounds without reaching them; or that he was unable to find any whatever. Finally toward the finish of the work the melody was caught and absolutely retained to the end; and all the people gave a sigh for that much relief and rest. Of course the orchestra did their work handsomely. The following programme will be performed at the concert next Saturday evening: Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," op. 91, Moscheles; air, "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B flat, No. 1, op. 38, Schumann; Hungarian Fantasy, for pianoforte and orchestra, Liszt; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72, Beethoven. The soloists will be Miss Mathilde Philipps, contralto, and Miss Marie Heimlicher, pianoforte.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night, before the usual large audience. The programme was lacking in variety and was somewhat too dry in its general tone. It opened with Schuman's "Manfred" overture, one of the most monotonous and disjointed of its composer's works, which was followed by Saint-Saens's fourth concerto in C-minor, a composition that does not present any point of marked interest or value until the brilliant and exciting finale is reached. Brahms's symphony No. 2, in D, came next. This work does not improve greatly upon acquaintance. It is learned, finely put together, and superbly scored, but it is very hard and deliberate in style, and, like most of Brahms's music, is without heart or spontaneity. Something in the shape of flowing melody is constantly promised, but never realized. Thematic development is carried to its extreme limits, and everything else is sacrificed to it. The result is to excite wonder at the composer's command over the technicalities of his art, and disappointment at the meagreness of his inspiration in a more imaginative direction. The last movement is the most satisfying portion of the work, owing to the greater continuity of its ideas and the simpler straightforwardness of its treatment. It was performed with much vigor, but in a generally coarse and noisy manner. The rasping of the string instruments was at times almost painfully unpleasant to listen to. The "Manfred" overture received much better treatment, and was clearly and gracefully interpreted. The concert concluded with Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 2, which was spiritedly performed, though at Mr. Henschel's customary rattling Beethoven pace. Madame Schiller's playing of the concerto was characterized by all of her well-known brilliancy of style and technical ability; but it seems to us that she has lost something in delicacy of touch and grace of expression during her absence, and has fallen into a formality and rigidity strangely in contrast with her earlier flexibility. In her apparent desire to give marked distinctness to every note, she has almost eliminated legato playing from her method, which suffers in consequence. In the concluding movement she was heard at her very best, and with fine effect. The applause that rewarded her at its conclusion was well earned and wholly deserved. Her other contribution to the concert was Chopin's Ballad in A-flat, op. 47, in which the more sentimental qualities of her playing were displayed to their fullest advantage. At the next concert Miss Marie Heimlicher will make her first appearance in this country, and will perform Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasia." The symphony is to be Schuman's first and best.

EIGHTEENTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

—The principal event at the eighteenth symphony concert was the performance of Saint-Saens' concerto in C-minor. It was played by Mme. Madeline Schiller with an earnestness and artistic finish which indicated that she estimated the work at a higher value than did a majority of her auditors. We cannot certainly say that definite themes are wanting in the concerto, but many of them are uncouth and appear to have been thrown together as if the composer had resolved to use up all the melodies he had jotted down at various times in his sketch-book. Occasionally we have some excellent writing, and the orchestration is exceedingly brilliant in many parts; but the composition left a sense of weariness upon the audience which somewhat checked the well-merited applause which the executant received at the conclusion of her difficult task. The symphony in D by Brahms was well played by the orchestra, but we cannot regard it as a great work of art. To say that Brahms' music is worthless would be absurd. Indications of real power exist throughout, but the eccentricity and even mannerism of this class of composition which now seems to rule "young Germany" cannot be talked away by the most energetic disciples of the "music of the future," and the last note produced a feeling of relief amongst the hearers which few attempted to conceal. Mme. Schiller was not especially happy in her rendering of Chopin's Ballad in A-flat. Of course in point of technique her performance was all that could have been desired, but her interpretation of the work was not sufficiently Chopinesque, too strong contrasts being made, and a morbid sentimentality of expression greatly detracted from the artistic effect of her entire performance. The concert concluded with a performance of Beethoven's overture to Leonore, No. 2, op. 72.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Eighteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 18th concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, Mme. Madeline Schiller being the solo pianist, and the programme as follows:

Overture (Manfred). Op. 115.....Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte in C minor.....Saint-Saens
No. 4, op. 44.
Symphony in D. No. 2, op. 73.....Brahms
Piano solo.....Chopin
Ballad in A flat, op. 47.....Chopin
Overture. (Leonore.) No. 2, op. 72.....Beethoven

The programme was not a particularly brilliant one, and lacked the light and restful element altogether. The Saint-Saens concerto was the novelty of the evening, and proved to be a very interesting one, though the work seemed to have less of the usual forms of such compositions than might be expected from such a composer. It has but two movements, the first opening with an "allegro moderato," and followed by an "andante," the second beginning with an "allegro vivace," followed by a short "andante," and closing with a still faster "allegro." It is, throughout, a brilliant, melodious and musicianly composition, recalling in its characteristics many of this composer's works which have enriched the concert-performances of the last few years. Mme. Schiller's interpretation of the pianoforte score was as charming an illustration of the perfection of her art as might be expected from such a player, and in the brilliant work of the finale her brilliant technique was thoroughly enjoyable. The Brahms symphony was more fully appreciated than when it was played here a few years ago, because of the generally excellent interpretation given the work, but the first two movements can hardly be made interesting, however much care may be given their performance. The playing of the overtures of the programme was thoroughly good, the "Leonore" eliciting hearty applause from the audience. Mme. Schiller was cordially greeted upon her entrance, and was recalled with much enthusiasm after the concerto, as well as at the conclusion of her admirable rendering of the Chopin ballad.

NOT AMONG THE NUMBERS.

A Well-Known Lawyer of State Street Soundly Thrashed at Music Hall for an Alleged Insult to a Lady—No Arrests.

A scene occurred last evening at Music Hall during the progress of the Symphony concert which created quite a breeze for the time being. It seems that Mrs. George F. Hall, wife of the senior member of the firm of Hall & Co., No. 5 Chauncy street, and residing at 143 Newbury street, has been in the habit of attending the concerts, accompanied by other members of her family. The party occupied seats 30, 31 and 32. Mr. Charles Eustis Hubbard is a lawyer and notary public at 28 State street, room 39, and resides at 339 Marlboro street. Mr. Hubbard and lady occupied seats 33 and 34. Mrs. Hall complained to Mr. Peck, superintendent of the hall, that Mr. Hubbard made a practice of insulting her. Last evening Mr. Hall accompanied his wife to the hall, but did not go inside, and gave his wife instructions, if annoyed, to leave the auditorium. The performance had been in progress but a short time before she did leave the hall. A few moments later an usher waited upon Mr. Hubbard and informed him that a gentleman desired to speak with him in the entry. He went out and there found Mr. Hall, who, without saying a word, proceeded to give Mr. Hubbard a rough and tumble battle of the liveliest description. The combatants were separated after a few moments, but Mr. Hubbard had a black eye, cutlip, etc. He refused to make a complaint against his assailant, called out his lady and departed. Mr. Hall was extremely anxious that a complaint should be brought against him, and it is said offered an officer $50 if he would get Mr. Hubbard to enter a complaint for assault and battery.

FEBRUARY 27.—More of the modern school, while Henschel may be termed the modern school-master. There are more dissonances in Music Hall now in a week, than there used to be in a year. The medicine administered to Boston at present may be thus analyzed:

- Extract of Brahms.....3 parts
- Essence of Berlioz.....2 parts
- Spirit of Henschel.....1 part

Shake well before taking.
Henschel is a veritable Brahmin in his passion for Brahms. And speaking of that reminds me that Miss How (who sang Brahms' "Rhapsodie") was the only person who appeared twice in the Boston Symphony Concerts. I am assured by a party who ought to know, that she is a pupil of Mr. Henschel. This accounts for some of the milk in rather comical phase to the el's vocal method very bad,

RESENTING AN INSULT TO HIS WIFE.

THE musical nobility of Boston is this winter worshipping George Henschel and his symphony orchestra, which gave its eighteenth concert in Music Hall February 25. George F. Hall, a commission merchant, has owned three seats on the floor, near the stage, which have been occupied by lady members of his family.

The two adjoining seats have been occupied by Charles Eustis Hubbard, a lawyer, and his wife. Hubbard has always sat next to Mrs. Hall, and the lady claims that his conduct has been insulting. Charity led her to think for a number of evenings that Hubbard's conduct was the result of nervousness, but last week she became convinced otherwise, and informed her husband, who is more muscular than the man of law.

Mr. Hall arranged with his wife that he would wait in the lobby of Music Hall Saturday evening while the concert was in progress, and that if the insult was repeated she should join him.

Accordingly, in the middle of Saturday evening's performance, Mrs. Hall left her seat and passed out of the hall. A moment later an usher informed Mr. Hubbard that a gentleman wished to see him in the lobby. With his hat under his arm, arrayed in full evening dress, the unsuspecting lawyer ambled to the nearest door.

No sooner had his eyeglasses passed the portal than a stalwart fist shattered them, and started the blood from his nose, which bespattered his shirt front, and carried away all of his teeth. There is no telling what would have followed had not all the ushers in the hall separated the angry husband and his victim. The police detail also took a hand and stilled the noise. Mr. Hubbard persistently refused to make a complaint, and no arrest was made.

Mr. Hall used every effort to induce a complaint, saying that he should be supremely happy to appear in court and ventilate Hubbard's conduct. He begged the officers to arrest him anyhow, but as there was no complaint, they were forced to refuse. Hubbard covering the wound on his face with his handkerchief, summoned his wife from her seat, and telling her that "it was nothing," they got into their carriage and were driven to their home as quickly and quietly as possible.

All the parties move in the highest circles and live in the most aristocratic part of the Back Bay.—N. Y. Sun.

opened with Schumann's picture, gloomy, mournful, Schumann manages the viol- ul Astarte could not have umann did not understandakespeare. The Frenchman ut he had an equal affection hip somewhat like Jerome ven so Schumann shows his ing a requiem at the end of ut as well as a Mahometan an.

me that that gentleman, He has placed my name in without going through the I do not know what the they consist of an obligation line to serve. I have heard one longs for the crown of cert, and will hastily return. aint-Säens concerto. Its con- ne, but its execution lacked o have no fine gradations of gives very little between. In exaggerated the tempi and t-named work was free from roughout. Then came the read well by Mr. Henschel, The work itself needs no p New York musicians. The erture (Beethoven), in which n with appropriate force.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XIX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, MARCH 4TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans." Op. 91. MOSCHELES.

AIR. (Orpheus.) GLUCK.

SYMPHONY in B-flat. No. 1, op 38. SCHUMANN.

Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.—Larghetto.
Scherzo. (Molto vivace.)—Allegro animato e grazioso.—

HUNGARIAN FANTASY
FOR PIANOFORTE AND ORCHESTRA. LISZT.

OVERTURE. (Leonore.) No. 3, op. 72. BEETHOVEN.

SOLOISTS:

Miss MATHILDE PHILLIPPS, Contralto,
Miss MARIE HEIMLICHER, Pianoforte.

MISS HEIMLICHER will use a CHICKERING PIANO.

184

RECITATIVE and AIR. (Orpheus.) . . . GLUCK.

RECIT. Euridice, ombra cara, modi tu piange il tuo sposo ti domande a gli Dei a mortali ti chiede e sparse a venti son le lagrime sue i suoi lamenti.

AIR. Cerco il mio ben così in queste ove morì funeste sponde; ma solo al mio dolor perchè conobbe amor, l'eco risponde.

RECIT. Euridice! Ah questo nome san le spiagge e le selve l'appresero da me. Per ogni valle Euridice risuona, in ogni tronco scrisse il misero Orfeo. Euridice!
Idol mio! Cara Euridice!

AIR. Piango il mio ben così, se il sole indora il dì, se va nell'onde. Pietoso all pianto mio va mormo-rando il rio e mi risponde.

185

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

At the nineteenth symphony concert, which occurred on Saturday evening, the orchestra (if we may venture to use so familiar a phrase) "put its best foot foremost," so far as its own numbers were concerned; for the playing of the opening overture was its best and smoothest contribution to the programme. This overture, which was Moscheles's prelude to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," is at once romantic and dramatic in the character of its thought. It passes from reverie, through a pastoral period, across which pass suggestions of unrest and lament, to hints of tumult and military spirit, and then sinks at last into a sombre, but not altogether depressing close. These various phases were all clearly and effectively rendered, and the reading deserved more applause than it received. We wish we could as much of the third "Lenora" overture of Beethoven, which ended the concert. But there are a dignity and a reserve even in the highest and boldest paeans of joyful freedom which Beethoven has written, that are lost when his exultant music is played as if it celebrated some mere material triumph, instead of glorifying that of a lofty ideal and extolling the emancipation of the thinking mind and the loving heart, as well as the liberation of the imprisoned body. Fire and force were in the reading, smoothness in the adagio phrases and concentrated power in the few isolated chords, but the grandeur and repose were scarcely more than hinted at.

The symphony was that favorite B-flat of Schumann No. 1, opus 38. It was unequally played, the orchestral work being rough and harsh at times, and the leader being apparently in one of his least certain moods. His predisposition to confound the relation of allegri movements was made peculiarly plain by his dictating for the final allegro animato e grazioso a time more rapid than for the previous scherzo, which is marked molto vivace, thus representing "graceful animation" as an advance beyond "much vivacity." The scherzo was too heavily and dully read, as has been a prevailing fault with such movements during the season, and toward the close the time was so relaxed as to become rather an andantino than anything else. But, on the other hand the larghetto was agreeable and good; its time was very well taken and steadily sustained, and the reading was thoughtful and smooth. The transition from the andante to the allegro of the first movement was a little studied, but the effect was satisfactory; we cannot so approve the variations of time and treatment that were noticeable in this same movement after the brief horn phrase which gathers together the elements for the final ensemble.

Miss Matilda Philipps sang from Gluck's "Orfeo," and was heard to great advantage. Our provisions had happily deceived us, for instead of the hackneyed—and may we say, dreaded?—"Che farò," she sang the long scene of double recita-tives and airs, in which Orpheus addresses the shade of Eurydice and bewails his hapless fate. This whole scene did the singer honor. The slow sustained melodies gave opportunity for her full voice to display its best and most sonorous tones, positive and round to the very bottom of its compass. But better than this, was the simple but true feeling with which Miss Philipps emphasized and colored the text both of poet and composer.

This concert introduced to Boston a new pianist, Miss Marie Heimlicher, who has come here from Basle at the suggestion of Mr. Perabo, who is about to give two chamber concerts in order to introduce her to the musical public in an ampler and fairer fashion. The lady has been long a student under Rubinstein, and has evidently studied to good purpose, for her remarkably neat and delicate touch, her decided attack of arduous passages and her clearness in extreme pianissimi, remind one strongly of his finer moments. Miss Heimlicher played Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasy" for piano-forte and orchestra. When we have named the author, we have implied that the technical difficulties to be overcome are very great. These difficulties were met successfully, and the general reading of the fantasy indicated a proper understanding on the soloist's part of the relation which the piano-forte bears in the score to the other instruments, although this understanding was often rather suggested than enforced. But it is not unreasonable to suppose that Miss Heimlicher may have refrained intentionally from using the strength which she apparently possesses, and that the conductor might have likewise restrained somewhat the fulness of the orchestra, that the voice of the solo instrument might not be drowned. As the lady is so soon to be heard again, we shall perhaps do best to await her reappearance before adding more than that her performance was eminently satisfactory to the audience, who recalled her thrice.

The last concert of the series will be given on Saturday evening, when Beethoven's ninth symphony will be given. There will be a full chorus, and the solo parts are assigned to Mrs. Humphrey Allen, Miss How, Mr. Adams and Signor Cirillo. The first part of the programme consists of Mr. Paine's prelude to the "Oedipus," conducted by himself, a vocal psalm for tenor, soprano and bass, written by Mr. Henschel, and the scherzo and wedding march from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" of Mendelssohn.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"Nothing new, but highly interesting" may be the condensed verdict on last night's programme. The overture to the Maid of Orleans is an exception to both points of the above: being new (to Boston) and uninteresting. Miss Mathilde Phillips sang an aria from Gluck's Orpheus (not the well worn che farò) with dramatic force. The symphony was the B flat, (No. 1), of Schumann, probably the finest instrumental work of this composer. The first and third movements showed some roughnesses, especially in the wind instruments, but the last movement, in which the strings are treated much after the manner of the charming Manfred music, was finely rendered and greatly appreciated. The Lenora Overture (No. 3) was spiritedly given; even too much so in the finale. The popular success of the concert was achieved by Miss Marie Heimlicher, a new pianist, who performed Liszt's Hungarian Fantasie, with great delicacy and taste, although she blurred somewhat in the heavier passages. Nevertheless her accurate tempo, and generally artistic conception of the work, deserved the great applause which her performance created. She has stepped at once into popular favor.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The programme was an excellent one, but its rendering, as far as the purely orchestral selections are concerned, was coarse and unfinished in style. The best-played composition was Moscheles' overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," a work highly poetic in feeling, and remarkably rich, tasteful and effective in scoring. It had a special interest as one of the few compositions for orchestra by a composer whose reputation is almost entirely confined to music for the piano. Schumann's first, clearest and best symphony was interpreted with a noisiness and a roughness that at length became almost sleep provoking by its monotony. The delicacy of the lighter portions of the scherzo and of the finale was entirely buried under the sensational, slap-dash style in which it was met. In several places there was a great lack of unity and precision among the strings. This fault was also to be found in the playing of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, which though interpreted on the whole with much force and spirit, was rattled off at times until its character was reduced to that of a species of hornpipe cast in a classic mould. Miss Matilda Philipps gave a beautiful rendering of the recitative and aria "Euridice ombra cara" and "Cerco il mio ben così," from Gluck's "Orpheus." Her fine voice, especially in its lower notes, was heard to rare advantage and with great effect, and her style was very fine in its largeness and its depth of expression. The other soloist was Miss Marie Heimlicher, a young Swiss pianist, who was heard for the first time here in public. She performed Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasy" for piano and orchestra. Miss Heimlicher has been educated in a good school of technique, and plays with brilliancy and taste. She did not seem to have the physical force essential to a wholly effective performance of this work, and it is almost to be regretted that she should have selected it for her debut. In some portions of it when she was accompanied by the orchestra, she was scarcely audible. Enough was heard, however, to prove conclusively that her training has been excellent, her industry great, and that her talents are decided. We, however, prefer to hear more of her, and under better conditions, before criticising her to any greater extent. She made a highly flattering impression, and was recalled three times amid great enthusiasm. The feature of the next and the last concert of the series will be Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday evening was devoted to the following programme: Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," op. 91, Moscheles; Air, "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B-flat, No. 1, op. 38, Schumann; Hungarian fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra, Liszt; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72, Beethoven. The selections were excellent and interesting in character, although the instrumental work of the evening was not wholly satisfactory. Moscheles' overture, a beautiful and poetic piece of work, and valuable as one of the few works for an orchestra by this composer, was well performed, but the symphony was carelessly and hurriedly played, especially in the andante, the first allegro and the scherzo. The concluding allegro movement was rendered better, but even that seemed good chiefly by comparison with the bad which had preceded it. There was much hesitation among individual players, and a moment of sad confusion was even noticed in the second movement in the first part of the composition. The Beethoven overture was better done, but even that was full of errors which seemed to be due to a spirit of listlessness and a lack of interest on the part of the players. Indeed, the whole impression of the evening was that of men tired and jaded by too much work, or otherwise unfitted for that unconstrained and joyous love for their duties which the more important numbers of the programme demanded. Miss Mathilde

Philipps gave the recitative and air from "Orpheus" with skill and expression and a tone which, although uneven in its quality and power, was at its best very brilliant. Miss Marie Heimlicher, who on this occasion made her debut in Boston as a pianist, was very warmly received, and was thrice recalled after her performance. She seemed somewhat over-weighted by the composition which she essayed to perform, and although showing an excellent method and a good degree of skill, she left undiscovered many of the deeper meanings of the work. One hearing, however, and that with the accompaniment of an orchestra whose efforts were so vigorous as to make many of her notes inaudible, is manifestly insufficient to allow a fair estimate to be made of her talents, but during the week other opportunities to hear her are to be given. The first impression is that she is an artist of good but not pre-eminent abilities. She has one or two affectations in manner which she should reform, the most displeasing of which is a full downward sweep of the right arm from the keyboard, not only at the conclusion of a rapid run from bass to treble, when there might be some excuse for it, but also at the end of many trills, when it has no possible occasion.

The concert next Saturday, which concludes the season, will be devoted to this programme: Prelude from the music to "Edipus Tyrannus," Paine, conducted by the composer; trio for soprano, tenor and bass, from Psalm cxxx., op. 31, Henschel; Scherzo and Wedding March from the music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 61, Mendelssohn; The Ninth (Choral) Symphony, in D minor, op. 125, Beethoven. The soloists will be Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, soprano; Miss Mary H. How, contralto; Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor, and Mr. V. Cirillo, bass.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Nineteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, with Miss Mathilde Philipps, contralto, and Miss Marie Heimlicher, pianist, as the soloists, the programme being as follows: Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," op. 91.

Air ("Orpheus").....Gluck
Symphony in B flat, No. 1, op. 38.....Schumann
Hungarian fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra.....Liszt
Overture ("Leonore"), No. 2, op. 72.....Beethoven

In the "Orpheus" recitative "Euridice, ombra cara," and air "Cerco il mio," Miss Philipps made a most successful effort, her voice proving to have gained much in sweetness since she sang here earlier in the season, and the delivery of the numbers showing admirable skill and dramatic ability. She was generously applauded and recalled after the number. Miss Heimlicher made her first appearance in this country on this occasion, having recently arrived in this city from Basel, Switzerland. The Liszt "Fantasie," with orchestra, seemed somewhat unsuitable to display the newcomer's abilities to the best advantage, as her touch is hardly brilliant or strong enough to be effective in such a composition. She appears, however, to have many merits as a player, which will undoubtedly be made apparent in the recital programmes in which she is to be heard during the coming week. She was applauded enthusiastically by the audience at the conclusion of her number. The great event of the evening was the playing of the orchestra in the Schumann symphony, which was given with such brilliancy and effect that the audience broke out with grand rounds of applause at the conclusion of each movement. The overtures of the evening were equally well played, and the programme as a whole was a very enjoyable one.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The nineteenth concert, last Saturday evening, opened with Moscheles' overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans." As one of the very few orchestral works of this composer this overture was certainly interesting to hear; yet, as far as first impressions go, listening to it was rather a satisfaction of curiosity than a high artistic pleasure. Its themes and construction seem somewhat too flimsy to make it enjoyable as a classic composition, and, on the other hand, its romantic and dramatic side strikes one as very innocent and timid nowadays. Miss Mathilde Philipps sang the opening recitative and air from Gluck's "Orpheus" very beautifully. She had her fine voice under excellent control, and sang with a purity and depth of sentiment such as one does not often hear equalled. Schumann's B-flat symphony, with its grand, triumphant exordium, came just at the right moment, after the two solemn numbers which preceded it. The playing, however, was hardly up to the mark. The first movement sounded very ragged in places, and we have heard the largo far more effectively given. In the scherzo and finale Mr. Henschel was more unstable in his tempi than ever. In the first announcement of the graceful theme of the finale, the tempo showed just that fine artistic appreciation of the effect to be made by a quasi coquettish moderation in speed, in playing phrases of this character, which we have already applauded in Mr. Henschel's reading of the allegretto scherzando of Beethoven's eighth symphony; but this dainty tempo gradually made way for a faster and more commonplace one, and the charm of the movement was irretrievably lost. Miss Marie Heimlicher, a young pupil of Wenzel of Leipzig, made her first public appearance in Boston, playing Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasy." She made an unusually good impression, showing great technical ability and more than common musical feeling. Yet she impressed us, in a way which we are not quite able to account for, as being, both by nature and training, up to doing far better work than she did in this not especially fine fantasy of Liszt's. We have a suspicion that her proper sphere is in better music—Beethoven, Schumann, Weber, Schubert—and we are correspondingly anxious to hear her play something that is more than a mere virtuoso's cheval de bataille. Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, closed the concert. To us it was spoiled by the rapid tempo at which it was taken. The allegro was a true military band-master's allegro, and in the glorious coda we almost felt that we could hear the crack of the ring-master's whip, to such circus speed was the movement urged on. The whole was utterly without dignity.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The last but one of the Symphony Concerts by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Georg Henschel was given Saturday evening at Music Hall in the presence of the usual crowded house. Miss Matilde Philipps and Miss Marie Heimlicher were the soloists, and the following programme was presented: Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," op. 91, Moscheles; Air, "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B-flat, No. 1, op. 38, Schumann; Hungarian fantasy for piano-forte and orchestra, Liszt; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72, Beethoven. For the first time since Mr. Henschel began the exercise of his instruction and baton over his generally superb orchestra, their performances were emphatically unsatisfactory. The overture was fairly well performed and elicited considerable approval, but the symphony was played with a rough carelessness and hurry which exceeded anything in badness yet done by the orchestra. Again, in the piano-forte concerto, Miss Heimlicher found it exceedingly difficult, at times, to make herself heard or understood, by reason of the complete overslaughting of her efforts by the musicians. Even the Beethoven overture was poorly rendered, in comparison with its former presentations by this same band of players. It seemed clear throughout the performance that something was out of joint in some direction with the orchestra. Miss Philipps sang the air from "Orpheus" with much skill and beauty of expression. Her contralto voice was heard to excellent advantage and was rewarded with well-deserved applause. Miss Heimlicher also showed herself to be a well trained and accomplished, if not positively talented artist, and the greater portion of her performance upon the piano-forte was enthusiastically praised. The next concert, which will be the last of the present series, will be given on Saturday evening, the 11th inst., when the following programme will be performed: Prelude from the music to "Edipus Tyrannus," Paine, conducted by the composer; trio for soprano, tenor and bass, from Psalm cxxx., op. 31, Henschel; Scherzo and Wedding March from the music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 61, Mendelssohn; The Ninth (Choral) Symphony, in D minor, op. 125, Beethoven. The soloists will be Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, soprano; Miss Mary H. How, contralto; Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor, and Mr. V. Cirillo, bass.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The programme was an excellent one, but its rendering, as far as the purely orchestral selections are concerned, was coarse and unfinished in style. The best-played composition was Moscheles' overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," a work highly poetic in feeling, and remarkably rich, tasteful and effective in scoring. It had a special interest as one of the few compositions for orchestra by a composer whose reputation is almost entirely confined to music for the piano. Schumann's first, clearest and best symphony was interpreted with a noisiness and a roughness that at length became almost sleep provoking by its monotony. The delicacy of the lighter portions of the scherzo and of the finale was entirely buried under the sensational, slapdash style in which it was met. In several places there was a great lack of unity and precision among the strings. This fault was also to be found in the playing of Beethoven's "Leonore" overture No. 3, which though interpreted on the whole with much force and spirit, was rattled off at times until its character was reduced to that of a species of hornpipe cast in a classic mould. Miss Matilda Philipps gave a beautiful rendering of the recitative and aria "Euridice ombra cara" and "Cerco il mio ben così," from Gluck's "Orpheus." Her fine voice, especially in its lower notes, was heard to rare advantage and with great effect, and her style was very fine in its largeness and its depth of expression. The other soloist was Miss Marie Heimlicher, a young Swiss pianist, who was heard for the first time here in public. She performed Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasy" for piano and orchestra. Miss Heimlicher has been educated in a good school of technique, and plays with brilliancy and taste. She did not seem to have the physical force essential to a wholly effective performance of this work, and it is almost to be regretted that she should have selected it for her debut. In some portions of it when she was accompanied by the orchestra, she was scarcely audible. Enough was heard, however, to prove conclusively that her training has been excellent, her industry great, and that her talents are decided. We, however, prefer to hear more of her, and under better conditions, before criticising her to any greater extent. She made a highly flattering impression, and was recalled three times amid great enthusiasm. The feature of the next and the last concert of the series will be Beethoven's Ninth Symphony.

Nineteenth Symphony Concert.

The nineteenth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall Saturday evening was devoted to the following programme: Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," op. 91, Moscheles; Air, "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B-flat, No. 1, op. 38, Schumann; Hungarian fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra, Liszt; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72, Beethoven. The selections were excellent and interesting in character, although the instrumental work of the evening was not wholly satisfactory. Moscheles' overture, a beautiful and poetic piece of work, and valuable as one of the few works for an orchestra by this composer, was well performed, but the symphony was carelessly and hurriedly played, especially in the andante, the first allegro and the scherzo. The concluding allegro movement was rendered better, but even that seemed good chiefly by comparison with the bad which had preceded it. There was much hesitation among individual players, and a moment of sad confusion was even noticed in the second movement in the first part of the composition. The Beethoven overture was better done, but even that was full of errors which seemed to be due to a spirit of listlessness and a lack of interest on the part of the players. Indeed, the whole impression of the evening was that of men tired and jaded by too much work, or otherwise unfitted for that unconstrained and joyous love for their duties which the more important numbers of the programme demanded. Miss Mathilde

Philipps gave the recitative and air from "Orpheus" with skill and expression and a tone which, although uneven in its quality and power, was at its best very brilliant. Miss Marie Heimlicher, who on this occasion made her debut in Boston as a pianist, was very warmly received, and was thrice recalled after her performance. She seemed somewhat overweighted by the composition which she essayed to perform, and although showing an excellent method and a good degree of skill, she left undiscovered many of the deeper meanings of the work. One hearing, however, and that with the accompaniment of an orchestra whose efforts were so vigorous as to make many of her notes inaudible, is manifestly insufficient to allow a fair estimate to be made of her talents, but during the week other opportunities to hear her are to be given. The first impression is that she is an artist of good but not pre-eminent abilities. She has one or two affectations in manner which she should reform, the most displeasing of which is a full downward sweep of the right arm from the keyboard, not only at the conclusion of a rapid run from bass to treble, when there might be some excuse for it, but also at the end of many trills, when it has no possible occasion.

The concert next Saturday, which concludes the season, will be devoted to this programme: Prelude from the music to "Edipus Tyrannus," Paine, conducted by the composer; trio for soprano, tenor and bass, from Psalm cxxx., op. 31, Henschel; Scherzo and Wedding March from the music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 61, Mendelssohn; The Ninth (Choral) Symphony, in D minor, op. 125, Beethoven. The soloists will be Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, soprano; Miss Mary H. How, contralto; Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor, and Mr. V. Cirillo, bass.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Nineteenth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, with Miss Mathilde Philipps, contralto, and Miss Marie Heimlicher, pianist, as the soloists, the programme being as follows: Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," op. 91, Moscheles

Air ("Orpheus"), Gluck; symphony in B flat, No. 1, op. 38, Schumann; Hungarian fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra, Liszt; Overture ("Leonore"), No. 3, op. 72, Beethoven.

In the "Orpheus" recitative "Euridice, ombra cara," and air "Cerco il mio," Miss Philipps made a most successful effort, her voice proving to have gained much in sweetness since she sang here earlier in the season, and the delivery of the numbers showing admirable skill and dramatic ability. She was generously applauded and recalled after the number. Miss Heimlicher made her first appearance in this country on this occasion, having recently arrived in this city from Basel, Switzerland. The Liszt "Fantasie," with orchestra, seemed somewhat unsuitable to display the newcomer's abilities to the best advantage, as her touch is hardly brilliant or strong enough to be effective in such a composition. She appears, however, to have many merits as a player, which will undoubtedly be made apparent in the recital programmes in which she is to be heard during the coming week. She was applauded enthusiastically by the audience at the conclusion of her number. The great event of the evening was the playing of the orchestra in the Schumann symphony, which was given with such brilliancy and effect that the audience broke out with grand rounds of applause at the conclusion of each movement. The overtures of the evening were equally well played, and the programme as a whole was a very enjoyable one.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The nineteenth concert, last Saturday evening, opened with Moscheles' overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans." As one of the very few orchestral works of this composer this overture was certainly interesting to hear; yet, as far as first impressions go, listening to it was rather a satisfaction of curiosity than a high artistic pleasure. Its themes and construction seem somewhat too flimsy to make it enjoyable as a classic composition, and, on the other hand, its romantic and dramatic side strikes one as very innocent and timid nowadays. Miss Mathilde Philipps sang the opening recitative and air from Gluck's "Orpheus" very beautifully. She had her fine voice under excellent control, and sang with a purity and depth of sentiment such as one does not often hear equalled. Schumann's B-flat symphony, with its grand, triumphant exordium, came just at the right moment, after the two solemn numbers which preceded it. The playing, however, was hardly up to the mark. The first movement sounded very ragged in places, and we have heard the largo far more effectively given. In the scherzo and finale Mr. Henschel was more unstable in his tempi than ever. In the first announcement of the graceful theme of the finale, the tempo showed just that fine artistic appreciation of the effect to be made by a quasi coquettish moderation in speed, in playing phrases of this character, which we have already applauded in Mr. Henschel's reading of the allegretto scherzando of Beethoven's eighth symphony; but this dainty tempo gradually made way for a faster and more commonplace one, and the charm of the movement was irretrievably lost. Miss Marie Heimlicher, a young pupil of Wenzel of Leipzig, made her first public appearance in Boston, playing Liszt's "Hungarian Fantasy." She made an unusually good impression, showing great technical ability and more than common musical feeling. Yet she impressed us, in a way which we are not quite able to account for, as being, both by nature and training, up to doing far better work than she did in this not especially fine fantasy of Liszt's. We have a suspicion that her proper sphere is in better music—Beethoven, Schumann, Weber, Schubert—and we are correspondingly anxious to hear her play something that is more than a mere virtuoso's cheval de bataille. Beethoven's "Leonore" overture, No. 3, closed the concert. To us it was spoiled by the rapid tempo at which it was taken. The allegro was a true military band-master's allegro, and in the glorious coda we almost felt that we could hear the crack of the ring-master's whip, to such circus speed was the movement urged on. The whole was utterly without dignity.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

THE NINETEENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The last but one of the Symphony Concerts by the Boston Orchestra under Mr. Georg Henschel was given Saturday evening at Music Hall in the presence of the usual crowded house. Miss Matilde Philipps and Miss Marie Heimlicher were the soloists, and the following programme was presented: Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans," op. 91, Moscheles; Air, "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B-flat, No. 1, op. 38, Schumann; Hungarian fantasy for piano-forte and orchestra, Liszt; overture, "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72, Beethoven. For the first time since Mr. Henschel began the exercise of his instruction and baton over his generally superb orchestra, their performances were emphatically unsatisfactory. The overture was fairly well performed and elicited considerable approval, but the symphony was played with a rough carelessness and hurry which exceeded anything in badness yet done by the orchestra. Again, in the piano-forte concerto, Miss Heimlicher found it exceedingly difficult, at times, to make herself heard or understood, by reason of the complete overshadowing of her efforts by the musicians. Even the Beethoven overture was poorly rendered, in comparison with its former presentations by this same band of players. It seemed clear throughout the performance that something was out of joint in some direction with the orchestra. Miss Philipps sang the air from "Orpheus" with much skill and beauty of expression. Her contralto voice was heard to excellent advantage and was rewarded with well-deserved applause. Miss Heimlicher also showed herself to be a well trained and accomplished, if not positively talented artist, and the greater portion of her performance upon the piano-forte was enthusiastically praised. The next concert, which will be the last of the present series, will be given on Saturday evening, the 11th inst., when the following programme will be performed: Prelude from the music to "Edipus Tyrannus," Paine, conducted by the composer; trio for soprano, tenor and bass, from Psalm cxxx., op. 31, Henschel; Scherzo and Wedding March from the music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 61, Mendelssohn; The Ninth (Choral) Symphony, in D minor, op. 125, Beethoven. The soloists will be Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, soprano; Miss Mary H. How, contralto; Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor, and Mr. V. Cirillo, bass.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Contracts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

An Issue of Interest to the Musical Public.

An issue has arisen between the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra and the musicians composing its membership which, while it affects a private contract only, involves principles of interest to all who employ the services of orchestral players. The season of 20 concerts given by this orchestra during the past five months has been an experimental one in many ways, and the experience gained by the management has made it seem wise to inaugurate some changes for the next season in the dealings with its members. The new departure determined upon was made known to the members of the orchestra on Monday, and the subject has been generally discussed in their musical circles since that time. To fully understand the necessity for the contemplated change and the principles involved, it is necessary to state some of the arrangements between the musicians and the management during the last season.

THE ENGAGEMENTS MADE

Last October for the 20 symphony concerts stipulated that the members of the orchestra should receive at the rate of $6 for each concert and $3 for each rehearsal, three rehearsals per week being guaranteed, making a payment of $15 per man, and this payment was direct to the individual, so that the usual commission charged by band agents was saved to the individual players. This agreement was based upon the custom common among the musicians of this city, which guarantees every member of a band or orchestra the same payment for each engagement as is received by any other member, the triangle and the bass drum players receiving the same amount as the leading violin or the cornet soloist. As a matter of fact, the number of rehearsals during the season has exceeded the number guaranteed, and an additional series of concerts, that at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, has been given, so that the weekly payments have averaged about $20 per man during the entire season. This arrangement has left the men free to play anywhere, and under any leader, at all times, except such as were demanded for the specified rehearsals and concerts. The result can be easily seen by any one familiar with the musical deluge which has inundated Boston during the last winter. The 60 to 100 good orchestral players numbered among the resident musicians have worked as they never worked before, and their receipts have averaged far above the amount earned by them in former years. Unfortunately, this additional income has not been altogether an advantage to the community, as the constant pressure upon the musicians has had a tendency to somewhat counterbalance the good effects of a more frequent playing together of the better class of orchestral work. The difficulties which the conductors have had to contend with at rehearsals are little known by the general public, and many a false note or poorly played passage has had to be corrected because the men have attempted to do too much work to do it properly. The services of these comparatively few good orchestral players are in constant demand, not only in Boston but all over New England, and many times men have come to rehearsal at 9 o'clock in the morning after having played in the hot and vitiated air of the ball room until long after midnight, and then with only a hasty nap caught in the cars or at the railroad station while waiting for an early morning train. It was with a view of

REMEDYING THESE TROUBLES.

as well as applying a more just system of payment for services rendered, that the symphony concert management decided upon the form of notice issued to the members on Monday making a proposition for their services for next season. The proposition made to each musician whose services are desired is for his entire time on the Wednesdays (day and evening), Thursdays (day and evening), Fridays (day), and Saturdays (forenoon and evening), from Oct. 1, 1882, to April 1, 1883. For these services graded prices are offered, varying from $21 to $35 per week, and the stipulations are made that no leisure hours during the time specified shall be given to playing under any other conductor than Mr. Georg Henschel, and that no member of the orchestra shall play for dancing on the days or evenings named. An exception is made allowing the orchestra players to give any leisure hours they may have to rehearsals for concerts by the Handel and Haydn Society. The proposition was very generally discussed, as intimated above, and, after the rehearsal yesterday morning, a meeting was called, with closed doors, to decide what action should be taken. In the absence of Mr. Listemann, the concert master, who, by the way, has been re-engaged by special contract, the issue was stated by Mr. C. N. Allen, the next first violin of the orchestra. So far as known, not a single man signified a willingness to accept the terms offered; though, as the question was put to each individual separately, a few may have accepted. The general sentiment was, however, against accepting the offers made. The

RESULT OF THIS ACTION

will be awaited with considerable interest by all who realize the importance of the principles it involves. It is an entirely practicable plan for the management of these concerts to go to Vienna or to any of the large German musical centres and engage an orchestra for the season of the best material and bring it to this country, as the expense would be less than that of employing the orchestra of last season at the prices contained in the proposition for their services next season. Thousands of good musicians can be had abroad who would gladly avail themselves of a six months' engagement in this country, with a certain assured income and one-half their time to look about and arrange for permanently locating here. Such an importation would result beneficially in many ways. Mr. Henschel would have a body of men knowing only him as a leader, and who would feel an esprit de corps which would lead them to work hard to create a name for the orchestra. It would also tend to give a little healthier competition among the instrumentalists of the city, and, by reducing the price paid for services of this character, make it possible to sustain orchestral concerts at the low prices now charged for those of the Boston Symphony orchestra without the generous patronage of their founder. Whatever action may be taken by the musicians of this orchestra, the concerts will be continued next season, with Mr. Georg Henschel as conductor, and the programme presented will be properly rehearsed by musicians whose entire energies can be commanded by their leader while they are under his baton.

Have Musicians any rights that directors are bound to respect?

This is the question that a good many people have been asking in Boston the past few days. The issue presented by Mr. Georg Henschel, the conductor of the deservedly successful Boston symphony concerts, was sufficiently plain. He practically says to the Boston musicians: "I propose to do what I can to crowd out other symphony concert series. You must give four days of the week exclusively to the work of the Boston Symphony course. By way of relaxation, a concert or two under the management of the esteemed Handel and Haydn Society may be permitted. But above all things you mustn't play at those wicked dancing parties." It had been intimated darkly that in case of non-compliance with the portentous requirements just noted that players would be imported from Vaterland and other countries to take the place of the recalcitrants. But even this did not deter the musicians from voting, by a majority of rather more than three to one, not to accept the propositions submitted by Mr. Henschel. It remains to be seen whether Germany will of her abundance be called upon to take the place of the thirty odd gentlemen who decline the proffer, or whether the management of the Boston Symphony concerts will conclude to gracefully retire from their position, in deference to the wishes of the great majority of musicians who have accomplished such good results for the cause of good orchestral music in the modern Athens. It may not be too audacious to drop just this hint to the gentlemen who are so ready to formulate schemes for other people to carry out. If you wish to engage a man for a week's duties, it is no more than fair that you should pay him a full week's salary. And if you wish to "pre-empt" a man's services for four out of six days of the working week, you should "pay accordin'," as the old woman would say. Mr. Henschel's circular asked the musicians to give up to the organization the day and evening of Wednesday and Thursday, the morning and afternoon of Friday, and the morning and evening of Saturday in each week, from October 1, 1882, to April 1, 1883. They were not necessarily to play in all the hours of this reserved time, but they were to be ready to answer whenever called for, and they were prohibited from playing for dancing by this little agreement. But the scheme has fallen through, and we are glad of it. Monopoly is a bad thing in orchestral concerts, as it is in everything else; and Boston can much better afford to get along without Mr. Henschel than allow any manager to "crowd out" all orchestral concerts not under that gentleman's direction. If the Henschel direction chooses to import a score or two of Dinkelspleis and Eisenbahn-wagens from Germany, we fancy there are enough music-lovers here to organize and cordially support a new series of symphony concerts that shall be distinctively Bostonian in character under Boston management, and enlisting the services of Boston musicians, who do not propose to vield to "one-man power" in their professional any more than in their private life.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A circular was sent on Monday to the principal orchestral musicians of Boston, and their decision in regard to its contents was requested for today. Although this document was intended only for the persons to whom it was addressed, yet one or two points in it are of such consequence to the entire musical public, that it is proper to refer to it in this place. It relates to the Boston symphony concerts for next year, and bears the indorsement of their guarantor. During the next season, as during that just closing, Mr. Georg Henschel is to be director, and Mr. Bernhard Listemann leader of the violins. The circular invites the musicians to give up to the organization the day and evening of Wednesday and Thursday, the morning and afternoon of Friday, and the morning and evening of Saturday, in each week, from October 1, 1882, to April 1, 1883. They are not necessarily to play in all the hours of this reserved time, but they are to be ready to answer whenever called for, and they are prohibited from playing for dancing.

It is equally easy to find reasons in favor of these rules and to make objections to them. In a certain sense it is purely a matter between the promoter of the concerts and the individual members of the orchestra. But in an important sense the public also is interested, particularly if the effect should be to interfere with series of concerts in a way rivals of Mr. Higginson's enterprise. The necessity of full preparation, and the desirability of concentrating the public interest on one series only of orchestral concerts are strong reasons in favor of them; but it would be a pity if the result were to cripple or extinguish societies that have played a good part in our musical history, in giving success, perhaps, for only a year, to a series of concerts which are dependent upon the continued public spirit of one gentleman. Strong feeling in reference to the rules has been expressed already, and it is much to be feared that a division, already too great, will be widened and deepened as the discussion proceeds.

Those Orchestra Contracts.

The issue between the management of the Boston Symphony orchestra and its members relative to the renewal of the contracts for their services for next season has been very generally discussed during the last few days, and, naturally enough, some misunderstandings have arisen in regard to the merits of the case. Briefly stated, the issue is this: For 20 weeks the members of the orchestra have received $6 each for 26 concerts, and $3 each for from three to five rehearsals (of three hours each) a week, their time being their own when not thus engaged. For next season the management, with a view of securing better results, demands the entire time of the musicians on Wednesday (day and evening), Thursday (day and evening), Friday (day) and Saturday (forenoon and evening), offering (from Oct. 1, 1882, to April 1, 1883) from $21 to $35 per week for such service. In making the offer for next season, the management has departed from the custom of former years, and rated the several musicians according to their relative value as members of the orchestra, instead of offering a uniform sum for each and every man. In doing this the management appears to have but recognized the universal law of supply and demand, which will not stop short in its operations merely because it affects the interests of the musicians engaged in this orchestra. A mistaken idea has been given in regard to the position taken by the orchestra in this matter. It has not decided, as a body, to decline the offer made, but on the contrary quite a number of its members have signified their willingness to continue their services at the prices offered, and still others admit that it is high time that a discrimination should be made between the value of the several classes of musicians in an orchestra. Naturally some of the members of the organization complain of the discrimination made, but, if certain instrumental players are more in demand than others, there appear to be no good reason why some discrimination should not be made. It appears to be the desire of the management to contract directly with every member of the orchestra for his individual services, and the only business basis upon which such a contract can be made is the value of the services of each individual to the orchestra. There is nothing compulsory about the contracts. The musicians have a perfect right to hold their services for a higher bid if they so elect, and, on the other side, the management has a perfect right to secure the orchestra for next season at prices which are fair, just and equitable for the services demanded. The way in which the concerts of this orchestra have been maintained thus far should prevent any fair-minded person from imputing other than liberal, public-spirited intentions to its management; and it would be difficult to find another scheme of concerts the world over with the reliable financial backing possessed by those of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The following letter presents a different view of this issue:

To the Editor of the Herald: I think there is a side to this matter concerning the players forming the Boston Symphony orchestra, which ought to be made public in justice to the musicians themselves, and in explanation of the position in which other concert-giving organizations would have been placed if the players had accepted the proposition made them. It is a matter of vital importance to the musicians, as well as to the societies which have employed them in the past, whether the movements of the former are to be so restricted that they cannot pursue their profession with profit to themselves, and continue their connection with the latter, as before the advent of Mr. Henschel, or whether they must submit to the ultimatum of the manager of the symphony concerts in order to prevent the possible importation of musicians to fill their places if they do not accept his proposition. From the conditions imposed it will be seen that the contracts are skillfully drawn, and that all the time of the players for the four days named is virtually absorbed. Mr. Higginson has the right to make this proposition, and there is no doubt but that, if its provisions could be carried out, the orchestra might be brought to a higher state of discipline and better results obtained. But, under the circumstances, it would be an arbitrary hold upon our local orchestra, that for several reasons should be deprecated by all interested in enterprises employing the services of an orchestra in this city.

The terms offered the players range from $21 to $35 per week, according to the conductor's idea of the value of their services to him. That is, he regards the second violin, viola, cello and bass players, if we understand rightly, as of less value in an orchestra than the first violins. The musicians feel this rating of their worth very keenly, for the players have always been accustomed to receive an equal sum for their services upon all occasions since the beginning of the efforts of the oldest member of the orchestra.

Then, again, the prices offered are much below the sums realized by the players during the six months named in the contract. Many of them are teachers, who can earn more than the above amounts in the four days absorbed by their orchestral duties, beside having their nights at their own disposal, enabling them to play for parties or in a theatre orchestra. The latter would net them $21 per week, with the privilege of accepting better engagements occasionally by sending a suitable substitute to the theatre. These would be reasons enough for them to refuse the terms proposed for next season. To their credit, however, they dwell more upon the fact that they will be deprived of the opportunity of playing for the various societies which have for so many years employed them at their concerts. The musicians regard this scheme, if carried out, as a sort of monopoly, which would tend to crush all other enterprises requiring an orchestra, or compel them to go to Mr. Henschel for assistance, who would become dictator as regards orchestral performances if they signed away their liberty to play under any one else than him.

They feel it their duty to stand by their former employers, who would be unable otherwise to carry on their established plans if they could engage players for rehearsals and concerts upon two days only in each week. It looks too much like their assisting Mr. Henschel to say, if you want a conductor and orchestra, you can have one by hiring me.

This, the musicians say, weighed as heavily in their minds as an argument against accepting the proposals made them as did the matter of their being obliged to be satisfied with a much less sum than they could easily realize independent of the Boston symphony concerts.

They feel that the manager of those concerts stands before the musical public in the light of a philanthropist, and they ought not to be expected to contribute toward the support of the concerts through binding themselves to play for less money than they can earn otherwise if not compelled to conform to the restrictions of the proposed contract.

The public must not think the musicians ungrateful if they do not accept an offer by which they would in most cases sacrifice one-half their income and leave their old employers, the Philharmonic Society, Harvard Musical Association, Apollo, Cecilia and Boylston clubs out in the cold, allowing only the time-honored Handel and Haydn Society to exist through the permission of an orchestral autocrat, for such would Mr. Henschel be if the musicians had accepted the proposition offered them.

WARREN DAVENPORT.

The discussion of the Boston Symphony orchestra circular has been a prominent element in many musical circles the past week. The following conversation was inadvertently overheard:

Excited member of orchestra—No, sir; I will never play for such a monopolist. I will not sell myself to no man. I will play where I like.

A bystander—Say, Carl, you'll sign the contract for $40 a week, won't you?

Member of orchestra—Of course I will.

MONOPOLY IN MUSIC.

Saratte, N. H., 82.

A bombshell was dropped into the musical camp last week in the shape of a circular addressed to the musicians who have been performing at the Boston Symphony Concerts. It was a speculative attempt to create a musical monopoly here next year. In brief, it proposed that the musicians should bind themselves to Mr. Higginson for the mornings, afternoons and evenings of every Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday from October 1 to April 1. On the days specified it is demanded that the musicians shall not play in any other orchestra or under any other conductor than Mr. Henschel, an exception being made in favor of such leisure hours as they may want to devote to the Handel and Haydn Society. The days and nights named are the only ones of the week whereon concerts may be given with advantage, including as they do those to which our public have become most accustomed for this purpose. Besides, all rehearsals for other concerts are shut completely off. Musicians generally are laughing at the proposition, especially at the condescending manner in which they are permitted to dispose of their leisure hours exclusively to the Handel and Haydn Society. One or two of the orchestra, justly indignant at the insulting proposition that would destroy their liberty of action and make them hangers-on to Mr. Henschel, at once resigned permanently from all future connection with the orchestra, and it may be said in favor of the manhood of the majority of the members that they declined to accept the humiliating conditions. If, instead of holding out the plain intimation that the places of those refusing to accede to this contract could be filled by musicians from abroad, Mr. Higginson had wisely sent abroad for Carl Reinecke or some other equally experienced and competent conductor, he would have done a greater service for the benefit of that musical art in which he professes to take so great an interest.

It would be a misfortune indeed for the progress of music in Boston, if its best interests were confined to the keeping of Mr. Henschel, whose incapacity to fill the position to which he was so strangely and unaccountably called has been made manifest through the whole series of concerts given under his direction. We entertain the belief that he has been a decided injury to the cause of music here. Nearly every great work he has conducted has been misinterpreted by him, and this so persistently that it would appear as though in the very few instances in which he has not erred it was by happy accident rather than by premeditation. Under these circumstances, to confine what is best in musical art to his sole keeping for a season, would be a calamity that could not be too deeply deplored. If we are to have another season of Mr. Henschel it is more than ever necessary that we should not be left without an antidote to him. Were he really an able man in the place he occupies, the attempt to make him supreme here would be objectionable enough; but in view of the cold facts of the case, his consent to the move to exclude more experienced, more intelligent and more competent conductors from the field is a display of conceited egotism as outrageous as it is unwarranted.

The idea that we shall have no concerts save those which Mr. Higginson vouchsafes us, and no other conductor than Mr. Henschel, cannot be tolerated for a moment. Fashion and money can do a great deal. They can foist incompetency into favor and position, but they cannot be permitted to stamp out of existence all who have done truer services to musical art than him upon whom they have set the seal of approval, simply for the purpose of removing rivalry from the path of one whose shortcomings are made too apparent in the glare of better work than he has shown a capacity to perform.

Under the conditions of this oppressive contract, the more fastidious who object to Mr. Henschel's misreadings and his sensational methods have either to forego attending orchestral concerts next season, or else to be put to the expense and the inconvenience of bringing another orchestra from New York, in order that they may hear the great masters of the art interpreted in a manner which shall not offend their common sense and revolt their taste. We do not believe that the musicians of Boston will consent to any such arrogant conditions as have been proposed for their acceptance; or that they will, at the expense of all that is true in the art they follow, link themselves indissolubly with one who took them in hand in utter ignorance of the conductor's art, and who has learned so little of it under supreme advantages that never before fell to the lot of inexperience. A monopoly of this description, which takes musical art by the throat and insists that it shall place itself solely in the keeping of one who has proved incapable of guiding it properly, and that it shall also cut itself loose from all chance of assistance from stronger and better skilled hands, is an idea that could scarcely have emanated from any association except that of deluded wealth with arrant charlatanism.

Boston Symphony Orchestra—A Statement.

Now that the first season of the Boston symphony orchestra is drawing to an immediate close, it might be well to say a few words, as from one who knows, about its maintenance and its permanence as an institution, two points which would seem to have been but vaguely understood or appreciated by the majority of the concert-going public.

Last year, when Mr. Higginson told us that he was going to give us an orchestra, to have and to hold, he did it in so few words, and in so quiet and almost over-modest a manner, that, perhaps, it was natural that many of us should not have really understood the nature of his donation. The fact is that he gives to Boston a standing orchestra, just as another might give a library or a collection of pictures, to be enjoyed for such very moderate prices that the pleasure and privilege is open to all. And this is not for one year, or for two years, but for all the years that we will enjoy it by being interested and educated and comforted by it. The material of which this orchestra may be composed, and the artist who may conduct it, will always be the best that can be found here, or brought from over the seas to recruit the ranks. This is not an enterprise, or a business speculation, and the terms loss and gain, which we have heard so often lately relating to it, are not in its conception or nature. The expenses of outlay are so very much larger than any possible income of receipts could be that if the plain figures could only be seen there would be no misconception in any one's mind.

192

Of the many worries and the annoying details which have necessarily attended the carrying out, single-handed, of this wide and serious plan, of the patience and forbearance which have been shown, not only to misconception, but to malicious and futile detraction, we say nothing because silence is best and worthiest; and we say no word of thanks to the giver of this good thing, because we know that he wants no thanks in words. But we do think it right that all the people who have been to the concerts this year, feeling that they could enjoy good music with no strain upon their purses to interfere with their pleasure, and all those who shall go next year, should know what is being done for them and for their children. In their gratification will be his gladdest reward. adv. XXX.

MUSIC AND DRAMA.

As the musical season draws to a close the talk among musical people of plans for the next season grows more animated. What may be Mr. Higginson's plans for his second season of popular orchestral concerts many would like to know; but they have not yet been announced. Certain it is, however, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is to be a fixed institution. The success of this season assures its permanence. It has been observed this winter that the highest classes of musical entertainments have drawn the best; and it is has been frequently the case that on a "big" night at the theatres a classical concert has drawn as large an audience as when the attractions elsewhere have been less inviting. So the hope is entertained by some of the musical people of the city who are for steadily raising the standard higher that somebody may be induced to persuade Hans Richter of Vienna, or Saint-Saëns of Paris, or Carl Reinecke, the director of the Gewandhaus concerts of Leipzig, to come to Boston for a long season and give the city a taste of the sort of work they have abroad. One piece of musical gossip about is that the members of the symphony orchestra may consider a proposition to form a closer combination for next season, agreeing to play only at its own concerts; but this is not at all likely. Another piece of gossip is that some of the musical club people, not quite satisfied with what the existing clubs are doing—some dissatisfied with the introduction of female voices into the Boylston Club, others with the too high art aimed at by the Apollo Club—are proposing to form a new singers' club. The movement is scarcely started, and whether it will come to anything will soon be seen. [Boston Correspondent Springfield Republican.]

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

XX. CONCERT.

(The last of the First Season.)

SATURDAY, MARCH 11TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PRELUDE from the music to "Œdipus Tyrannus." . . . PAINE.
(Conducted by the Composer.)

TRIO FOR SOPRANO, TENOR AND BASS, from Psalm CXXX., op. 31 . . . HENSCHEL.

"If Thou, Lord, shouldst number transgressions, who shall abide it? But with Thee is forgiveness, that we may fear Thee."—

WEDDING MARCH, from the music to Shakespeare's Midsummernight's Dream, op. 61. . . MENDELSSOHN.

THE NINTH (CHORAL) SYMPHONY. . . BEETHOVEN.
In D-minor, op. 125.

SOLOISTS:

Mrs. HUMPHREY-ALLEN, Soprano,
Miss MARY H. HOW, Contralto,
Mr. CHARLES R. ADAMS, Tenor,
Mr. V. CIRILLO, Bass.

194

THE NINTH SYMPHONY.

BEETHOVEN.

- I. Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso.—
- II. Molto Vivace. Presto.—
Molto Vivace. Presto.—
- III. Adagio molto e cantabile. Andante moderato.
Tempo primo. Andante moderato. Adagio.—
- IV. Presto. [Recitative for Basses, interspersed with changes of movement: Allegro ma non troppo—Vivace—Adagio cantabile—Allegro assai.]
Allegro assai. Presto.—

RECITATIVE: O dearest brothers, these tones no longer!
(Bass.) Rather, let us raise together now our voices,
And sing more joyfully!

SOLI AND CHORUS: SCHILLER'S "ODE TO JOY."

Joy, thou spark of heavenly brightness,
Daughter from Elysium!
Hearts on fire, with step of lightness,
On thy holy ground we come.

Thou canst bind all, each to other,
Custom sternly rends apart,
All mankind are friend and brother
Where thy soft wing fans the heart.

He whom happy fate has granted
Friend to have and friend to be,
Faithful wife who never wanted,
Mingle in our jubilee;

Yea, who in his heart's sure keeping
Counts but one true soul his own.
Who cannot—oh, let him weeping
Steal away and live alone.

Joy all living things are drinking,
Nature's breasts for all do flow;
Good and evil, all unthinking,
On her rosy way we go.

Kisses gave she, wine-crowned leisure,
Friend in death, aye, true to friends.
Meanest worm hath sense of pleasure,
Before God the Seraph stands.

Joyous as yon orbs in gladness
Speed along their path on high,
Brothers, come! Away with sadness,
Let us on to victory.

Oh, embrace now, all ye millions!
Here's a kiss to all the world.
Brothers, o'er yon azure fold
Is a loving Father's dwelling.

Why on bended knees, ye millions!
Feel ye your Creator near?
Search beyond that boundless sphere
High among the star pavilions.

195

Boston Music Hall.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

SECOND SEASON.

1882-83.

At the first Concert, which will take place in October,
ANTON RUBINSTEIN'S NEW SYMPHONY
IN G-MINOR (No. 5, op. 107) will be performed, and
MR. CARL BÄRMANN will play SCHUMANN'S
PIANOFORTE-CONCERTO IN A-MINOR.

CLOSE OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Admission
Features of the Final Concert of the Series on Saturday Evening; Performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony; a Review of the Season—Mr. Thaxter's Readings—Notes.

A performance of Beethoven's ninth, or "choral," symphony is so unusual an occurrence in this country, that it may well pass for the chief event of a musical season; and it is therefore not to be wondered at that the last concert of the Boston symphony orchestra quite filled the Music hall on Saturday evening, nor that the preliminary rehearsal attracted a concourse of amateurs and of the curious, which far exceeded the capacity of the building. The announcement of this work had been made some two months ago, the composition of the chorus and the conduct of the rehearsals had created a strong personal interest, and the general public had been stirred both by the rarity of any hearing of the symphony; and by the special effectiveness which was expected from this particular rendering.

At this late day no analysis of Beethoven's final achievement in this department of his art need be offered, nor do we care to add anything to the many metaphysical or sentimental attempts which have been made to trace his thought and his feeling from passage to passage and say just what he must have meant by each. We know that this symphony, like the others represents the ultimate aggregation and elaboration of many ideas which are to be found scattered through his note-books. Beethoven's character, with all its intense and often overbearing individuality,—egotism, we might say,—was yet, in what related to his art, grand and broad and intent upon the illimitable abstract rather than upon any mere concretion of it. If he insisted with his copyists upon their not confounding minor technical signs, it was not because he had happened to write just those signs, but because they alone corresponded exactly to the idea which had dawned in his mind and developed under his hand. We heard an eminent painter once say that he wished a certain letter-writer would never visit his studio; "for," said he, "she finds so many things in my pictures which I never dreamed of and which are utterly foreign to my thought and intention, that she makes me a deal of trouble when other visitors come and want to see these imaginations of hers." And so perhaps, if we simply consider the ninth symphony as Beethoven's expression of his ideal of humanity's highest and greatest moods—moods in which doubt, deliberation and vacillation have their part as well as desire, energy and hope—we shall have a theme sufficient to explain without more detail the meaning of this stupendous composition. That such a theme should require the human voice for its full expression is only reasonable, for (to paraphrase crudely a remark of Emerson) language and its significant qualifications are only accorded to the human soul, and "what know we greater than the soul?" Therefore, when the full orchestra has reached its height of eloquence, what more fitting than that a simple and sonorous recitative of the bass strings should usher in the entrance of a single bass voice calling upon all other human voices to unite in a pæan of praise and devotion even as the morning stars sung together, and that the responsive chorus should rise high and loud above every instrumental harmony?

A performance of this symphony offers some peculiar difficulties. Of these the most obvious are such as relate to the vocal portion. In order to carry out such a feeling as we have just ventured to intimate, the voices must be urged to the very top of their compass, they must sustain their lofty notes with a jubilant confidence and determination, and they must, on the other hand, not infrequently execute fluent phrases with ease and brilliancy. When one remembers the gradual elevation of the standard pitch since Beethoven's time, he will recognize how difficult it is for singers to meet the requirements of the more arduous passages without shouting or screaming. The present chorus, which consisted of about two hundred select voices, was generally satisfactory; the volume of tone was good, the long high notes taken without shrillness, and the singing prompt, although by no means rich in variety. The solo portions of the choral movement were assigned, for the soprano, to Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, whose pure voice rose clearly to the highest phrases; for the bass, to Signor Cirillo, whose fine cultivation was apparent in the ease and distinctness of the more rapid phrases; and for the middle parts to Miss How and Mr. Adams, who was a little over-weighted by the trying music of the tenor part. In their union the solo voices were not so satisfactory, for although they generally came together, there were many instants when they were not going together.

But the greatest difficulties and dangers lie in the general conduct of the work. Every musical student knows with what patient and devoted labor Beethoven wrought herein, and the score leaves testimony to the care he gave to such annotations as should help all honest and humble readers to catch and convey his varied meaning. And we have already been reminded that every minutest sign which he inscribed upon his manuscript had a real and not a conventional character, and cannot be disregarded without doing a wrong to the spirit and the memory of the master. It is as though we had a series of marginal glosses in Shakespeare's own writing, expressly instructing how some scene or some soliloquy should be spoken and acted. That Mr. Henschel did not adhere to Beethoven's injunctions we scarcely need to say. It is now a fixed fact that he either cannot or will not follow his author except so far as it seems good to him. And while the orchestra were hurrying—often heavily and sometimes confusedly—through those splendid movements, of which the time and the expression are full of minute and sudden changes, wherein a few bars of an adagio or an allegro are alternated with an andante or a presto, and delicately significant emphases color every phrase, we could not help recalling Beethoven's own complaint after hearing a rehearsal of his "Magic Flute" overture. "I might as well have spared myself," he writes in effect, "the pains of inserting my various marks of expression if they are to be disregarded by a conductor who plays the loud and the soft, the fast and the slow, in one and the same fashion of his own." And to those who are inclined to think that judgment a harsh one which has condemned the conductor of these concerts for persisting in reading his classic selections according to his own determination or his momentary mood, we would merely recall the dictum of Robert Schuman, who is we think as good an authority as any of us good Bostonians, or even of Mr. Henschel himself,—that the player has no right to thrust himself before the author, and that when we hear of a musician giving his idea of a composition in preference to that of the composer, we hear of that which should not be, and which, when it happens, should be sternly reprobated, and not praised as a merit. But while we feel unable to commend this performance as a whole, we must note that the first movement was led steadily until toward the end, when it fell off greatly, that parts of the second (the vivaci in particular) were brightly and spiritedly carried, and that the third had a gracious quality of tone, albeit it was but unexpressively and inflexibly read. The orchestra was allowed a comparatively small space, on account of the chorus, and the second violins and violas in consequence were tucked away behind the first in such a way as to be almost undistinguishable; the basses were very thick in many runs, although finely significant in their recitative, and the hautboy part in the second movement was beautifully delivered.

The concert began with Mr. Paine's prelude to the "Edipus," conducted by himself, and wonderfully well played; it was the best orchestral work of the evening. After this came a trio for soprano, tenor and bass, sung by singers whom we have named above, and composed by Mr. Henschel to words from Psalm cxxx. The theme is a pleasant and easy one, fluently set somewhat in canon fashion; the accompaniment is not elaborate, and the trio ought to be a favorite with the abler church choirs. The first part of the programme ended with Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," which had a strange and incongruous effect, especially as it was played much more as if it were a military triumph than as the conclusion of such a fine and fairy drama as the "Midsummer Night's Dream."

The audience was a very fashionable one, and in the most enthusiastic mood, applauding, after its earlier manner, the bad as liberally as the good, and fairly compelling Mr. Henschel to come forward at the end of the concert and receive its special commendation. And so ended a series of concerts which could not have received more praise and admiration from the majority of the audiences if it had been planned and led by Benedict or Mann, Reinecke or Pasdeloup, if what was old had been treated with respect, and if the new had had higher qualities than novelty. That these concerts have been principally attended by the élite of "society," well able to pay for more costly entertainments, and that the poorer music-lovers, in whose interest the concerts were presumably established, were therefore unable to profit by them, there can be no question. Just how much enduring good has been done by causing a great orchestra to give to large audiences such notions concerning standard works as we have heard no musician or critic of authority approve, is a very grave question. This paper has too long been known as frank and independent, for our assurance to be needed that its criticism looks beyond all individuals, in whatever department of art they labor, to the character and the future of the art itself. And it is, therefore, with honest and respectful doubt that we try to reconcile the semi-authoritative statement of our recent correspondent, "X. X. X.," that the best men, whether as subordinates or leaders, are to be procured for these symphony concerts, with the reëngagement of the conductor whose direction has been so far from blameless. Be this as it may, we are never despondent for art or for the truth; and, in the long-run, perhaps interest may be more stimulated and true taste more developed when there are errors to note, faults to censure, and judgments to compare, than when even consummate excellence pursues an uneventful, unprovoking course, accepted, unchallenged and untested.

The second series is announced to begin in October next with a concert at which (D. V.) Rubinstein's new symphony will be brought out, and when that fine artist and true musician, Professor Baermann, will be heard in Schumann's A-minor concerto.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The series of 20 concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, which was concluded last evening, has been so successfully conducted that it is difficult to overestimate its effect upon the musical interests of the city and its vicinity. It has, in the rehearsals and concerts, given opportunities to between 5000 and 6000 people each week to hear the great master works of the world's composers presented in a way calculated to reveal all their beauties and at a most reasonable expense. The concerts have not been all that is desirable, but, considering the obstacles which have stood in the way, and only such as should be, in all fairness, considered, the success which has attended the presentation of the several programmes has been such as to reflect great credit upon the management, the conductor and the orchestral players. Mr. Henschel's abilities as a musician have been at all times too plainly demonstrated to admit of a question as to their value to such an undertaking, and it is a matter for public congratulation that he is to retain his position at the head of the orchestra another season. The broad catholicity shown in the scheme of programmes presented deserves special commendation, and, if at times there has seemed to be a tendency to leave out from an evening's selections the lighter and restful element which goes so far to retain the interest of the average listener, it may be urged with all truth that the public has shown a keen appreciation of the most severely classical programmes that have been presented. In the selection of soloists there appear to have been some mistakes made; but, if it is remembered that artists of the first ability have become musical luxuries, and beyond the limit of reason in their charges, an explanation of this fault in the season's scheme will be found. While a soloist makes a pleasant variety in any orchestral concert, it would seem desirable to avoid the employment of artists who are honored by an appearance in such a series of programmes rather than add merit by their presence. It is gratifying to know that the best element in the orchestra has taken a sober second thought in regard to the proposition made for next season by the management, and that now the musicians begin to realize that the maintenance of this orchestra means something more to them than a certain weekly stipend. With such a series of orchestral concerts insured for every season, a new life will be put into the development of the musical interests of the city, and results of great benefit to the profession must of necessity follow. The cry of "monopoly," which has been raised in some quarters against the continuance of this scheme of concerts under the conditions contemplated, is almost too absurd for serious consideration. The continuance of these concerts another season simply means an additional number of musicians for this city, and, while the men who have unreasonably overworked themselves during the last season to fill the constantly recurring engagements will find their incomes reduced by the influx of new musicians, the public will be benefited by having a sufficient number of orchestral players to do the work of the city in this line properly. Had a professional manager come into the city and embarked for a possible profit upon such an enterprise as is contemplated, and has been thus far successfully carried out by Mr. Higginson, it is doubtful if the cry of "monopolist" would ever have been heard, and it is a little difficult to appreciate its application to a gentleman who is willing to expend whatever amount is needed to sustain these concerts for the benefit of his fellow-citizens. A fair estimate of the expense of the series of concerts just closed gives $42,000 as the aggregate cost of their maintenance, and of this sum about $32,000 has been probably returned by the sales of rehearsal and concert tickets, leaving a deficit of about $10,000 to represent Mr. Higginson's endowment in aid of the musical education of the city for the season. A few more "monopolists" of this description can find an ample field for their efforts in this city. The following announcement of the first concert of the second season was made in last evening's programme: At the first concert, which will take place in October, Anton Rubinstein's new symphony in G minor (No. 5, op. 107) will be performed, and Mr. Carl Bärmann will play Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor.

Gazette March 12—1892

The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The twentieth and last of the first series of Boston Symphony Concerts took place at Music Hall last night. The principal feature of the programme was Beethoven's Choral Symphony. We can scarcely find fitting words to express the indignant astonishment with which the performance of this masterpiece filled us. The reading was not only childishly bombastic, but it was silly and unmeaning. That the tempi were hurried goes without saying; the playing was so persistently noisy that there was scarcely anything in the way of contrast. In many places there was such a scrambling among the various instruments that nothing but confusion resulted. The strings sawed unmercifully, and at times were with difficulty kept together. The singing was no worse than is usual in this work; in fact, it was fully as good as the best we have had, but there was a lack of unity occasionally in the concerted pieces, and oftener in the choruses, that was anything but pleasing in effect, especially when added to the screaming that was inevitable. The whole affair would have been laughable in the disparity between its pompous pretence and the weakness of its achievement were it not for the enormity of the outrage it perpetrated. If we may be permitted to indulge in a bull, we would say that could Beethoven have heard this brutal crucifixion of his greatest work, he would have rejoiced in his deafness. A more blustering, absurd and inefficient reading and performance of this symphony it would be difficult to imagine. The first movement was ruined from the outset by the pace at which it was taken and by the roughness and the vulgarity that permeated its reading. To chronicle the errors the conductor perpetrated would present so much that was disheartening to contemplate, so much that was distressing to every really sensitive musical nature, so much that was ignorant, self-sufficient and swaggering in style that we have not the courage to attempt it. Mr. Henschel conducted without the score, probably to indicate that he knew the work by heart; but as his leading of this symphony was the worst of all the bad work he has done this season, we incline to the opinion that it would have been better if he had not trusted to his memory. With the music before him he would have been reminded that the composer had not left his score without certain marks of expression, and that it was not intended to be an apotheosis of noise. The theme is too painful to dwell upon, and scarcely deserves serious criticism. To add to the ridiculous aspect of the whole comes the packed audience, which applauded to the echo this coarse assault upon the greatest triumph of Beethoven's genius! It is melancholy, discouraging, dismaying to reflect upon the other pieces on the programme were the noble prelude from Prof. Paine's "Edipus" music, which was led by the composer, and with fine effect; a Trio for soprano, tenor and bass from Psalm 130, by Mr. Henschel, a flowing work, admirably arranged for the voices, and very pleasing; and Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," which was not only out of place in such a programme, but which was hurried in the conductor's most confusing and most fluent manner. When we add that the soloists in the symphony were Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, Miss Mary H. How, Mr. C. R. Adams and Mr. V. Cirillo, and that they acquitted themselves acceptably, we have said all that we find necessary to say about the concert.

In looking back upon these concerts and reviewing them as a whole, we cannot but regret the inadequacy of the results obtained under conditions which at the outset appeared to be exceptionally favorable. Nor can we but grieve that such few opportunities were afforded us of saying anything favorable of the performances. It has been charged in some quarters that we have been over severe in our strictures; but we feel that we have never penned one word more than our sense of justice and our regard for the interests of what is right and what is best in musical art imperatively demanded. We have never hesitated to object in the strongest and plainest terms to unwarranted pretension in the sphere of art. We have always been among the first to recognize and to encourage genuine talent, whether in its incipient or in its fully developed stages, and have been careful to judge all artists from their own standpoints. We have never censured an artist for not performing more than he or she pretended to perform. It is only those whose pretensions are greater than their power of achievement who have fallen under our strictures. The wrong person in the right person's place cannot be tolerated in art as long as there is a right person to put there. There are already too many conscientious and gifted students who have labored long and hard for a position in the crowded realm of art, waiting for the opportunity which never comes to them, but which is given without the asking to others less deserving. There are already too many who have devoted their lives to win deserved repute in art, and who have achieved it, to make it possible to look with complacency upon their places occupied by others who have neither the training nor the experience to fill it properly. That the leading musicians with whom we have come in contact during the past four or five months have heartily agreed with the judgments we have given and the opinions we have expressed regarding these concerts is for us a sufficient endorsement of our course. When the surgeon is forced to use the knife to save his patient, he must necessarily give pain, and its severity is not complained of when the cure is effected. The circumstances connected with the projecting and the carrying out of the series of musical performances just concluded surrounded them with almost unprecedented interest. All things being equal, they should have proved a benefit to the progress of musical art in our midst. As it has turned out, they have proved an injury upon almost every score. We have so frequently dwelt upon the incompetency of Mr. Henschel as a conductor, that it is scarcely worth while to refer to his shortcomings in detail again; but it is impossible to sum up his labors without dwelling upon that subject. It is astonishing when we reflect that in no one instance has he fulfilled the demands made upon him by the great works he undertook to interpret. It is scarcely less astonishing that his most pronounced mistakes were those which met with the greatest applause and the largest admiration of the mass of the public for which he catered. All of Beethoven's symphonies were included in his programmes, and not one of them was read in a manner that satisfied a genuine critical taste, even of the most unexact description. It is freely admitted that there is a difference of opinion regarding the precise tempi of these masterpieces, but that is no reason why their plainest indications should be ignored as Mr. Henschel has persistently ignored them. But it is not Beethoven alone who has suffered at his hands. Schubert, Schumann and Haydn have been quite as cruelly maltreated by him. His principal aim seems to have been to read these works in a manner different from that of other conductors, and this fact combined with his faults as a conductor has resulted in a series of readings that have fallen but little short of the ludicrous.

For some reason or other, probably temperamental, Mr. Henschel cannot beat a dozen consecutive bars in the same time. Every crescendo impels him to beat it faster, and every decrescendo to beat slower. He has thrown his own individuality into every symphony he has conducted, and thus caused works the most divergent in style and character to sound exactly alike in effect. He appears to be always braced up to a high-pressure point, and to be incapable of moderation. Finding inexplicable noise and dumb show popular with his audiences, he has indulged them to the top of their bent. In a certain way he is the rage here at present, but had another conductor lacking that glamour of society prestige which has been cast about him shown one-half the shortcomings that Mr. Henschel has shown he would have been laughed to scorn for his presumption in wielding the baton in public before a critical audience. He would be indignantly charged with incapacity; his swaggering time-beating, his posing at the conductor's stand, his casting his eyes on the ground, apparently absorbed in transcendental transports, and his many other little bits of stage effect, would have been stigmatized as charlatanism pure and simple. It is, therefore, well to be favored by the fashionable side of the public. It is true that it is not always the most thoughtful or the most critical side, but it is the most unexact and the most fluent in the expression of unreasoning admiration. In fact, fashion as it manifests its rage for Mr. Henschel, brings vividly to mind the twenty pensive creatures who yearn for and surround that much-worshipped and self-conscious humbug, the platitudinous Bunthorne.

It is urged in some quarters that some of the bad consequences that have attended Mr. Henschel's leading are to be attributed to the fact that his orchestra plays under other conductors than himself, and that therefore, like the babies in "Pinafore," they become mixed. But when they play under other conductors their performances are better than they are under him. Their coarsest, most unsteady and least expressive work has been done when they have been controlled by him. They have been found tractable enough and pliant enough in other hands. And surely other conductors should not be made responsible for his great evil, a constant and tasteless hurrying of the tempi. Some of the works he has misinterpreted have been played by the same performers under other conductors in a thoroughly satisfying manner. The fact is that the fault is wholly with Mr. Henschel, and every intelligent musician in Boston knows it. He came to the conductor's stand without experience, and this circumstance in itself is quite sufficient to determine that he could not possibly succeed in the difficult art he undertook. His improvement has been so slight, and his faults seem to be so radically seated, that we doubt if he will ever achieve favorable distinction as a conductor.

Mr. Higginson set out with the laudable determination of giving concerts of the highest class at popular prices, so that those who could not afford to pay the larger charges that had hitherto prevailed at classical performances should have an opportunity to hear the great masterpieces of musical art. He also stated that he had no intention of antagonizing any existing musical organization. What are the results? At the outset it was made necessary to purchase seats for the entire season, and therefore the best places in the house were disposed of as a rule to any but the class whose interests Mr. Higginson professed to study most. And, moreover, instead of avoiding antagonisms with other societies, he has by his recent action directly inaugurated it by bringing into art the practices of the stock exchange, and attempting to create a corner in musicians. Much has been said of the public spirit manifested by Mr. Higginson in giving these concerts at a price which cannot but result in large pecuniary loss to himself. This is unquestionably praiseworthy as far as his disinterestedness is concerned; but here again he has done an injury to musical art. He has accustomed the public, not only poor but rich, to cheap orchestral concerts, and it now shows a disinclination to attend any others at a higher charge. Those who have not his inexhaustible purse, and who cannot afford to submit to losses as easily as he can, are forced to stand aside, for the prices he has established, and which do not pay him, would simply ruin them. Competition is out of all question, and while this state of affairs lasts there is no resource for those desiring other music and better conducting than his entertainments afford than to give subscription concerts, from which the general public are excluded. Philanthropy and public spirit are very good things when they are not carried to an extent that is dangerous in excess. To assist art by crippling its action is a rather novel way of proceeding, even though hampered by cheerful submission to inevitable pecuniary sacrifice in following the project out. Of course we cordially concede all that may be said in favor of good intentions, but after all a certain place is said to be paved with them. Good intentions are idle if their results are bad.

Mr. Dexter Smith says that he cannot endorse the strictures we made last week upon Mr. Henschel. We are sorry for this, because the endorsement of such an eminent musical authority was of vital necessity to our peace and comfort. As, however, he publishes the most severe paragraph in our article and thus gives it a wider circulation, it is barely possible that he is "sarkastical."

FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Close of the Present Season and Announcement for the Next.

Every effort had been made to prepare a programme for the closing concert of the first series of the Boston Symphony orchestra, which should form a fitting peroration to the brilliant series which was thus to be brought to an end. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was selected for the great feature, but was placed last upon the programme. The opening number was the prelude to Paine's "Edipus Tyrannus," music composed by the composer himself. The gratification of the composer must have been great if it equalled that of the audience at hearing this truly fine composition given with such excellent effect. The music has hardly had so fair an opportunity to be judged on its merits before, and Mr. Paine is to be congratulated on the success of the experiment. His efforts were well appreciated by the audience. Mr. Henschel took this occasion to bring out his trio for soprano, tenor and bass from Psalm cxxx. 31. This also proved most acceptable to the audience. It is so domineering, that the oft-repeated and much-abused wedding march from Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" receives so thorough and grand a rendering as it did last evening, when it was so well given, in fact, as to be almost a revelation. The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven is a work which is seldom produced. The necessity of a large chorus and of soloists, as well as an efficient orchestra, combine to render it an unusual undertaking. Those who were fortunate enough to listen to it last evening (and the number was limited only by the capacity of the hall) must have felt that they indeed enjoyed an uncommon privilege. The large and well-trained chorus was arranged in two groups on each side of the orchestra on rising platforms extending from the stage to the gallery, as in the Handel and Haydn concerts. The soloists included Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, soprano; Miss Mary H. How, contralto; Mr. Charles R.

interests of the city, and results of great benefit to the profession must of necessity follow. The cry of "monopoly," which has been raised in some quarters against the continuance of this scheme of concerts under the conditions contemplated, is almost too absurd for serious consideration. The continuance of these concerts another season simply means an additional number of musicians for this city, and, while the men who have unreasonably overworked themselves during the last season to fill the constantly recurring engagements will find their incomes reduced by the influx of new musicians, the public will be benefited by having a sufficient number of orchestral players to do the work of the city in this line properly. Had a professional manager come into the city and embarked for a possible profit upon such an enterprise as is contemplated, and has been thus far successfully carried out by Mr. Higginson, it is doubtful if the cry of "monopolist" would ever have been heard, and it is a little difficult to appreciate its application to a gentleman who is willing to expend whatever amount is needed to sustain these concerts for the benefit of his fellow-citizens. A fair estimate of the expense of the series of concerts just closed gives $42,000 as the aggregate cost of their maintenance, and of this sum about $32,000 has been probably returned by the sales of rehearsal and concert tickets, leaving a deficit of about $10,000 to represent Mr. Higginson's endowment in aid of the musical education of the city for the season. A few more "monopolists" of this description can find an ample field for their efforts in this city. The following announcement of the first concert of the second season was made in last evening's programme: At the first concert, which will take place in October, Anton Rubinstein's new symphony in G minor (No. 5, op. 107) will be performed, and Mr. Carl Bärmann will play Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor.

Gazette, March 12—1882 The Boston Symphony Concerts.

The twentieth and last of the first series of Boston Symphony Concerts took place at Music Hall last night. The principal feature of the programme was Beethoven's Choral Symphony. We can scarcely find fitting words to express the indignant astonishment with which the performance of this masterpiece filled us. The reading was not only childishly bombastic, but it was silly and unmeaning; the playing was so persistently noisy that there was scarcely anything in the way of contrast. In many places there was such a scrambling among the various instruments that nothing but confusion resulted. The strings sawed unmercifully, and at times were with difficulty kept together. The singing was no worse than is usual in this work; in fact, it was fully as good as the best we have had, but there was a lack of unity occasionally in the concerted pieces, and oftener in the choruses, that was anything but pleasing in effect, especially when added to the screaming that was inevitable. The whole affair would have been laughable in the disparity between its pompous pretence and the weakness of its achievement were it not for the enormity of the outrage it perpetrated. If we may be permitted to indulge in a bull, we would say that could Beethoven have heard this brutal crucifixion of his greatest work, he would have rejoiced in his deafness. A more blustering, absurd and inefficient reading and performance of this symphony it would be difficult to imagine. The first movement was ruined from the outset by the pace at which it was taken and by the roughness and the vulgarity that permeated its reading. To chronicle the errors the conductor perpetrated would present so much that was disheartening to contemplate, so much that was distressing to every really sensitive musical nature, so much that was ignorant, self-sufficient and swaggering in style that we have not the courage to attempt it. Mr. Henschel conducted without the score, probably to indicate that he knew the work by heart; but as his leading of this symphony was the worst of all the bad work he has done this season, we incline to the opinion that it would have been better if he had not trusted to his memory. With the music before him he would have been reminded that the composer had not left his score without certain marks of expression, and that it was not intended to be an apotheosis of noise. The theme is too painful to dwell upon, and scarcely deserves serious criticism. To add to the ridiculous aspect of the whole comes the packed audience, which applauded to the echo this coarse assault upon the greatest triumph of Beethoven's genius! It is melancholy, discouraging, dismaying to reflect upon. The other pieces on the programme were the noble prelude from Prof. Paine's "Edipus" music, which was led by the composer, and with fine effect; a Trio for soprano, tenor and bass from Psalm 130, by Mr. Henschel, a flowing work, admirably arranged for the voices, and very pleasing; and Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," which was not only out of place in such a programme, but which was hurried in the conductor's most confusing and most fluent manner. When we add that the soloists in the symphony were Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, Miss Mary H. How, Mr. C. R. Adams and Mr. V. Cirillo, and that they acquitted themselves acceptably, we have said all that we find necessary to say about the concert.

In looking back upon these concerts and reviewing them as a whole, we cannot but regret the inadequacy of the results obtained under conditions which at the outset appeared to be exceptionally favorable. Nor can we but grieve that such few opportunities were afforded us of saying anything favorable of the performances. It has been charged in some quarters that we have been over severe in our strictures; but we feel that we have never penned one word more than our sense of justice and our regard for the interests of what is right and what is best in musical art imperatively demanded. We have never hesitated to object in the strongest and plainest terms to unwarranted pretension in the sphere of art. We have always been among the first to recognize and to encourage genuine talent, whether in its incipient or in its fully developed stages, and have been careful to judge all artists from their own standpoints. We have never censured an artist for not performing more than he or she pretended to perform. It is only those whose pretensions are greater than their power of achievement who have fallen under our strictures. The wrong person in the right person's place cannot be tolerated in art as long as there is a right person to put there. There are already too many conscientious and gifted students who have labored long and hard for a position in the crowded realm of art, waiting for the opportunity which never comes to them, but which is given without the asking to others less deserving. There are already too many who have devoted their lives to win deserved repute in art, and who have achieved it, to make it possible to look with complacency upon their places occupied by others who have neither the training nor the experience to fill it properly. That the leading musicians with whom we have come in contact during the past four or five months have heartily agreed with the judgments we have given and the opinions we have expressed regarding these concerts is for us a sufficient endorsement of our course. When the surgeon is forced to use the knife to save his patient, he must necessarily give pain, and its severity is not complained of when the cure is effected. The circumstances connected with the projecting and the carrying out of the series of musical performances just concluded surrounded them with almost unprecedented interest. All things being equal, they should have proved a benefit to the progress of musical art in our midst. As it has turned out, they have proved an injury upon almost every score. We have so frequently dwelt upon the incompetency of Mr. Henschel as a conductor, that it is scarcely worth while to refer to his shortcomings in detail again; but it is impossible to sum up his labors without dwelling upon that subject. It is astonishing when we reflect that in no one instance has he fulfilled the demands made upon him by the great works he undertook to interpret. It is scarcely less astonishing that his most pronounced mistakes were those which met with the greatest applause and the largest admiration of the mass of the public for which he catered. All of Beethoven's symphonies were included in his programmes, and not one of them was read in a manner that satisfied a genuine critical taste, even of the most unexact description. It is freely admitted that there is a difference of opinion regarding the precise tempi of these masterpieces, but that is no reason why their plainest indications should be ignored as Mr. Henschel has persistently ignored them. But it is not Beethoven alone who has suffered at his hands. Schubert, Schumann and Haydn have been quite as cruelly maltreated by him. His principal aim seems to have been to read these works in a manner different from that of other conductors, and this fact combined with his faults as a conductor has resulted in a series of readings that have fallen but little short of the ludicrous.

For some reason or other, probably temperamental, Mr. Henschel cannot beat a dozen consecutive bars in the same time. Every crescendo impels him to beat faster, and every decrescendo to beat slower. He has thrown his own individuality into every symphony he has conducted, and thus caused works the most divergent in style and character to sound exactly alike in effect. He appears to be always braced up to a high-pressure point, and to be incapable of moderation. Finding inexplicable noise and dumb show popular with his audiences, he has indulged them to the top of their bent. In a certain way he is the rage here at present, but had another conductor lacking that glamour of society prestige which has been cast about him shown one-half the shortcomings that Mr. Henschel has shown he would have been laughed to scorn for his presumption in wielding the baton in public before a critical audience. He would be indignantly charged with incapacity; his swaggering time-beating, his posing at the conductor's stand, his casting his eyes on the ground, apparently absorbed in transcendental transports, and his many other little bits of stage effect, would have been stigmatized as charlatanism pure and simple. It is, therefore, well to be favored by the fashionable side of the public. It is true that it is not always the most thoughtful or the most critical side, but it is the most unexact and the most fluent in the expression of unreasoning admiration. In fact, fashion as it manifests its rage for Mr. Henschel, brings vividly to mind the twenty pensive creatures who yearn for and surround that much-worshipped and self-conscious imitator, the platitudinous Bunthorne.

It is urged in some quarters that some of the bad consequences that have attended Mr. Henschel's leading are to be attributed to the fact that his orchestra plays under other conductors than himself, and that therefore, like the babies in "Pinafore," they become mixed. But when they play under other conductors their performances are better than they are under him. Their coarsest, most unsteady and least expressive work has been done when they have been controlled by him. They have been found tractable enough and pliant enough in other hands. And surely other conductors should not be made responsible for his great evil, a constant and tasteless hurrying of the tempi. Some of the works he has misinterpreted have been played by the same performers under other conductors in a thoroughly satisfying manner. The fact is that the fault is wholly with Mr. Henschel, and every intelligent musician in Boston knows it. He came to the conductor's stand without experience, and this circumstance in itself is quite sufficient to determine that he could not possibly succeed in the difficult art he undertook. His improvement has been so slight, and his faults seem to be so radically seated, that we doubt if he will ever achieve favorable distinction as a conductor.

Mr. Higginson set out with the laudable determination of giving concerts of the highest class at popular prices, so that those who could not afford to pay the larger charges that had hitherto prevailed at classical performances should have an opportunity to hear the great masterpieces of musical art. He also stated that he had no intention of antagonizing any existing musical organization. What are the results? At the entire season, and therefore the best places in the house were disposed of as a rule to any but the class whose interests Mr. Higginson professed to study most. And, moreover, instead of avoiding antagonisms with other societies, he has by his recent action directly inaugurated it by bringing into art the practices of the stock exchange, and attempting to create a corner in musicians. Much has been said of the public spirit manifested by Mr. Higginson in giving these concerts at a price which cannot but result in large pecuniary loss to himself. This is unquestionably praiseworthy as far as his disinterestedness is concerned; but here again he has done an injury to musical art. He has accustomed the public, not only poor but rich, to cheap orchestral concerts, and it now shows a disinclination to attend any others at a higher charge. Those who have not his inexhaustible purse, and who cannot afford to submit to losses as easily as he can, are forced to stand aside, for the prices he has established, and which do not pay him, would simply ruin them. Competition is out of all question, and while this state of affairs lasts there is no resource for those desiring other music and better conducting than his entertainments afford than to give subscription concerts, from which the general public are excluded. Philanthropy and public spirit are very good things when they are not carried to an extent that is dangerous in excess. To assist art by crippling its action is a rather novel way of proceeding, even though hampered by cheerful submission to inevitable pecuniary sacrifice in following the project out. Of course we cordially concede all that may be said in favor of good intentions, but after all a certain place is said to be paved with them. Good intentions are idle if their results are bad.

Mr. Dexter Smith says that he cannot endorse the strictures we made last week upon Mr. Henschel. We are sorry for this, because the endorsement of such an eminent musical authority was of vital necessity to our peace and comfort. As, however, he publishes the most severe paragraph in our article and thus gives it a wider circulation, it is barely possible that he is "sarkastical."

FINAL SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Close of the Present Season and Announcement for the Next.

Every effort had been made to prepare a programme for the closing concert of the first season of the Boston Symphony orchestra which should form a fitting peroration to the brilliant series which was thus to be brought to an end. Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was selected for the great feature, but was placed last upon the programme. The opening number was the prelude to Paine's "Edipus Tyrannus," music composed by the composer himself. The gratification of the composer must have been great if it equalled that of the audience at hearing this truly fine composition given with such excellent effect. The music has hardly had so fair an opportunity to be judged on its merits before, and Mr. Paine is to be congratulated on the success of the experiment. His efforts were well appreciated by the audience. Mr. Henschel took this occasion to bring out his trio for soprano, tenor and bass from Psalm cxxx. 31. This also proved most acceptable to the audience. It is so domineering, that the oft-repeated and much-abused wedding march from Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" receives so thorough and grand a rendering as it did last evening, when it was so well given, in fact, as to be almost a revelation. The Ninth Symphony of Beethoven is a work which is seldom produced. The necessity of a large chorus and of soloists, as well as an efficient orchestra, combine to render it an unusual undertaking. Those who were fortunate enough to listen to it last evening (and the number was limited only by the capacity of the hall) must have felt that they indeed enjoyed an uncommon privilege. The large and well-trained chorus was arranged in two groups on each side of the orchestra on rising platforms extending from the stage to the gallery, as in the Handel and Haydn concerts. The soloists included Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, soprano; Miss Mary H. How, contralto; Mr. Charles R.

Mr. Henschel directed the entire composition from memory—a feat which well evinces the amount of labor and study he has devoted to this work. No more fitting production to close the season could have been undertaken, and the manner in which it was done throughout was as near what the work demands and merits as could have been expected. After the concert the audience stood and bestowed upon Mr. Henschel long and hearty rounds of applause. There could be little doubt, however critics may feel toward the young director, that with the audience he has endeavored to please he is extremely popular. The programme last evening closed by announcing Mr. Henschel the conductor of the next season; and also contained the information that at the first concert, which will take place in October, Anton Rubinstein's new symphony in G minor (No. 5, op. 107) will be performed, and Mr. Carl Barnum will play Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At last the great series is finished, and judgment can be passed upon the work of the season. In reviewing the programmes of the concerts, we cannot fail to acknowledge the great progress made by both orchestra and conductor. The ensemble work has been constantly improving, and the conductor has somewhat toned down his disposition to individualize his readings. The interest of the audiences has continued unabated. The concert of last evening began with the Prelude of the Edipus music, conducted by the composer, Professor J. K. Paine. The musicians had evidently not become entirely used to his beat, but no serious breaks occurred, and the noble sequences and the effective string passages in the bass were finely done. Professor Paine received a hearty reception from the audience. The Wedding March (Mendelssohn) was played with appropriate force and power. The only new work on the programme was a trio from a setting of the 130th Psalm by Mr. Henschel. It was somewhat dwarfed by coming directly after the Edipus music. The great ninth symphony brought the series to a close in a most fitting manner, as the Dedication Overture had begun it. The instrumental portion of the great work was not absolutely faultless. In the scherzo, the wood-wind which plays so prominent a part in the "rhythm of three bars," was not prominent enough and the horns were sometimes demoralized. The accelerando which led to the Trio was somewhat of a scramble, and the first movement of the work was taken quicker than we have been accustomed to hear it. But as a whole the tempi were well considered and judicious. The final movement was well performed; that is as well as this impossibility can generally be accomplished. There were many prominent singers in the chorus, and Mrs. Humphrey Allen, Miss How, and Messrs. Adams and Cirillo sustained the solos. Mrs. Allen seemed tired by its exactions and Mr. Adams broke badly in the later portion. The extremely high passages ("Among the star pavilions") of the sopranos, were remarkably well done. The terrible skips of the bass passage—"Oh embrace now"—were not well sung, and probably never can be. Signor Cirillo sang with artistic finish, and gave the introductory recitative finely.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Twentieth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Herald

The 20th and last of the present season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Prelude from the music to "Edipus Tyrannus" . . . Paine
Trio for soprano, tenor and bass, from Psalm cxxx., op. 31 . . . Henschel
Wedding March . . . Mendelssohn
The Ninth (choral) Symphony . . . Beethoven

It was evident upon entering the hall that an unusual interest was felt in the events of the evening, for every seat was filled and an eager air of expectancy was noticeable on all sides. The entrance of Prof. Paine to conduct the "Edipus" music was the signal for a general welcome from the audience, and, upon the conclusion of the magnificent performance of the number, the composer was again and again recalled to acknowledge the appreciation of the merits of the music and the playing of it by the audience. The trio from Mr. Henschel's setting of Psalm cxxx. was sung by Messrs. Charles R. Adams and V. Cirillo and Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen with excellent effect, and the orchestra gave a memorable rendering of the Mendelssohn "Wedding March." The arrangement of the season's programme scheme, so as to give the great choral symphony as the final work of the series of concerts, was a happy thought, and the performance of the great composition was such as to make it a fitting climax to the season's efforts. The soloists assisting were Mrs. Allen, Miss Mary H. How and Messrs. Charles R. Adams and V. Cirillo, and there was a chorus, organized and trained by Mr. Henschel for the occasion. The thoroughly finished performance of the opening orchestral movements of the symphony gave evidence of the careful study given the work, and many of the beauties of the composition were more artistically presented than ever before in this city. There were errors, but the effect of the work of the orchestra, as a whole, fully justified the enthusiastic appreciation and generous applause of the audience. It is quite evident that Mr. Henschel knows what chorus singing should be, and also that he knows how to make the members of a chorus follow his ideas rather than their own in their work. With a chorus of less than 200 voices, the great "Ode to Joy" was given with an effect seldom produced by a body of singers of three times its number, while all the expression and shading were almost a revelation in this class of work. There was a steadiness and good volume of tone given by the chorus that made it fully balance the orchestra of over 70 players, and the trying passages for the sopranos were sung better than they have ever been in former presentations of this work. The soloists made an admirable quartet, and their efforts added much to the satisfactory presentation of the symphony. At the conclusion of the programme a demonstration occurred, which set at rest any possible doubt as to the popularity of Mr. Henschel with the audience which has for five months enjoyed the results of his labors in these concerts. Round after round of applause prevented his leaving his stand for some minutes, and then he was recalled by further applause and bravas from audience, chorus and orchestra alike. It was a notable scene for a Boston concert hall, and illustrated how fully the audiences have approved his presentation of the season's programmes.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1882.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The twentieth and last concert of the present season was given on Saturday evening before an audience which fairly crowded the vast Music Hall. The programme opened with Mr. Paine's ever beautiful orchestral prelude to "King Edipus," which was conducted by the composer in person. The more we hear this music, the more beautiful, germane to the subject and replete with lofty, tragic sentiment does it seem. It is perhaps more individual, strictly speaking, than original in form and material; yet, if at times one may find a hint at other composers in it, Mr. Paine's own individuality, which is a decidedly marked one, predominates. The whole atmosphere of the composition is distinctly noble; the composer evinces not so much a conscious avoidance of, as an incapacity for, the commonplace. The piece was admirably played, and if Mr. Paine does not shine by any outward graces as a conductor, it may be said emphatically that few men have shown a more absolute command over themselves and the orchestra than he did on this occasion. Next came a terzet by Mr. Henschel (to a scriptural text), sung by Mrs. Allen, Mr. Adams and Signor Cirillo. We should be in better condition to appreciate the merits of this composition had it been better sung. Although we are willing to believe that the tenor and baritone sang all the notes of their parts correctly, they sang with such timidity, and withal so scarcely audibly that the effect of the whole was lame and unclear. Mendelssohn's wedding march was played with much vigor and effect, if without much contrast of light and shade. The second part of the concert was taken up with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. There were some admirable points in the performance. The first part of the Adagio was played very beautifully in so far as minute attention to expression marks went. The orchestral working-out of the "joy" theme, before the voices enter, was also admirably played. Nearly the whole of the Scherzo went fairly well, technically speaking. Yet most of the work sounded unclear and often coarse in tone. And just here let us consider a little how much an ideally fine performance of the orchestral parts of the Ninth Symphony means. The difficulties of the work are peculiar, perhaps unique. Beethoven, in his later orchestral works, began to impose entirely unwonted tasks upon his players; he aimed at a then unprecedented class of orchestral effects, while the orchestral means at his disposal did not differ essentially from those which Haydn and Mozart had at command. The modern improvements in wind instruments which have so largely extended the compass of the flutes and reeds, and have given a complete chromatic scale to the horns and trumpets, did not belong to his day. In many important passages (notably in the first movement and the Scherzo) the transposition of a phrase into a higher key brought it (or parts of it) beyond the limits of the instruments he then had at command. He thus found himself forced to distort the original phrase, by sudden skips to the lower octave and other more or less awkward expedients, in a manner which often rendered the phrase unintelligible and the part-leading unclear. Moreover there are abundant passages in the symphony in which the scoring is singularly unsuccessful in embodying the composer's idea. Remember that Beethoven was stone deaf when wrote it; he could only guess at the actual effect his work would make. If so as of his new effects belong to the most beautiful discoveries in the history of instrumentation—for instance the passage in three parts, where the violas and 'celli take the upper voice, the bassoon the middle part, and the double-basses play the bass (Peters ed., p. 181)—there are still many passages which are only music to the eye and not to the ear, some instrumental figures being wholly inaudible. Again, some effects, notably in the latter half of the Adagio, are such as a Wagner or a Berlioz, with the vast array of perfected instruments at their command, could produce without trouble, but which, in Beethoven's score, demand a very high degree of virtuosity in the players, and very careful and quite unusual drilling from the conductor. In many parts of the Adagio, for instance, the dynamic indications forte, mezzo-forte, piano, pianissimo, cannot safely be made to apply with equal force to all the instruments at once. Some of the players must often play a little louder or a little softer than the others if the dynamic balance of the various parts is to be preserved. It is just these difficulties which make the orchestral part of the Ninth Symphony so uniquely hazardous for even the finest orchestra. We regret to say that Mr. Henschel did not succeed in making his orchestra conquer one of them; the work was given with all its imperfections boldly displayed to public view, and was treated with no more circumspection than if it had been the most plain-sailing symphony of Haydn. Yet insufficient opportunities for rehearsal might go far to condone this fault, did not worse remain behind. Mr. Henschel's tempi cannot fairly be criticised, at least by us, because we have no idea of what especial tempo he took any of the movements at. However fast or slow he began each movement, the initial tempo was soon lost. And here, now that the season is over, let us say that this habitual failing of Mr. Henschel's is enough of itself to make it not worth while to consider any of his other possible faults or even his conspicuous virtues as a conductor. One weak link makes the strongest chain worthless; a conductor who sins against the very first principle of conducting does a thing which makes all the other virtues in the world utterly valueless. Genius, culture, musical insight, electric command over orchestra and audience, all go for nothing if he cannot keep time. A conductor who cannot keep up a fixed tempo (not as a metronome does, but by returning to the initial rate of speed after every expressive variation) is just as bad as a chorus which falls from the pitch when it sings without accompaniment. As music which has no stable standard of pitch is no music, a tempo which is neither this nor that, but any-

Adams, tenor, and Mr. V. Cirillo, bass. Mr. Henschel directed the entire composition from memory—a feat which well evinces the amount of labor and study he has devoted to the work. No more fitting production to close the season could have been undertaken, and the manner in which it was done throughout was as near what the work demands and merits as could have been expected. After the concert the audience stood and bestowed upon Mr. Henschel long and hearty rounds of applause. There could be little doubt, however critics may feel toward the young director, that with the audience he has endeavored to please he is extremely popular. The programme last evening closed by announcing Mr. Henschel the conductor of the next season; and also contained the information that at the first concert, which will take place in October, Anton Rubinstein's new symphony in G minor (No. 5, op. 107) will be performed, and Mr. Carl Barnmann will play Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

At last the great series is finished, and judgment can be passed upon the work of the season. In reviewing the programmes of the concerts, we cannot fail to acknowledge the great progress made by both orchestra and conductor. The ensemble work has been constantly improving, and the conductor has somewhat toned down his disposition to individualize his readings. The interest of the audiences has continued unabated. The concert of last evening began with the Prelude of the Edipus music, conducted by the composer, Professor J. K. Paine. The musicians had evidently not become entirely used to his beat, but no serious breaks occurred, and the noble sequences and the effective string passages in the bass were finely done. Professor Paine received a hearty reception from the audience. The Wedding March (Mendelssohn) was played with appropriate force and power. The only new work on the programme was a trio from a setting of the 130th Psalm by Mr. Henschel. It was somewhat dwarfed by coming directly after the Edipus music. The great ninth symphony brought the series to a close in a most fitting manner, as the Dedication Overture had begun it. The instrumental portion of the great work was not absolutely faultless. In the scherzo, the wood-wind which plays so prominent a part in the "rhythm of three bars," was not prominent enough and the horns were sometimes demoralized. The accelerando which led to the Trio was somewhat of a scramble, and the first movement of the work was taken quicker than we have been accustomed to hear it. But as a whole the tempi were well considered and judicious. The final movement was well performed; that is as well as this impossibility can generally be accomplished. There were many prominent singers in the chorus, and Mrs. Humphrey Allen, Miss How, and Messrs. Adams and Cirillo sustained the solos. Mrs. Allen seemed tired by its exactions and Mr. Adams broke badly in the later portion. The extremely high passages ("Among the star pavilions") of the sopranos, were remarkably well done. The terrible skips of the bass passage—"Oh embrace now"—were not well sung, and probably never can be. Signor Cirillo sang with artistic finish, and gave the introductory recitative finely.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

Twentieth Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Herald

The 20th and last of the present season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the programme being as follows:

Prelude from the music to "Edipus Tyrannus".....Paine
Trio for soprano, tenor and bass, from Psalm cxxx., op. 31.....Henschel
Wedding March.....Mendelssohn
The Ninth (choral) Symphony.....Beethoven

It was evident upon entering the hall that an unusual interest was felt in the events of the evening, for every seat was filled and an eager air of expectancy was noticeable on all sides. The entrance of Prof. Paine to conduct the "Edipus" music was the signal for a general welcome from the audience, and, upon the conclusion of the magnificent performance of the number, the composer was again and again recalled to acknowledge the appreciation of the merits of the music and the playing of it by the audience. The trio from Mr. Henschel's setting of Psalm cxxx. was sung by Messrs. Charles R. Adams and V. Cirillo and Mrs. E. Humphrey Allen with excellent effect, and the orchestra gave a memorable rendering of the Mendelssohn "Wedding March." The arrangement of the season's programme scheme, so as to give the great choral symphony as the final work of the series of concerts, was a happy thought, and the performance of the great composition was such as to make it a fitting climax to the season's efforts. The soloists assisting were Mrs. Allen, Miss Mary H. How and Messrs. Charles R. Adams and V. Cirillo, and there was a chorus, organized and trained by Mr. Henschel for the occasion. The thoroughly finished performance of the opening orchestral movements of the symphony gave evidence of the careful study given the work, and many of the beauties of the composition were more artistically presented than ever before in this city. There were errors, but the effect of the work of the orchestra, as a whole, fully justified the enthusiastic appreciation and generous applause of the audience. It is quite evident that Mr. Henschel knows what chorus singing should be, and also that he knows how to make the members of a chorus follow his ideas rather than their own in their work. With a chorus of less than 200 voices, the great "Ode to Joy" was given with an effect seldom produced by a body of singers of three times its number, while all the expression and shading were almost a revelation in this class of work. There was a steadiness and good volume of tone given by the chorus that made it fully balance the orchestra of over 70 players, and the trying passages for the sopranos were sung better than they have ever been in former presentations of this work. The soloists made an admirable quartet, and their efforts added much to the satisfactory presentation of the symphony. At the conclusion of the programme a demonstration occurred, which set at rest any possible doubt as to the popularity of Mr. Henschel with the audience which has for five months enjoyed the results of his labors in these concerts. Round after round of applause prevented his leaving his stand for some minutes, and then he was recalled by further applause and bravas from audience, chorus and orchestra alike. It was a notable scene for a Boston concert hall, and illustrated how fully the audiences have approved his presentation of the season's programmes.

EVENING TRANSCRIPT

MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1882.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

Boston Symphony Orchestra. The twentieth and last concert of the present season was given on Saturday evening before an audience which fairly crowded the vast Music Hall. The programme opened with Mr. Paine's ever beautiful orchestral prelude to "King Edipus," which was conducted by the composer in person. The more we hear this music, the more beautiful, germane to the subject and replete with lofty, tragic sentiment does it seem. It is perhaps more individual, strictly speaking, than original in form and material; yet, if at times one may find a hint at other composers in it, Mr. Paine's own individuality, which is a decidedly marked one, predominates. The whole atmosphere of the composition is distinctly noble; the composer evinces not so much a conscious avoidance of, as an incapacity for, the commonplace. The piece was admirably played, and if Mr. Paine does not shine by any outward graces as a conductor, it may be said emphatically that few men have shown a more absolute command over themselves and the orchestra than he did on this occasion. Next came a terzet by Mr. Henschel (to a scriptural text), sung by Mrs. Allen, Mr. Adams and Signor Cirillo. We should be in better condition to appreciate the merits of this composition had it been better sung. Although we are willing to believe that the tenor and baritone sang all the notes of their parts correctly, they sang with such timidity, and withal so scarcely audibly that the effect of the whole was lame and unclear. Mendelssohn's wedding march was played with much vigor and effect, if without much contrast of light and shade. The second part of the concert was taken up with Beethoven's Ninth Symphony. There were some admirable points in the performance. The first part of the Adagio was played very beautifully in so far as minute attention to expression marks went. The orchestral working-out of the "joy" theme, before the voices enter, was also admirably played. Nearly the whole of the Scherzo went fairly well, technically speaking. Yet most of the work sounded unclear and often coarse in tone. And just here let us consider a little how much an ideally fine performance of the orchestral parts of the Ninth Symphony means. The difficulties of the work are peculiar, perhaps unique. Beethoven, in his later orchestral works, began to impose entirely unwonted tasks upon his players; he aimed at a then unprecedented class of orchestral effects, while the orchestral means at his disposal did not differ essentially from those which Haydn and Mozart had at command. The modern improvements in wind instruments which have so largely extended the compass of the flutes and reeds, and have given a complete chromatic scale to the horns and trumpets, did not belong to his day. In many important passages (notably in the first movement and the Scherzo) the transposition of a phrase into a higher key brought it (or parts of it) beyond the limits of the instruments he then had at command. He thus found himself forced to distort the original phrase, by sudden skips to the lower octave and other more or less awkward expedients, in a manner which often rendered the phrase unintelligible and the part-leading unclear. Moreover there are abundant passages in the symphony in which the scoring is singularly unsuccessful in embodying the composer's idea. Remember that Beethoven was stone deaf when wrote it; he could only guess at the actual effect his work would make. If so be of his new effects belong to the most beautiful discoveries in the history of instrumentation—for instance the passage in three parts, where the violas and 'celli take the upper voice, the bassoon the middle part, and the double-basses play the bass (Peters ed., p. 181)—there are still many passages which are only music to the eye and not to the ear, some instrumental figures being wholly inaudible. Again, some effects, notably in the latter half of the Adagio, are such as a Wagner or a Berlioz, with the vast array of perfected instruments at their command, could produce without trouble, but which, in Beethoven's score, demand a very high degree of virtuosity in the players, and very careful and quite unusual drilling from the conductor. In many parts of the Adagio, for instance, the dynamic indications forte, mezzo-forte, piano, pianissimo, cannot safely be made to apply with equal force to all the instruments at once. Some of the players must often play a little louder or a little softer than the others if the dynamic balance of the various parts is to be preserved. It is just these difficulties which make the orchestral part of the Ninth Symphony so uniquely hazardous for even the finest orchestra. We regret to say that Mr. Henschel did not succeed in making his orchestra conquer one of them; the work was given with all its imperfections boldly displayed to public view, and was treated with no more circumspection than if it had been the most plain-sailing symphony of Haydn. Yet insufficient opportunities for rehearsal might go far to condone this fault, did not worse remain behind. Mr. Henschel's tempi cannot fairly be criticised, at least by us, because we have no idea of what especial tempo he took any of the movements at. However fast or slow he began each movement, the initial tempo was soon lost. And here, now that the season is over, let us say that this habitual failing of Mr. Henschel's is enough of itself to make it not worth while to consider any of his other possible faults or even his conspicuous virtues as a conductor. One weak link makes the strongest chain worthless; a conductor who sins against the very first principle of conducting does a thing which makes all the other virtues in the world utterly valueless. Genius, culture, musical insight, electric command over orchestra and audience, all go for nothing if he cannot keep time. A conductor who cannot keep up a fixed tempo (not as a metronome does, but by returning to the initial rate of speed after every expressive variation) is just as bad as a chorus which falls from the pitch when it sings without accompaniment. As music which has no stable standard of pitch is no music, a tempo which is neither this nor that, but anything you please by fits and starts, is no tempo at all. But to return: The choral part of the symphony was, in general, quite as well sung as one usually hears it here. The quality of tone was at times thin, but this was hardly avoidable in view of the almost outrageous vocal writing in the score; the work needs wellnigh superhuman singers. Of the solo quartet, it may be said that they sang in general passably well the only serious weakness being in the great climax in B major. That the audience fully enjoyed the symphony was evident from the rapturous applause which followed it; yet how much of this applause was for the work and how much for the performance it were hard to determine. Mr. Henschel, however, had a real ovation at the close of the concert.

Now that the season is over, and that the announcement of next winter's course is out, some thoughts concerning the very peculiar circumstances under which these concerts are to be continued may not be out of place. The position of public benefactor which Mr. Henry Higginson has assumed during the past season has been so wholly noble, so generous and withal so modestly held, that we would farrather leave his name out of any critical discussion of the intrinsic merits of his enterprise. But certain items in his plans for the future make this impossible. Mr. Higginson's plans for next winter differ widely from the course he has pursued hitherto. He still means to give the symphony concerts, but, in engaging his orchestra, he makes the extraordinary stipulation that all the players shall bind themselves by contract to give him their whole time for four consecutive days of every week; that is to say, that during this period they shall neither play at a concert nor rehearse for any person or musical organization except his own, and occasionally for the Handel and Haydn Society. He thus "makes a corner" in orchestral players, and monopolizes them for his own concerts and those of the Handel and Haydn Society; for the three days of each week (one of them a Sunday), on which he leaves the musicians free to make other engagements, are, from long custom here, practically useless for concerts, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday having been the usual concert days in Boston for many years past. It is easy to see that, by this action, Mr. Higginson virtually kills the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, the Philharmonic Society, and of the Cecilia, the Boylston Club and the Apollo Club, in so far as the latter are dependent upon the coöperation of an orchestra. It is not supposable that Mr. Higginson did not foresee these necessary results of his monopoly when he matured his new plan. Neither is it fairly conceivable that his action should have been prompted by any unworthy feeling of rivalry with other musical organizations, for it is beyond all possibility that the success of other courses of orchestral concerts should injure that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a pecuniary way. Even if it were a question of purely artistic rivalry, the idea of Mr. Higginson's trying to win the first place in the race by first hamstringing all the other competitors is too contemptible to be entertained by any one who knows him as a man of honor and generosity. No, it seems as if Mr. Higginson's new monopoly had for its sole object the improvement of his own course of concerts, by giving his orchestra more rehearsals, and by keeping them more constantly, if not continually, under the baton of a single conductor. A most laudable object in itself, surely. But in pursuing this plan Mr. Higginson is assuming a responsibility for which he is in no wise qualified. He assumes that it is worth while, and for the musical good of Boston, to improve the playing of his orchestra under Mr. Henschel at the expense of driving all other musical organizations and other conductors from the field. Now, this is a question which Mr. Higginson is utterly incompetent to decide; his very attempt to decide it ex cathedra is a most curious piece of self-assertion. Mr. Higginson is not a musician; he is simply a member of the general musical public; his musical opinion is not that of an expert, but that of a mere layman, and, as such, is not worthy consideration for a moment. He has no possible qualification for assuming the musical dictatorship in Boston, and determining who shall conduct our orchestral music for us, to the total exclusion of other conductors, except the power to buy the position with hard cash. Yet this is the position which he virtually assumes. If Mr. Higginson acts by the advice of Mr. Henschel, who is a musician, and a very highly cultivated one too, this does not improve his attitude in the affair one jot. However valuable Mr. Henschel's advice may be on musical questions in general, any lawyer would tell Mr. Higginson that, in this case, he is a fairly challengeable witness, for he is the very person who is most interested in the success of the monopoly. It seems to us that Mr. Higginson's action is most deplorable; so long as his munificent gift to the Boston musical public was purely and simply a gift he deserved nothing but gratitude, and the question whether he was wise or foolish in confiding the direction of his orchestra to Mr. Henschel was one which might fairly be debated, but the discussion of which would not touch him in the least. It is for the giver, not for the recipients, to determine what the gift shall be. All criticism which the concerts have called forth has fallen, and properly fallen, upon Mr. Henschel alone. But now the case is totally changed; Mr. Higginson's gift has become an imposition; it is something that we must receive, or else look musical starvation in the face. It is as if a man should make a poor friend a present of several baskets of champagne, and, at the same time, cut off his whole water supply. In truth, Mr. Higginson is not acting fairly by our musical community; he is imposing his wishes upon us, when he should have the modesty (if nothing else) to appreciate that his musical views are of no public importance whatever, and that the wishes based upon such views are not worth gratifying at the expense of a large portion of the public, and in direct defiance of an overwhelmingly large percentage of the best and most matured musical opinion in our city.

Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The last concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before the largest audience of the season. The following programme was performed:

Prelude from the music to "Edipus Tyrannus"—Paine, conducted by the composer; Trio for soprano, tenor and bass, from Psalm CXXX., op. 31—Henschel; Wedding March, from the music to Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, op. 61—Mendelssohn; The Ninth (Choral) Symphony, in D minor, op. 125—Beethoven.

The only part of the programme that was wholly satisfactory in its performance was the vocal trio, which was sung in beautiful style and with great expression by Mrs. Humphrey-Allen and Messrs. Charles R. Adams and V. Cirillo. The latter singer was not the equal of the others, and his voice was not heard as effectively as it should have been to give the full expression of the composition, which is a thoughtful, melodious work, full of devout sentiment and emotion. Professor Paine's music was fairly well performed, although the conductor and the players seemed at times not fully en rapport, with the result that the best effect of the composition was not always brought out. Still, there was nothing absolutely faulty in the performance, whose errors seemed of omission rather than commission. The familiar Wedding March of Mendelssohn was well played, but so hurried by the conductor that all its impressiveness and a large part of its beauty were lost. Every lover of music must have had his patience sorely tried at this maltreatment of one of the finest as well as most familiar of compositions. As Mr. Henschel directed it it was more of a quickstep than a march, and should have been blissed instead of loudly applauded, as, sad to say, was done. The famous Ninth Symphony of Beethoven was conducted without the score—perhaps to show Mr. Henschel's familiarity with the work, but certainly with the result of allowing him to commit more errors than he has ever before shown in any one concert. A more unsatisfactory performance of this noble work it would be difficult to imagine at the hands of trained musicians. With the exception of the third part, where the adagio and andante movements so charmingly alternate—in which there was considerable expression and beauty of phrasing and description—the prevailing impression throughout was of noise and agitation. The strings often scraped and faltered, and had sufficient to do at times in keeping up with the tempo, without bothering themselves about expression, and the wind instruments were now and then out of the way, and once or twice staggered ludicrously. The singing, as a rule, rivaled the playing in badness. Confessedly the vocal parts of this composition are of almost insuperable difficulty, but they are so full of expression that it requires murderous treatment indeed wholly to destroy their beauty. Yet there were few points in the work of the chorus to commend. Force was generally indicated by a harsh screaming, and neither in the concerted nor choral parts was there noticed the necessary unity of tone and effort. Even the quartette, composed of the three singers above mentioned and Miss Mary H. How, was not always up to the mark, and Mr. Adams's voice broke disastrously more than once, while the soprano fell upon one high note which was too much for her. Altogether, the performance offered a dismal and depressing finale to the series of concerts. If one were to judge by the applause bestowed at its close, however, one would suppose it to be an extraordinary triumph. The sound of approbation was tumultuous, and after the symphony had been thus honored the conductor was recalled and rapturously commended. This mark of esteem was doubtless directed to his personal popularity, for it is difficult to understand how any one who admires Beethoven could have commended his work on this occasion. The announcement for next season's concerts is already made. At the first, which will take place in October, Rubinstein's new symphony in G minor (No. 5, op. 107) will be performed, and Professor Carl Baermann will play Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT—BRILLIANT CLOSE OF THE FIRST SEASON.—The twentieth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, and the last of the first series, was given on Saturday evening in the Music Hall before an audience which was only limited by the capacity of the house. The season was fittingly brought to a close with a magnificent rendering of Beethoven's Ninth (choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125, by the orchestra, assisted by Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, soprano; Miss Mary H. How, contralto; Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor; Mr. V. Cirillo, bass, and a selected chorus of about 150 voices. The soloists were in good voice, and sang their parts with admirable effect. The chorus showed the result of excellent training, and by their efforts a capital piece of work was produced. Indeed it may be safely asserted that a chorus composed of double the number of that singing on this occasion has sent forth a much weaker body of sound, and manifested much less skilful shading of the work committed to their hands. The efforts of the orchestra on the occasion were of the best, and the whole performance was one long to be held in remembrance. The first part of the programme comprised Mr. Paine's Prelude from the Music to "Edipus Tyrannus," the author conducting in person, and was very finely rendered by the orchestra, Mr. Paine receiving merited applause from the audience; the trio from Mr. Henschel's setting of Psalm cxxx., "If thou, Lord, shouldst number transgressions, who shall abide it? But with thee is forgiveness, that we may fear thee," was finely sung, by Miss Allen, Charles R. Adams and V. Cirillo, with orchestral accompaniment. The first part ended with a magnificent rendering of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," by the orchestra. At the conclusion of the Symphony the presence of the conductor was loudly demanded, round after round of applause being given, which were shared in by chorus, orchestra and audience alike. Mr. Henschel presently appeared and bowed his acknowledgments, and the large assembly dissolved, well satisfied with the evening's work. Thus was brought to a close a series of entertainments which have afforded the largest amount of enjoyment to our citizens, and it must be gratifying to the liberal founder to be assured that the enterprise has been eminently successful. The note of preparation for a second course is already heard, and we are promised another treat for next winter, the course to begin in October next and run through the season

thing you please by fits and starts, is no tempo at all. But to return: The choral part of the symphony was, in general, quite as well sung as one usually hears it here. The quality of tone was at times thin, but this was hardly avoidable in view of the almost outrageous vocal writing in the score; the work needs wellnigh superhuman singers. Of the solo quartet, it may be said that they sang in general passably well the only serious weakness being in the great climax in B major. That the audience fully enjoyed the symphony was evident from the rapturous applause which followed it; yet how much of this applause was for the work and how much for the performance it were hard to determine. Mr. Henschel, however, had a real ovation at the close of the concert.

Now that the season is over, and that the announcement of next winter's course is out, some thoughts concerning the very peculiar circumstances under which these concerts are to be continued may not be out of place. The position of public benefactor which Mr. Henry Higginson has assumed during the past season has been so wholly noble, so generous and withal so modestly held, that we would far rather leave his name out of any critical discussion of the intrinsic merits of his enterprise. But certain items in his plans for the future make this impossible. Mr. Higginson's plans for next winter differ widely from the course he has pursued hitherto. He still means to give the symphony concerts, but, in engaging his orchestra, he makes the extraordinary stipulation that all the players shall bind themselves by contract to give him their whole time for four consecutive days of every week; that is to say, that during this period they shall neither play at a concert nor rehearse for any person or musical organization except his own, and occasionally for the Handel and Haydn Society. He thus "makes a corner" in orchestral players, and monopolizes them for his own concerts and those of the Handel and Haydn Society; for the three days of each week (one of them a Sunday), on which he leaves the musicians free to make other engagements, are, from long custom here, practically useless for concerts, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday and Saturday having been the usual concert days in Boston for many years past. It is easy to see that, by this action, Mr. Higginson virtually kills the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, the Philharmonic Society, and of the Cecilia, the Boylston Club and the Apollo Club, in so far as the latter are dependent upon the coöperation of an orchestra. It is not supposable that Mr. Higginson did not foresee these necessary results of his monopoly when he matured his new plan. Neither is it fairly conceivable that his action should have been prompted by any unworthy feeling of rivalry with other musical organizations, for it is beyond all possibility that the success of other courses of orchestral concerts should injure that of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in a pecuniary way. Even if it were a question of purely artistic rivalry, the idea of Mr. Higginson's trying to win the first place in the race by first hamstringing all the other competitors is too contemptible to be entertained by any one who knows him as a man of honor and generosity. No, it seems as if Mr. Higginson's new monopoly had for its sole object the improvement of his own course of concerts, by giving his orchestra more rehearsals, and by keeping them more constantly, if not continually, under the baton of a single conductor. A most laudable object in itself, surely. But in pursuing this plan Mr. Higginson is assuming a responsibility for which he is in no wise qualified. He assumes that it is worth while, and for the musical good of Boston, to improve the playing of his orchestra under Mr. Henschel at the expense of driving all other musical organizations and other conductors from the field. Now, this is a question which Mr. Higginson is utterly incompetent to decide; his very attempt to decide it ex cathedra is a most curious piece of self-assertion. Mr. Higginson is not a musician; he is simply a member of the general musical public; his musical opinion is not that of an expert, but that of a mere layman, and, as such, is not worthy consideration for a moment. He has no possible qualification for assuming the musical dictatorship in Boston, and determining who shall conduct our orchestral music for us, to the total exclusion of other conductors, except the power to buy the position with hard cash. Yet this is the position which he virtually assumes. If Mr. Higginson acts by the advice of Mr. Henschel, who is a musician, and a very highly cultivated one too, this does not improve his attitude in the affair one jot. However valuable Mr. Henschel's advice may be on musical questions in general, any lawyer would tell Mr. Higginson that, in this case, he is a fairly challengeable witness, for he is the very person who is most interested in the success of the monopoly. It seems to us that Mr. Higginson's action is most deplorable; so long as his munificent gift to the Boston musical public was purely and simply a gift he deserved nothing but gratitude, and the question whether he was wise or foolish in confiding the direction of his orchestra to Mr. Henschel was one which might fairly be debated, but the discussion of which would not touch him in the least. It is for the giver, not for the recipients, to determine what the gift shall be. All criticism which the concerts have called forth has fallen, and properly fallen, upon Mr. Henschel alone. But now the case is totally changed; Mr. Higginson's gift has become an imposition; it is something that we must receive, or else look musical starvation in the face. It is as if a man should make a poor friend a present of several baskets of champagne, and, at the same time, cut off his whole water supply. In truth, Mr. Higginson is not acting fairly by our musical community; he is imposing his wishes upon us, when he should have the modesty (if nothing else) to appreciate that his musical views are of no public importance whatever, and that the wishes based upon such views are not worth gratifying at the expense of a large portion of the public, and in direct defiance of an overwhelmingly large percentage of the best and most matured musical opinion in our city.

Twentieth Symphony Concert.

The last concert in the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before the largest audience of the season. The following programme was performed:

Prelude from the music to "Edipus Tyrannus"—Paine, conducted by the composer; Trio for soprano, tenor and bass, from Psalm CXXX., op. 81—Henschel; Wedding March, from the music to Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, op. 61—Mendelssohn; The Ninth (Choral) Symphony, in D minor, op. 125—Beethoven.

The only part of the programme that was wholly satisfactory in its performance was the vocal trio, which was sung in beautiful style and with great expression by Mrs. Humphrey-Allen and Messrs. Charles R. Adams and V. Cirillo. The latter singer was not the equal of the others, and his voice was not heard as effectively as it should have been to give the full expression of the composition, which is a thoughtful, melodious work, full of devout sentiment and emotion. Professor Paine's music was fairly well performed, although the conductor and the players seemed at times not fully en rapport, with the result that the best effect of the composition was not always brought out. Still, there was nothing absolutely faulty in the performance, whose errors seemed of omission rather than commission. The familiar Wedding March of Mendelssohn was well played, but so hurried by the conductor that all its impressiveness and a large part of its beauty were lost. Every lover of music must have had his patience sorely tried at this maltreatment of one of the finest as well as most familiar of compositions. As Mr. Henschel directed it it was more of a quickstep than a march, and should have been hushed instead of loudly applauded, as, sad to say, was done. The famous Ninth Symphony of Beethoven was conducted without the score—perhaps to show Mr. Henschel's familiarity with the work, but certainly with the result of allowing him to commit more errors than he has ever before shown in any one concert. A more unsatisfactory performance of this noble work it would be difficult to imagine at the hands of trained musicians. With the exception of the third part, where the adagio and andante movements so charmingly alternate—in which there was considerable expression and beauty of phrasing and description—the prevailing impression throughout was of noise and agitation. The strings often scraped and faltered, and had sufficient to do at times in keeping up with the tempo, without bothering themselves about expression, and the wind instruments were now and then out of the way, and once or twice staggered ludicrously. The singing, as a rule, rivaled the playing in badness. Confessedly the vocal parts of this composition are of almost insuperable difficulty, but they are so full of expression that it requires murderous treatment indeed wholly to destroy their beauty. Yet there were few points in the work of the chorus to commend. Force was generally indicated by a harsh screaming, and neither in the concerted nor choral parts was there noticed the necessary unity of tone and effort. Even the quartette, composed of the three singers above mentioned and Miss Mary H. How, was not always up to the mark, and Mr. Adams's voice broke disastrously more than once, while the soprano fell upon one high note which was too much for her. Altogether, the performance offered a dismal and depressing finale to the series of concerts. If one were to judge by the applause bestowed at its close, however, one would suppose it to be an extraordinary triumph. The sound of approbation was tumultuous, and after the symphony had been thus honored the conductor was recalled and rapturously commended. This mark of esteem was doubtless directed to his personal popularity, for it is difficult to understand how any one who admires Beethoven could have commended his work on this occasion. The announcement for next season's concerts is already made. At the first, which will take place in October, Rubinstein's new symphony in G minor (No. 5, op. 107) will be performed, and Professor Carl Baermann will play Schumann's pianoforte concerto in A minor.

MUSIC AND THE STAGE.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT—BRILLIANT CLOSE OF THE FIRST SEASON.—The twentieth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel conductor, and the last of the first series, was given on Saturday evening in the Music Hall before an audience which was only limited by the capacity of the house. The season was fittingly brought to a close with a magnificent rendering of Beethoven's Ninth (choral) Symphony in D minor, op. 125, by the orchestra, assisted by Mrs. Humphrey-Allen, soprano; Miss Mary H. How, contralto; Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor; Mr. V. Cirillo, bass, and a selected chorus of about 150 voices. The soloists were in good voice, and sang their parts with admirable effect. The chorus showed the result of excellent training, and by their efforts a capital piece of work was produced. Indeed it may be safely asserted that a chorus composed of double the number of that singing on this occasion has sent forth a much weaker body of sound, and manifested much less skilful shading of the work committed to their hands. The efforts of the orchestra on the occasion were of the best, and the whole performance was one long to be held in remembrance. The first part of the programme comprised Mr. Paine's Prelude from the Music to "Edipus Tyrannus," the author conducting in person, and was very finely rendered by the orchestra, Mr. Paine receiving merited applause from the audience; the trio from Mr. Henschel's setting of Psalm cxxx., "If thou, Lord, shouldst number transgressions, who shall abide it? But with thee is forgiveness, that we may fear thee," was finely sung, by Mrs. Allen, Charles R. Adams and V. Cirillo, with orchestral accompaniment. The first part ended with a magnificent rendering of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March," by the orchestra. At the conclusion of the Symphony the presence of the conductor was loudly demanded, round after round of applause being given, which were shared in by chorus, orchestra and audience alike. Mr. Henschel presently appeared and bowed his acknowledgments, and the large assembly dissolved, well satisfied with the evening's work. Thus was brought to a close a series of entertainments which have afforded the largest amount of enjoyment to our citizens, and it must be gratifying to the liberal founder to be assured that the enterprise has been eminently successful. The note of preparation for a second course is already heard, and we are promised another treat for next winter, the course to begin in October next and run through the season.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

A Review of all the Orchestral Work This Winter.

What Has Been Done in the Field of Music

During the Season Just Closed—Interesting Statistics, Etc.

It is scarcely to be wondered at that many of our best musicians and critics have worked themselves into a state of great excitement over matters appertaining to and growing out of the orchestral concerts this winter. Such a flood of music as has been poured into Boston this season was out of all proportion to anything previously experienced. Everything has combined to make the year of 1881-82 a marked one in the musical annals of this city. It all grew out of the unusual and praiseworthy ambition of Mr. Higginson to become a public benefactor and to place classical music within the reach of the many. Boston had had its Harvard Society for a long time, and felt quite satisfied when the Philharmonic Society was formed. It was reserved for Mr. Higginson, however, to astonish everybody by the formation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, with Mr. Georg Henschel as conductor.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Thus was inaugurated a series of twenty concerts and as many rehearsals, with an admission price of fifty cents for the one and twenty-five cents for the other. The avidity with which the public availed itself of this unusual opportunity is well known. At every rehearsal, at every concert, Music Hall was taxed to its utmost capacity by immense audiences. It has been said that the tickets were mostly taken by a class of people who could well afford to pay the ordinary prices charged for such concerts, and that the benevolent purposes for which the orchestra was established were thus defeated; while this to a large extent was true, it is also true that among the 5000 or 6000 who have attended these concerts each week there were a great many musical students, young men and women, as well as a large number of music lovers, who were not in the habit of attending either of the orchestral series of concerts before existing, although they might have been seen at the Philharmonic public rehearsals.

At Oliver Ditson's Foreign Department,

as well as at other music stores of the city, large numbers have called each week to ask for the piano scores of those compositions which the symphony orchestra had performed. These calls were out of all proportion to those for works to be found in either the Harvard or the Philharmonic programmes. The greatest demand has been for the most popular of the greatest of all great works—the masterpieces of Beethoven. The Seventh symphony, the "Eroica," the "Pastorale" and the Fifth Symphony have been the most sought after. For that delightful, unfinished symphony of Schubert there has been incessant demand ever since it was given, while Delibes' "Sylvia" ballet music has sold rapidly. Another of Schubert's symphonies, that in C major, which received, by the way, more applause than any other work presented by the symphony orchestra, has been widely called for. In fact, there has not been a feature of the twenty programmes presented which has not stimulated some people into a purchase of it, and hence to a better acquaintance with it. The man who doubts whether Mr. Higginson's enterprise has done any good must certainly be prejudiced.

It is quite another proposition to consider that Mr. Henschel, as critics generally have insisted, is not the best man for the position which he occupies. As Mr. Higginson seems determined to keep him, it would, perhaps, be becoming to accept the situation with all due humility; but if anything has been established to the satisfaction of all competent judges during the past winter it is this: that Mr. Georg Henschel is not the best man to fill the important post to which he has been elevated. This fact does not detract from Mr. Henschel as a musician. His claim to high honors in this department of art has been established. Nevertheless it is a well-known fact that some of the greatest musicians and composers have made the poorest orchestral conductors. It requires other qualities than ardor, enthusiasm and fire to make a good leader.

The Philharmonics and Harvards.

It may be that competition has stimulated the two rival musical societies of the Boston symphony orchestra to greater efforts during the season. Certain it is that the programmes presented by each have been of unusual interest. The Philharmonic season has not yet closed—one concert, the programme for which has already been announced, remaining to be given—but they have had a most successful season, and Dr. Louis Maas has proved himself an excellent leader. The Harvards, too, under the efficient baton of Carl Zerrahn, have given a most delightful series in the Boston Museum. It is devoutly to be hoped that Mr. Higginson's latest idea of making Boston's musicians his exclusive possession will not result to the detriment of either of these two excellent organizations.

Theodore Thomas, when here, made the remark that his orchestra was superior, not because it was composed of such superior musicians, but because these musicians never played under any other leadership than his. There can be no doubt that a single head to an orchestra is necessary before it can make any marked advances toward perfection; but a great many people will be tremendously disappointed if they are never to hear any other than Mr. Henschel's readings of the masters. It would really seem as if Mr. Higginson had no right to limit Boston's orchestral music to the baton of any leader who has had no more than a season's experience, when those who have grown old in the service are to be had.

New Works Produced.

During the season a number of works new to Boston have been produced. The Symphony orchestra has produced Brahms' "Tragic Overture," and a rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, by the same composer. It has also introduced to Boston a Notturmo serenade in D for four small orchestras by Mozart, and Massenet's "Phedre" overture. The Philharmonics have produced Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" tone picture and Raff's "In Summer" symphony. The Harvards have given, for the first time here, a Tchaikowsky pianoforte concerto, G. W. Chadwick's symphony in C and Fuch's serenade in D for string orchestra.

The Soloists.

In the number and variety of soloists at its concerts, the Symphony orchestra takes the lead.

Mr. Henschel has been assisted by Carl Baermann, Annie Louise Cary, William H. Sherwood, Mrs. Henschel, Signor Leandro Campanari, Theodore J. Toedt, Bernhard Listemann, Emily Winant, Carl Bayrhofer, George W. Sumner, Dr. Louis Maas, Charles Adams, Mme. Terese Liebe, Theodore Liebe, Fannie Kellogg, John A. Preston, Mary H. How, Alfred de Seve, Madeline Schiller, Mathilde Phillips, Marie Heimlicher, Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen, Mr. V. Cirillo.

The Philharmonic concerts have had Miss Fannie Kellogg, Carl Baermann (twice), Mrs. Ella Cleveland Fenderson, Herr E. Strasser, Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen.

The Harvards have had Camilla Urso, Mrs. W. B. Tanner, Madeline Schiller, Mrs. E. Humphrey-Allen, Miss Marguerite Hall and Carl Baermann.

The Works Produced.

The following is a complete list of the orchestral works produced in this city during the season by the Boston Symphony, the Philharmonic and the Harvard orchestras. As a matter of economy in space the different organizations producing the works are denoted simply by the first letter of their names, S, for the Symphony orchestra, P, for the Philharmonics, and H, for the Harvards. This list includes the announced programme for the final Philharmonic concert:

AUBER.—Overture, "La Part du Diable" (S).
BACH (J. S.).—Tocatta in F (S). Prelude, corale and fugue (P).
BACH (C. Ph. Em.).—Sinfonia in D (1760) (S).
BARGIEL.—Adagio for violoncello, A minor, op. 38 (S).
BEETHOVEN.—Nine symphonies, complete (S). "Eroica" symphony (H). Symphony No. 7, A minor (P). Pianoforte concerto in G, No. 4, op. 58 (S). Concerto for pianoforte in E flat (S). Concerto for pianoforte in G, op. 58 (P). Concerto for pianoforte in G, op. 58 (H). Concerto for violin, piano and violoncello, op. 56 (S). Overture, "Dedication of the House," op. 124 (S). Overture to Goethe's "Egmont" (S). Overture to "Coriolanus" (S). Overture to "Leonore," No. 1 (S). Overture to "Leonore," No. 2 (S). Overture to "Leonore," No. 3 (P). Andante and adagio from the ballet "Men of Prometheus" (H). Overture to "King Stephen," op. 17 (P).
BERLIOZ.—Overture Characteristique, "Le Carnaval Romain," op. 9 (H).
BIZET.—Suite "Arlesienne" (P).
BOUCHERIN.—Minuetto in A (S).
BOELDIEN.—Overture, "La Dame Blanche" (S).
BOISE.—Fest Overture (S).
BRAHMS.—Tragic Overture, op. 81 (new) (S). Rhapsody for contralto, male chorus and orchestra, op. 53 (first time) (S). Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 73 (S). Symphony in C, op. 68 (S).
G. W. CHADWICK.—Symphony in C (ms.), (first performance) (H). Andante from string quartet (P).
CHERUBINI.—"Faniska" overture (S). "Ali Baba" overture (S). "Water Carrier" overture (H). Overture, "Water Carrier" (P).
DELIBES.—Ballet Music, "Sylvia" (S).
DVORAK.—Two "Slavonian Dances," op. 46, Nos. 4 and 1 (S).
FUCHS.—Serenade in D for string orchestra (first time) (H).
GADE.—"In the Highlands" overture (S). Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 20 (H).
GLUCK.—Ballet music (S). Overture "Iphigenia" (P).
GOLDMARK.—"Landliche Hochzeit" (P). Scherzo (P).
GRIEG.—Concerto, A minor, op. 16 (S).
GRAMMAN.—Introduction to "Melusine," romantic opera, op. 24 (S).
HAYDN.—Symphony in B flat (No. 12 Breitkopf) (S). Symphony in C minor (No. 9 Breitkopf) (P). Symphony in G (Oxford 1794) (H).
HILLER.—Caprice, "The Sentinel" from "Soldier's Life," op. 146 (S).
HENSCHEL.—Andante for violin and violoncello (S). Trio for soprano, tenor and bass, op. 31 (S). Hymne au Createur (S).
HERLD.—Overture, "Zampa" (S).
HENSELT.—Concerto for pianoforte in F minor, op. 16 (S).

JAMES JOACHIM.—Concerto in D for violin, op. 11 (S).
FRANZ LACHNER.—March, in B flat, from suite, op. 113 (S).
LITOLFF.—Overture, "Robespierre" (P).
LISZT.—Hungarian fantasy, pianoforte and orchestra (S). Symphonic poem, "Les Preludes" (S). Symphonic poem (P).
MASSENET.—Overture, "Phedre," (first time) (S).
MARCHNER.—Overture, "The Vampire" (P).
L. MAAS.—Concerto for pianoforte, C minor, op. 12 (S). Pieces Characteristiques, op. 13 (P).
MOZART.—G minor Symphony (Koechel, No. 48) (S). Symphony in D (Koechel, No. 504) (S). Overture, Magic Flute (S). Masonic funeral music (S). Overture, Don Giovanni (P). Notturmo, serenade in D, for four small orchestras (first time) (S). "Jupiter" symphony (P).
MENDELSSOHN.—Reformation Symphony (S). "Italian" Symphony (H). Concerto for violin in E minor, op. 64 (S). Wedding March from the music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream," op. 61 (S). Violin Concerto in E minor, op. 64 (H). "Ruy Blas" overture (H). "Hebrides" overture (P). "Camacho's Wedding" overture (S). "Athalia" overture (S).
MEHUL.—"Joseph and His Brethren" (S).
MOSCHELES.—Overture to Schiller's "Maid of Orleans" (S).
NICOLAI.—Overture to "Merry Wives of Windsor" (S).
PAINE.—Prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus" (S). Symphony No. 1 in C minor (P).
RUBINSTEIN.—Symphony F, op. 46 (P).
ROSSINI.—Overture "Gazza Ladra" (H).
RAFF.—Symphony "In Summer" op. 208 (first time) (P). Overture, "Ein Fest Burg" (P).
RHEINBERGER.—Wallenstein, tone picture (first time) (P). Concerto A flat for pianoforte (P).
SAINT-SAENS.—Romance for violin in C op. 48 (S). Concerto for violoncello in A minor op. 33 (S). Concerto for pianoforte in C minor (S).
SCHUMANN.—Symphony in D minor (P). Symphony in D minor op. 120 (H). Symphony in B flat op. 38 (S). Overture, "Manfred" (S). Overture, scherzo and finale op. 52 (S). Concerto for piano, A minor. (S).
SCHUBERT.—Ballet music "Rosamunde" (S). Entr'act "Rosamunde" (P). Symphony in B minor (unfinished) (S). Symphony in C (S). Overture "Rosamunde" (H).
SPOHR.—Concerto for violin in A, No. 8, op. 47 (S). Concerto for violin, op. 55, No. 9 (H).
TSCHAIKOWSKY.—Pianoforte concerto in G, op. 44, first time (H).
WAGNER.—Introduction, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" (S). Kaisermarsch (S). Passages from "Lohengrin" (S). Introduction to third act, Dance of the Apprentices, etc., Mastersingers of Nuremberg (S). Overture, "Flying Dutchman" (P). Overture, "Rienzi" (P). Overture, "Faust" (P).
WEBER.—"Festival Overture" (S). Overture, "Oberon" (S). Overture, "Preciosa" (P). Clarinet concerto in E flat, op. 74 (P). Overture, "Euryanthe" (H).

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

The close of this winter's series of concerts, and the announcement of some of the details for next season, have been made the occasion of some rather severe public criticism, both upon the conductor, Mr. Henschel, and the project, Mr. Higginson. As for the former, he is the conductor simply, and is not to be held responsible for anything outside his department. For the general management, and especially for the terms of employment of the musicians, he is in no degree accountable. His merits as a conductor are certainly proper subject for open criticism. It is only by such discussion that a high standard can be raised and an exact taste cultivated. It is to be regretted, however, that much of this criticism has not been impartial in character or courteous in tone. There has sometimes appeared in it a bitterness which indicated a more personal origin than a pure and disinterested love of music.

Nor has it been altogether gracious for a few critics in dealing out their unmeasured censure to assume that all competent authorities were in accord upon the subject, and to sneer at the uncultivated audiences which have shown such unmistakable pleasure in these concerts. It is by no means true that all eminent musical authorities in Boston disapprove of Mr. Henschel's methods, and it is certainly a mistaken judgment which sets down the audiences as indiscriminating. We believe that these audiences represent the musical taste and cultivation of Boston, and if they have been stirred to somewhat unusual enthusiasm, this should be set down in large measure to the credit of the conductor, and it is certainly much to the advantage of the audience and the orchestra. But, however much opinions may differ regarding Mr. Henschel's methods, it is certainly nothing to be resented that the management has determined to entrust him with the leadership for another season. Many reasons may be thought of why it should seem wise to continue for a time the principal features of the plan as first constructed, and this is certainly a matter the decision of which must be trusted to the responsible head of the enterprise, and the public should be slow to judge where all the considerations cannot be known. Nor are the details of one year of such final and fatal importance in a scheme which is to endure so long a time and admits of constant amendment.

And this brings us to the subject of Mr. Higginson's relations to the enterprise. That these should have been from the outset misunderstood, is, perhaps, not very strange, but some of the recent criticism seems particularly mistaken and unjust. Mr. Higginson has established a permanent orchestra. His plan is not for next year or a few years only. What exact shape it will finally assume, and what will be the machinery of its administration, can not yet be said. Mr. Higginson has very wisely postponed giving it any unalterable character, and the first arrangements are necessarily tentative. Therefore for a time the direction is largely in his own hands. But to assert that this is because of a desire for autocratic control, and that Mr. Higginson is disposed to improve the occasion to gratify a fondness for arbitrary dictation, is a reckless charge so particularly wide of the truth that all who know Mr. Higginson must have read such intimations with almost as much amusement as indignation. That the management is principally in him is for the present necessary, but it is exercised with a very earnest desire to serve the public in the best way. Those who consider how many clashing, selfish interests the project has already aroused may well think it fortunate that its first tender beginnings were not entrusted to any general board made up in the vain attempt to conciliate opposition.

The proposal which Mr. Higginson has made for next season to the musicians has been first misrepresented and then severely condemned. The facts are these: It has become plain, after this season's experience, that a permanent orchestra must be kept more rigidly together, and that the members must be somewhat restricted in their miscellaneous outside engagements. These would seem to be movements most obviously in the direction of better discipline and efficiency. No one could long assume the responsibility of educating a permanent orchestra and not tighten the discipline in this manner. Without this, improvement is restricted, and beyond a certain near limit becomes impossible. No musician can do his best in the midst of a highly trained orchestra, who has played all the night before at a ball, or who plays every alternate night under a different leader and with different associates.

In offering engagements for the ensuing season, Mr. Higginson has accordingly required of each musician a large part of the last four days in the week for work in this orchestra. On one of these days is to be the public concert, on two of them public rehearsals, and on one or another of them probably a concert in some suburban place. Other work on those days is not absolutely prohibited. Teaching and even playing in small groups is allowed, but large orchestral work is forbidden.

Such is the proposal, but it is subject to modification. Each musician is free to accept or decline. Some have already accepted, some declined, many have not yet answered. It is hard to see how any musician can complain of an offer coupled with restrictions so obviously necessary to the success of the work at large. That the offer is unremunerative is not contended. If it so happens in any case, the musician will naturally decline. The pay is adjusted to the grade of the musician, and is meant to give a good return. Mr. Higginson has dealt with the musicians in the fairest and pleasantest way, and invited every one to come and discuss his case with him; and if any of the musicians are not yet persuaded of his desire to deal fairly with them, it must be those who have not taken him at his word, and talked the matter over with him face to face.

But it is not from the musicians that the most unreasonable criticism has come. It has been charged in some of the daily papers that Mr. Higginson has come into the Boston market with an open purse, bought up the supply of musicians, paid them to agree to work for nobody else, excepting at times practically unavailable, and has thus monopolized the material and crippled the other musical societies.

Now it should have softened the temper of these complainants to consider that whatever Mr. Higginson was doing he was doing not for his own glory but for the public, and that whatever these efforts were they had for their object furnishing the public with the best music at the lowest prices. But in fact the case is misstated. In considering how to get the best material for his purpose it was open to Mr. Higginson to go abroad and import as many musicians as he needed. This was a simple plan, but how would it have pleased our critics? The alternative was to use the material here, and this has been done in a way to give the least inconvenience to other societies consistent with proper efficiency in this. The other principal societies which come into the field to divide the time of the musicians are, the Philharmonic, the Harvard Musical Association, the Handel and Haydn Society, the Cecilia, the Apollo and the Boylston clubs, and these societies have been asked to name the days which would suit them best, and four of them have signified their satisfaction with the general plan proposed.

It is, moreover, not to be forgotten that the Boston symphony orchestra is expected to give twenty-five public concerts and fifty public rehearsals in Boston, and in addition to this a number of suburban concerts.

The total number of public concerts to be given by all the other societies will probably not equal half of this number. These figures should be borne in mind in discussing questions of inconvenience and a fair division of the available material.

It is much to be regretted that a spirit of rivalry, or a disposition to crowd, should have been imputed to Mr. Higginson. It is as far as possible from his purpose, and we are sure that no one actively engaged in any musical enterprise in Boston can have just cause for such a complaint.

One word upon another alleged grievance. It has been insinuated that the concerts of this season have been attended by fashionable audiences, who have crowded out the poorer lovers of music for whom it is assumed the enterprise was intended.

But how could the concerts have been put more completely within the public reach? No complaint has been made of the prices, which are of course lower than would be possible without a subsidy. The tickets were openly sold, and while the regular concerts were largely attended by holders of season tickets (sold for five and ten dollars), scarcely any season tickets were sold for the rehearsals.

But the most conclusive answer to this charge is in the crowd of people who thronged the rehearsals and who, judged by every visible sign, were people of moderate means, and represented, we are sure, the quiet, devoted lovers of music, to whom these concerts have been an inexpressible delight. The pleasure and gratitude of such as these must be Mr. Higginson's reward in the midst of this misunderstanding—a misunderstanding which is sure to be but temporary.

We print this morning a communication in which the far-reaching plans of Mr. Higginson in reference to the Boston symphony orchestra are partially set forth, and some facts are given as the best answer to misrepresentations and misunderstandings which were the result of ignorance. Nothing, we are assured, is further from the intention of Mr. Higginson than to be placed in an attitude of rivalry toward any other musical enterprise; and it will be with great satisfaction that lovers of music learn that arrangements are already made for an allotment of ample time to the several societies which have established themselves. A spirit of hostility to Mr. Higginson's undertaking is singularly ungracious, while honest and friendly criticism is neither out of place nor unwelcome.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra. The following extracts from a communication to the Daily Advertiser of this morning, clearly indicate the purposes of Mr. Henry L. Higginson's scheme for next season:

It has become plain, after this season's experience, that a permanent orchestra must be kept more rigidly together, and that the members must be somewhat restricted in their miscellaneous outside engagements. These would seem to be movements most obviously in the direction of better discipline and efficiency. No one could long assume the responsibility of educating a permanent orchestra and not tighten the discipline in this manner. Without this, improvement is restricted, and beyond a certain near limit becomes impossible. No musician can do his best in the midst of a highly trained orchestra, who has played all the night before at a ball, or who plays every alternate night under a different leader and with different associates. In offering engagements for the ensuing season, Mr. Higginson has accordingly required of each musician a large part of the last four days in the week for work in this orchestra. On one of these days is to be the public concert, on two of them public rehearsals, and on one or another of them probably a concert in some suburban place. Other work on those days is not absolutely prohibited. Teaching and even playing in small groups is allowed, but large orchestral work is forbidden. Such is the proposal, but it is subject to modification. Each musician is free to accept or decline. Some have already accepted, some declined, many have not yet answered. It is hard to see how any musician can complain of an offer coupled with restrictions so obviously necessary to the success of the work at large. That the offer is unremunerative is not contended. If it so happens in any case, the musicians will naturally decline. The pay is adjusted to the grade of the musician, and is meant to give a good return. Mr. Higginson has dealt with the musicians in the fairest and pleasantest way, and invited every one to come and discuss his case with him; and if any of the musicians are not yet persuaded of his desire to deal fairly with them, it must be those who have not taken him at his word, and talked the matter over with him face to face.

In reply to the charge made against Mr. Higginson that he has attempted to monopolize the material at command and thus cripple established musical societies, the writer says that these organizations—the Philharmonic, the Harvard Musical Association, the Handel and Haydn Society, the Cecilia, the Apollo and the Boylston clubs—have been asked to name the days which would suit them best, and four of them have signified their satisfaction with the general plan proposed. Attention is called to the fact that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is expected to give twenty-five public concerts and fifty public rehearsals in Boston, and in addition to this a number of suburban concerts, and that the total number of public concerts to be given by all the other societies will probably not equal half of this number.

208
Transcript
ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.

A communication in this morning's Advertiser, evidently inspired from the highest authority upon the question in hand, declares that the apprehension which has so greatly agitated Boston musical circles during the past fortnight, is founded upon a misunderstanding. Mr. Higginson does not and did not, it appears from this statement, aim at hindering other musical societies in the performance of their usual functions, and does not want to monopolize the musicians. We have never asserted that he did, while deploring the effect of his action. The public is bound to accept this manly explanation and avowal of purpose, and will be glad to have occasion to do so. Indeed, the explanation is supported by acts of a generosity akin to the public-spirited munificence which endowed the Boston symphony concerts at the start. The terms first offered the musicians have been withdrawn, and the other societies have been invited to confer with Mr. Higginson and arrange for their concerts and rehearsals to the best convenience. As their best customer, Mr. Higginson would naturally command the first choice of their days in the week. But it is understood that he does not, for his part, insist on that to the musicians. He now asks that the musicians give their services to him exclusively from Thursdays to Saturdays and Wednesday mornings of each week. This will give the Philharmonic Society Wednesday evenings for their concerts, and the preceding days of the week for their rehearsals, and will no doubt meet their wants. The other musical societies have already expressed their satisfaction with the room made for them in the scheme.

But apart from all the feeling of interested musical organizations which these arrangements may be trusted, we suppose, to quiet, there has been a more general revolt and a deeper and graver feeling in the musical community which Mr. Higginson has none too soon recognized. This feeling has grown out of some unfortunate, and as we must now believe, misleading, appearances and incidents. An autocrat in music is no more tolerable in our community than an autocrat in anything else. Particularly odious would be a self-appointed lawgiver who was unlearned in the law. Now, this year's flurry over the orchestral question has produced this much of good at all events—it has drawn from Mr. Higginson a clearer statement of his purpose, and one that was necessary for its due appreciation. It is given thus in the evidently authorized communication referred to:

And this brings us to the subject of Mr. Higginson's relations to the enterprise. That these should have been from the outset misunderstood is, perhaps, not very strange, but some of the recent criticism seems particularly mistaken and unjust. Mr. Higginson has established a permanent orchestra. His plan is not for next year or a few years only. What exact shape it will finally assume, and what will be the machinery of its administration, cannot yet be said. Mr. Higginson has very wisely postponed giving it any unalterable character, and the first arrangements are necessarily tentative. Therefore for a time the direction is largely in his own hands. But to assert that this is because of a desire for autocratic control, and that Mr. Higginson is disposed to improve the occasion to gratify a fondness for arbitrary dictation, is a reckless charge so particularly wide of the truth that all who know Mr. Higginson must have read such intimations with almost as much amusement as indignation. That the management is principally in him is for the present necessary, but it is exercised with a very earnest desire to serve the public in the best way. Those who consider how many clashing, selfish interests the project has already aroused may well think it fortunate that its first tender beginnings were not intrusted to any general board made up in the vain attempt to conciliate opposition.

So it is but a temporary and preliminary and passing stage of Mr. Higginson's enterprise that we now witness. The one-man power is not the central idea nor an essential one. A permanent Boston orchestra being once got into shape (or so we interpret the above), an institution of some kind worthy of the musical position of the city is to follow. Then the orchestra which Mr. Higginson will have created will prove a magnificent endowment or foundation for an academy, an opera, or whatever it may be, to be administered by a responsible board of musicians in the public interest. We can understand that, in looking about for an existing object for his munificence, Mr. Higginson may have concluded that the Harvard Musical Association was as much too old as the Philharmonic Society was too young to intrust with his design. But a union of all interests in the grand object of the future will by-and-by become possible with the new spirit and good understanding that are to be brought to bear on the question.

209
Boston Symphony Orchestra—A Statement.

Now that the first season of the Boston symphony orchestra is drawing to an immediate close, it might be well to say a few words, as from one who knows, about its maintenance and its permanence as an institution, two points which would seem to have been but vaguely understood or appreciated by the majority of the concert-going public.

Last year, when Mr. Higginson told us that he was going to give us an orchestra, to have and to hold, he did it in so few words, and in so quiet and almost over-modest a manner, that, perhaps, it was natural that many of us should not have really understood the nature of his donation. The fact is that he gives to Boston a standing orchestra, just as another might give a library or a collection of pictures, to be enjoyed for such very moderate prices that the pleasure and privilege is open to all. And this is not for one year, or for two years, but for all the years that we will enjoy it by being interested and educated and comforted by it. The material of which this orchestra may be composed, and the artist who may conduct it, will always be the best that can be found here, or brought from over the seas to recruit the ranks. This is not an enterprise, or a business speculation, and the terms loss and gain, which we have heard so often lately relating to it, are not in its conception or nature. The expenses of outlay are so very much larger than any possible income of receipts could be that if the plain figures could only be seen there would be no misconception in any one's mind.

Of the many worries and the annoying details which have necessarily attended the carrying out, single-handed, of this wide and serious plan, of the patience and forbearance which have been shown, not only to misconception, but to malicious and futile detraction, we say nothing because silence is best and worthiest; and we say no word of thanks to the giver of this good thing, because we know that he wants no thanks in words. But we do think it right that all the people who have been to the concerts this year, feeling that they could enjoy good music with no strain upon their purses to interfere with their pleasure, and all those who shall go next year, should know what is being done for them and for their children. In their gratification will be his gladdest reward. Transcript XXX.

The formal announcement by Mr. H. L. Higginson of the continuance of the Boston symphony orchestra, in our columns this morning, will be read with general satisfaction. Since the scope and significance of his plans were made public last week, there has been a sudden subsidence of the hostile criticism which sprang from a lack of information. Mr. Higginson's undertaking will appear to be more and more what it is, a public benefaction, and an injury to no person and to no worthy enterprise. Those who cannot take it as such and enjoy it are to be pitied.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

To the Editors of the Boston Daily Advertiser:—

When last spring the general scheme for the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra was put forth, the grave doubt in my mind was whether they were wanted. This doubt has been dispelled by a most kindly and courteous public, and therefore the scheme will stand. The concerts and public rehearsals, with Mr. Georg Henschel as conductor, will go on under the same conditions in the main as to time, place, programmes and prices. Any changes will be duly made public when the tickets are advertised for sale. Henry L. Higginson.

Boston.

MARCH 20.—"A wise man changes his mind, a fool never does." If that proverb is true there has been wisdom displayed in the recent course of Mr. Henschel, who has receded from his unpopular course, and has withdrawn the circular (sent you, by me, two weeks ago) from the musicians. The threat of importing "German cheap labor" into the musical market has also been receded from, and the probability is that the leader will only ask about three days' complete service from his men. He will also make arrangements as to terms, etc., individually with each member of the orchestra, and promises that every grievance shall be met in a fair spirit. The Boston Symphony Orchestra at present proposes to give two public rehearsals and one concert each week for twenty-five weeks next season, and in view of this, the proposition is not a very severe one, and is ameliorated by this change of base.

Musical - March 11, 1882 - Boston.

MARCH 6.—It is a good thing for Mr. Henschel that he received his silver salad set from his orchestra two weeks ago. Just at present there is no desire to give Mr. Henschel anything except censure. The cause of this sudden revulsion of feeling is that Mr. Henschel's efforts at musical reform appear to have suddenly become a little too sweeping, and seem to include the centralization of Boston's music in the hands of this conductor. Within a few weeks past the members of the Boston orchestra have received a circular, of which the following is a copy:

BOSTON, Feb. 25, 1882.

MR. ——. DEAR SIR:—I wish to engage you for the next season as under the following conditions:

I. The orchestra will have as conductor, Mr. George Henschel, and as leader, Mr. Bernard Listeman.

II. Your services will be required on each week, between October 1 and April 1, on the following days: Wednesday morning, afternoon and evening; Thursday morning, afternoon and evening; Friday morning and afternoon; Saturday morning and evening.

III. On Wednesday and Thursday all your time will, of course, not be required, but you must be ready when needed. You will be expected to play during these four days either at concerts or at rehearsals, as required. If it is necessary to give a concert occasionally on Friday you will be asked to give that evening in place of another.

IV. On the days specified you will neither play in any other orchestra nor under any other conductor than Mr. Henschel, except if wanted in your leisure hours by the Handel and Haydn Society, nor will you play for dancing.

V. I offer you weekly, and also your expenses when travelling on business of the orchestra.

It is the intention, if the circumstances are as favorable as at present, to make this a permanent orchestra of the highest order.

Its success will depend very greatly on your efforts and on your co-operation.

I wish to offer my sincere thanks for your labor and zeal during the present season, and hope for your services in the next.

In order to facilitate the needed arrangements, your answer is expected by March 2.

Yours truly,

Now this circular is a direct stab at the older organizations and rival conductors of Boston. It means that one or two organizations may make efforts to place their concerts on the off days which Mr. Henschel has been pleased to allow them, but some must be left in the cold, orchestraless and forlorn. I do not deny that it may make Mr. Henschel's musicians work with better effect under him, but I wonder (as the boy did when he had completed the study of the alphabet) whether it is worth while to go through so much to gain so little. Mr. Henschel is a good conductor and a thorough musician, but he is not the only one that Boston possesses. Years ago Boston was ruled by a ring of musicians with as much musical and administrative ability as Mr. Henschel possesses, yet their rule was held to be detrimental to the highest art interests of the city. If Boston declined to be ruled by a clique, she will certainly refuse to allow one new-comer, however able, to dictate her musical course. The manner in which the proposal was made was also one which forebodes tyranny. Some of the oldest members of the orchestra, men whose services to music in Boston have entitled them to deference and respect, were omitted altogether, and will be left out of the new organization. It was intimated strongly that in case the offer was rejected by the men, their places would be filled from the ranks of European orchestras. An innovation was also made in the salaries (none of which are very high), and many of the musicians find that the new scale of compensation ranks them below others of the orchestra whom they had never regarded as superiors.

Spite of the excuses and explanations offered, I cannot but view the scheme as arbitrary, and thoroughly adverse to the real growth of music in Boston. The musicians have rejected it, and it remains to be seen whether the conductor will perceive his mistake and gracefully yield his point, or will punish the resisting ones by glutting the Boston musical market with orchestral performers. L. C. ELBORN.

Mr. John Lyman tells me that he has talked with you on this subject generally - & any suggestions will be welcomed by me -

I am very glad that you organ friends should have enjoyed the concert, hope you'll find those of next year better -

Very truly

H. L. Higginson

Allen A. Brown

Mich. 19th '82.

Dear Sir, Too much business has delayed my answer to your kindly note.

It would be very simple & pleasant to allow the present holders of tickets to take the same seats next winter — but this can't be done — I've discussed at some length your plan & turned it over —

The public has been promised an equal chance, & if the present audience holds the house, it does so against the public as it were. I will try to devise some means for thwarting the speculators, but know of none at present — Is there any other way by which people, with slight extra pains, can secure desired seats? I have thought of offering a choice of seats at an advanced price — but I don't like that way either — The great organ, which is of ~~use~~ so little use, takes up the place for 200 seats, & makes, by the necessary height of the stage (to equal the plane of the organ,) two hundred more seats almost useless — A smaller organ would quite answer the purpose — I shall try to give two in place of one, public rehearsals next year —

MARCH 13th.—At last the great concert series of the Boston Orchestra is finished, and we can survey the field. When one looks over the programs of the twenty concerts given, it must be acknowledged that Boston has never had such a wealth of orchestral works in one season before. It is gratifying to note also that the attendance has been large from the first, and towards the close the crowds, both Fridays and Saturdays, were enormous. Even more than this—Boston has proved that no single society or musical organization can suffice for its needs; for, besides the works given by Mr. Henschel, as great and even greater performances have been given under other auspices. The Handel and Haydn Society, under Mr. Zerrahn, have given Gramm's "Tod Jesu;" the Harvard Symphony Orchestra, also under Mr. Zerrahn, have given Chadwick's symphony; the Philharmonic Society, Rheinberger's "Wallenstein" symphony, and have introduced the best pianist of the season, Prof. Baermann, to Boston; and also have given Raff's "In Summer" symphony; the Cecilia Club (Mr. Lang's) have performed Berlioz's "Requiem;" the Boylston Club has sung David's "Desert;" the list is almost too long to continue. All the above works have been given for the first time in Boston, some for the first time in America. If any argument were needed for the continuance of several organizations in friendly rivalry, the above list would furnish it. All the concerts named have been largely attended. Opposition seems to be the life of music as well as of trade.

The matter of a permanent orchestra wholly under Mr. Henschel's control, is yet in abeyance. I hope that it may not succeed, at least not in the manner proposed. Granting that Mr. Henschel's object is only to secure a thorough organization and overcome the bane of orchestral music in Boston—the constant attendance of musicians at balls, parades, etc., making them unfit for rehearsal the next day—the salary offered is far too small for to compensate the loss inflicted. The reasoning of Mr. Henschel on this point is sound, but can be extended a trifle further. If the musicians damage their art career by too much dance and march music, does not Mr. Henschel also owe it to his career as a conductor to abandon the giving of vocal recitals and appearing as pianist at various concerts? Should he not devote all his time to studying the various comments of great authorities on the works he is leading? The mere fact that he has memorized Beethoven's scores does not yet seem all-sufficient, he certainly is not in the spirit of some of them. He must set his musicians the example of self-sacrifice.

The fact that musicians can be brought from Europe at the salary offered, may be allowed, but whether it is best to introduce the excellent material of German orchestras together with the semi-starvation salaries of that country is one which may be doubted. It would be only a temporary success at the best, for the foreign musicians would soon find that they could earn more outside of the orchestra than in it, and even the sons of art have a lingering desire for filthy lucre, particularly if they study the shining example of Mr. Henschel in this direction. Finally, Mr. Henschel has not yet proved his right to such exceptional advantages as he demands. While he was in London and in Germany, unable to obtain an orchestra (and they have some rather poor conductors in London) Messrs. Zerrahn, Lang and others gave Boston same good music under far less advantageous circumstances. I have found Mr. Henschel to be a good and even great musician, "but still the interesting fact remains" that he has been experimenting at conducting during the past season. The post is new to him, and he has yet much to learn. Spite of his faithfulness to the instrumentation of scores, and to the various repeats, etc., of the different composers, the same fidelity does not extend to representing their meaning. The errors of conception have been many, and some readings have been individualized to a ludicrous extent. That the ensembles have been improving rapidly, and that the faults are disappearing, was only what I predicted of the orchestra and leader months ago, but if the autocratic plan is to be carried out it would be well to wait until Mr. Henschel has become a great conductor (I think he will be that some day), and until he can form a fine orchestra without jeopardizing the bread and butter of the musicians.

The final concert of the series took place last Saturday. The program was a very fine one. It began with the prelude to the "Edipus" music, conducted by the composer, Prof. J. K. Paine. The musicians did not seem entirely at ease under the beat of Prof. Paine, but nevertheless there were no mishaps. Of the music itself I have too often spoken my hearty admiration to need to add any further remarks. It was followed by a vocal Trio from Mr. Henschel's setting of the 130th Psalm, a fine work, of the usual symmetry which is so characteristic of the composer. It was dedicated to Princess Louise, shortly after her wedding with the Marquis of Lorne, I believe, and also contains an "Amen" chorus, and a bass solo of much beauty and musicianly development. It was well sung by Mrs. Humphreys-Allen and Messrs. Adams and Cirillo. The "Wedding March" (Mendelssohn), was given with all the appropriate blare of trumpets and hurly-burly of rejoicing.

Then came the great Ninth Symphony. Although it had its faults, I do not recollect having heard it so well given, as a whole, in Boston. The performance at the Handel and Haydn Triennial was not nearly as good. The chief faults of the present performance were that the first movement was somewhat hurried, and the execution blurred; the wood wind, which has so effective a part in the Scherzo, was not prominent enough; the horn work was terribly broken up; the acceleranda leading to the Trio became a scramble, and the final portion of the vocal work was unsingably rapid.

The Adagio, save for the antics of the horn, was well given.

The last movement (the "Choral") was as well done in the chorus numbers as we expect to hear it. There were many prominent artists in the ranks, and their efforts sustained the terrible ordeal with good effect. This movement is, and remains, unsingable. It takes great artists to fill the chorus parts, and it would require angels to sing the solos—and Mr. C. R. Adams is not an angel; therefore, his voice broke under the severe strain. Signor Cirillo sang the bass part with excellent method, but without much breadth of feeling. The two ladies—Mrs. Allen and Miss How—sang well. Of course, the bass skips (chorus) at "Oh, embrace now," were not sung well, and they never can be.

It seems hypercritical to pick flaws in the execution of the work, for its difficulties are so colossal that one always expects some blemishes. The popular enthusiasm was immense. Mr. Henschel was applauded to the echo, and his standing with the general public is an assured one, spite of the comments of the wicked and rather unanimous critics, who at present are looked upon by concert-goers as a sort of representation of the evil principle, Satan, Belzebub, and things of that sort.

Other concerts must be disposed of in rather summary fashion. The Harvards closed their brief series with a concert last Thursday afternoon, which I was unfortunately unable to attend. Professor Baermann repeated his great success in the Beethoven Fourth Piano Concerto. It is the finest number in his repertoire, I believe. I hope earnestly that the Harvards may remain undevoured next season, and continue their good work. Mr. Zerrahn has never made a better impression than he has done in these concerts, and the orchestra have been uniformly good. I hope that the Music Hall may be the future location of these concerts, as the Museum is not as well adapted to music.

Miss Heimlicher gave a second piano recital at the Meionuon, Thursday, which confirmed the impressions of my last letter. She will remain in Boston and undoubtedly take good rank among our resident artists.

Mr. Perabo, possibly to make amends for not appearing as a performer in the concerts announced as his own, is to play a program of Beethoven's music at Chickering's, April 4. This great artist is, unfortunately, heard only too seldom in his own city.

I cannot close my letter without referring in high praise to the series of Petersilea-Campanari chamber concerts which have just ended (we use the "block" system of concerts here), and which were among the best of their kind. All schools of composition were represented in the programs, and many works were heard for the first time. Mr. Petersilea has received copious compliments on his work at these concerts, and his playing deserved them, for it is more refined than formerly, and is always well balanced and clearly phrased. Sig. Campanari is a thorough artist, and his violin playing is well intoned and brilliant, but free from sensational effects.

I forgot to say that the program of the Boston Symphony Concert for next season is already partially announced, and is to include the new Rubinstein Symphony (G minor) and Schumann's Concerto in A minor, played by Prof. Baermann. Thus do coming events cast their shadows before, and, unless the Symphony Society swallows up the other organization, there will be plenty of work and pleasure ahead for

L. C. E.

1882

Boston.

Music NY.

APRIL 24.—Spite of the fact that the orchestras have been put into camphor for the Summer season there are still some points of interest connected with them which keep them from being even temporarily forgotten. The only sounds which emerge from them at present are discords. The Philharmonic Society is soon to elect a new director for the coming season. Will it be the Doctor who has led them this year? Quien Sabe? Several of the musicians do not like the Doctor's physic and say that he ousted Lis emann too unceremoniously. Others say that he is unable to inspire the men, and that several musicians were found fast asleep during the andante movements, and that many trombone passages which could not be accounted for were simply the snores of the sleepers. Yet Doctor Maas has many friends in the society (among whom I might mention Messrs. Sherwood, Orth and others), and these are earnestly striving to retain him as director. About his great technical ability and musical knowledge there can be no question. His ability to develop the best qualities of the musicians is another matter.

Mr. Henschel in this respect is a success. He manages to electrify them into brilliant work. At present, however, they have been electrified by a new revision of salaries, and the whilom leading violoncellist was astounded to find that he was offered less pay than many of the inferior players. I only cite this as a specimen case. It is said that many musicians are to be brought on from New York, and the idea of importing German cheap labor has not been abandoned. It is the same old "circular" business over again. The proposal, which I wrote about a month ago, has been receded from, but, as Gibbon says, "the nature of the wolf is unchanged." Instead of enforcing the edict on the whole orchestra, the men are being overcome in detail. It is the same kind of mercy as that which prompted the man to chop off his dog's tail at the rate of an inch every day. But if I venture to protest against methods, I certainly also want to acknowledge that Mr. Higginson's noble donation towards forming an orchestra was the main spring of the great musical season now drawing to a close. It caused opposition, but opposition is the life of music, and it obliged all Boston's musical organizations to keep to a high standard. It cured a great deal of flabby criticism also, and, with one very great exception, the daily press of Boston has taken great strides forward, and has discarded the adjective-mongers and the diplomatic journalists whose chief struggle has been to get through "two sticks of matter" without exposing the fact that they knew nothing whatever of what they were talking about.

MUSIC IN BOSTON.

THE all-absorbing topic which has filled the musical columns of the daily press here, and has been the subject of unceasing talk and recrimination in musical circles, has been the last concert of the Boston symphony concerts, on March 11, when Beethoven's Ninth Symphony was—was—

But, let us see. Mr. Henschel is a musical curiosity; to a certain extent, a musical paradox.

A highly-cultivated musician, in the general sense of the term; a singer of more than ordinary culture, and an intelligent gentleman on the one hand, and on the other, an intolerable orchestral conductor, who never raises the baton without making sad mistakes.

It is difficult to say what he did with the Ninth Symphony, but an application of a newspaper bulletin announcement to the result of this last concert under his direction would read about as follows:

Gathering of the Henschel Clans.

Terrific Onslaught on Beethoven's Ninth.

Total Route and Destruction of Beethoven's Ninth.

To give an estimate of the complete fiasco that characterized the evening's work, a few extracts from the press must be quoted. Says the Advertiser: "That Mr. Henschel did not adhere to Beethoven's injunctions, we scarcely need to say. It is now a fixed fact that he either cannot or will not follow his author, except so far as it seems good to him."

This extract is handling the tutor of Queen Victoria's children with kid gloves. Another journal, The Evening Transcript, in referring to the difficulties in the vocal and orchestral parts of the symphony, states: "We regret to say that Mr. Henschel did not succeed in making his orchestra conquer one of them; the work was given with all its imperfections boldly displayed to public view, and was treated with no more circumspection than if it had been the most plain-sailing symphony of Haydn."

Speaking of the tempi taken by Henschel, it says: "A conductor who cannot keep up a fixed tempo is just as bad as a chorus which falls from the pitch when it sings without accompaniment."

But of all the complimentary remarks which Mr. Henschel receives, those of the Saturday Evening Gazette are transcendent.

The critic takes him to task for all his many faults in the plainest language without any circumlocution.

Among the many remarks that appear is the following: "If we may be permitted to indulge in a bull, we would say that could Beethoven have heard this brutal crucifixion of his great work, he would have rejoiced in his deafness."

It calls the performance an "outrage;" the reading, "blustering, absurd and inefficient," and states that Mr. Henschel "cannot beat a dozen consecutive bars in the same time."

This censure is not confined to a few papers, but is the unanimous opinion of the press.

Yet the audience at Music Hall on the night in question applauded every movement, and gave Mr. Henschel a perfect and pronounced ovation.

This ovation aided in disgusting the local critics more than anything else. All the musical culture of Boston applauds an absurd performance of Beethoven's greatest work!

This is significant to some of the critics, while others are not surprised.

Mr. Henschel is the protégé of Mr. Higginson, who now intends to give twenty-five concerts and fifty public rehearsals next season, in addition to twenty-five private rehearsals, one for each concert being given during the season, four performances during the week—one on Wednesday forenoon (the private rehearsal), a public rehearsal on Thursday evening, one on Friday evening, and the concert on Saturday night.

The musicians must not play at any balls or other performances during the days devoted to these concerts which might jeopardize the style of their playing for the symphony concerts.

This is a "corner" for musicians, and has raised a storm of indignation, as it virtually destroys the Harvard and Philharmonic Concerts.

The papers have made such a "row" that a compromise is likely to be effected. All these incidents have caused a flurry in the Boston World of Music, and much bitterness of feeling has been engendered.

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS.

Finis coronat opus, which may be freely translated to mean that the various opuses which the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been performing have come to an end. What a series it has been! Not only have numerous new works been given, but a great many decidedly new readings of old works have been heard. Besides this, Beethoven's birthday was celebrated by giving a programme of his works; Mozart's, by giving a symphony and overture; and Henschel's by giving—a silver salad set!

The orchestra has made music for the critics, and the critics have made music for the orchestra and the leader, and just now the latter performance is becoming presto agitato, feroce, and con fuoco, for Mr. Henschel, aided by Mr. Higginson, has evolved a scheme which may advance the efficiency of his orchestra a little, but which will, if carried out, be detrimental to the growth of music in Boston, besides being disastrous to the musicians, pecuniarily. The plan is to engage the entire time of the musicians four days in the week, which would leave three days (one being Sunday) for the Harvards, Philharmonics, Apollo Club, Boylston Club, Handel and Haydn Society and other organizations to get in their orchestral performances and rehearsals. Some of these must cease orchestral concert giving, or must obtain players from New York if the scheme succeeds. The musicians are also requested to give up dance-playing and other engagements which interfere with their art-development, but foster their pocket-books.

The musicians have been offered no very princely sum for the sacrifices demanded, Mr. Henschel evidently believing that they should follow his own example, and make art, like virtue, its own reward. The whole proposition was strengthened by the intimation that if the Boston musicians did not accept, others would be brought from Germany to fill their places. I should be sorry to find the high standard of German music in Boston if it needed to be accompanied by the low standard of the musical salaries of Boston.

The final concert of the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

for this season was given March 11, and attracted an enormous audience. Prof. Paine's prelude to "Oedipus" was given under his own direction. The musicians did not play very steadily, being unaccustomed to the undemonstrative quiet beat of the conductor; but there were no great inaccuracies, and the work and composer were received with deserved enthusiasm. One of Mr. Henschel's vocal works was well received. The great attraction was, however, the 9th Symphony of Beethoven. The execution of the music was, as a whole, good, although there were some distortions of time, and a great deal of sputtering in the horns, in the second and third movements. As to the vocal part it was as well done as we can hope to have it at present, in Boston. Mr. Adams sang very well until the final portion of the work, when his voice became tired, and broke. Mr. Cirillo sang clearly and with fine method, but lacked breadth in the bass solos. The ladies, Mrs. Humphrey-Allen and Miss How, sang well, but also showed signs of exertion before the end was reached. In the chorus were many eminent artists, who found quite enough to do in singing this unvocal work. It is triumphant, Miltonian, Titanic, if you will, but so unsingable that the symphony is often more enjoyable with the final movement left out. I must say, however, that the performance was better than the last one, some two years ago, at the Triennial Festival. Mr. Henschel received a perfect ovation at the end of the concert. The public are ready to swear by him even if he should turn a Beethoven symphony into a quadrille. I feel deeply sensible of the good musicianship which is in the man; I admire his taste in singing, his well-balanced piano-playing, his poetic musical compositions; and I have found much that is good in his conducting, but this unreasoning enthusiasm is not beneficial either to the public or its object. There have been many faults in the works of the past season, and Mr. Henschel is a growing, not a finished conductor. The public must not forget that the Berlioz "Requiem," the Wallenstein Symphony, Raff's "In Summer" Symphony, Chadwick's Symphony, David's "Desert," and many other works have helped to make this season a notable one. Folio April 1882

VOLUMES 2

1882-1883

☆☆ M 125-5

Vol. II

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY OF THE CITY OF BOSTON
THE ALLEN A. BROWN COLLECTION

GEORGE HENSCHEL, ESQ
E. ONSLOW FORD, R.A.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1882 - 1883 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS

COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

8185

L.S. J. 1885

BOSTON
SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON

✻ 1882 - 1883 ✻

PROGRAMMES AND COMMENTS

COMPILED BY

ALLEN A. BROWN

L. S. J. Spence & Co.

8185

TIGHT BINDING

Index

7

Composer	Name of Work	Concert	Date	Soloists
Auber	Overture to "Masaniello"	II	Oct 14
	" " "Lac des Fées"	VII	Nov 18
	" " "Part du diable"	XXIII	Feb 3.83
	Slumber Air from Masaniello	II	Oct. 14	Chas. R. Adams
Bach J.S.	Air & Gavotte from Suite in D	XXIV	Mar 17.83
Bach - Saint Saens	Largo for Piano	XIX	Feb 10.83	H. G. Tucker
Bargiel	op 38. Adagio for Cello with orch.	III	Oct 21.	Wilhelm Müller
Beethoven	Symphony No. 1. op 21	II	Oct 14
	" 2. " 36	V	Nov 4
	" 3 " 55	VIII	" 25
	" 4 " 60	XI	Dec 16
	" 5 " 67	XIV	Jan 6.83
	" 6 " 68	XVIII	Feb 3.
	" 7 " 92	XXI	" 24
	" 8 " 93	XXIII	Mar 10
	" 9 " 125	XXVI	" 31
	Solos by Sop. K. Van Arnhem alto Gertrude Edwards Ten Jules Jordan Bass T. Cirillo Organ - B. J. Lang
Ber.	"Dedication of the House" op 124	I	Oct 7.
	"Kamensfeier" op 115	XXV	Mar 24.83
	"Fidelis"	XXII	Mar 3. "
	Finale "Creatures of Prometheus" op 43	VII	Nov. 18.
	Concerto for Piano & orch. No 4. op 58 m. 9.	XXVII	Jan 27.83	Carl Baermann

* No. 125. 5. Vol 2

1881-1893

Allen A. Brown

Aug 14, 1894

127.

TIGHT BINDING

32 variations for Piano	IX	Dec 2. 82	Carl Baer	Ernst K	Slavonian Dances No. 3. op 46	IX	Dec 2. 82
Two Bagatelles for Piano	I	Oct 7	"	"	" " Nos 5. & 6	XXIV	Mich 17. 83
Oh! Pufido! Scene & aria with orch.	XVI	July 20. 83	K. van Amstel	Ernst	Concert Pathétique for violin & orch	VII	Nov. 18	Bern. Listemann
Claverius Songs from 'Egmont'	XXIV	Mich 17.	Mrs Geo. H. H.	Franz R.	"Im Herbst" (with piano acc.)	XXIII	Feb 3.	Mrs. Albi. Schimmig
Bennett W.S. Overture to the "Naiads"	XXIII	Feb 3.		Gade	Symphony No 4 in B flat op 20.	XXI	Mich 24.
Berlioz Menuet					Ouverture to "Ossian"	III	Oct 21.
Dance of the Sylphs } Faust	XII	Dec 23.		Reich	Symphony in E flat No. 2. op 46.	X	Dec 9.
Hungarian March } Faust
Overture "Le Carnaval Romain"	XLV	July 6. 83		Gluck	Aria "O del mio dolce ardor"	XI	Dec 16.	Mrs. Anna Drosdie
Brachms Symphony No. 1. op 68	XII	Dec 23.		"	"Sphigenia in Tauris"	XXIII	Mich 10. 83	Mrs. J. Noedt
" " 2. " 73	XXIV	Mich 17. 83		Goldmark	Ouverture to "Sakuntala"	IV	Oct 28
Overture "Academic Festival"	VII	Nov 18.		Gounod	Funeral march of a Marionette	IV	Oct 28.
Serenade in D. op 11.	IV	Oct 28
Hungarian Dances Nos. 1. 11. 13	I	Oct 7		Grammann C.	Prelude to "Melusine"	VIII	Nov 25.
" " No. 5	XX	July 13. 83		Graun	Aria from "Der Tod Jesu"	XXIV	Mich 17.	Mrs. Georg. Henschel
Bruch, Max Symphony No. 3 in E mss	XXII	Mich 3. 83		Grieg	2 Melodies for strings op 34	XXIII	Feb 2. 83
Prelude to "Loreley"	XI	Dec 16.		Handel	Aria from "Rodelinda"	IV	Oct 28	Mrs. Hen. Rubee
Concerto for Violin & orch. in G op 26	III	Oct 21.	Louis Schmitt		Aria from "Alessandro"	VIII	Nov 25	Mrs. Geo. Henschel
Chadwick G.W. op 10. Overture to "Thalia"	XX	Sept 3.			Rec. and Aria from "Jephtha"	XX	Sept 10. 83	Mrs. J. H. H.
(Conducted by the Composer)				Haydn	Symphony in C (Br. & H. No. 7)	III	Oct 21
Cherubini Ovr. "L'Hotellerie Portugaise"	V	Nov 5.		"	"The Spirit Song"	XXI	Feb 24. 83	Mrs. Mary How
Chopin Concerto Piano & orch. No. 1. op 11.	XII	Dec 23	Madelaine		Capriccio "The Sentinel"	XXI	Feb 24. 83
" " No. 2. 21	XXII	Mich 3. 83	Adèle Mangin
Andante Adonaise for Piano	V	Nov 4.	Olga & Rader	Hiller F.
Cowen F. H. Scandinavian Symphony	XXVII	July 27. 83

TIGHT BINDING

Henschel G.	Concerto for Piano & orch. "K. 455"	IX	Dec 2.	Carl Baermann	Mozart	Symphony in C (Br. & H. nob.)	VII	Nov 18.
	"De Deum" for orch. organ Solo & choro.	XVI	Nov 31. 83			Overture "Il Seraglio"	XII	Dec 23.
	Solos by Sop. K. Van Arnhem					"Magic Flute"	XXIV	Nov 7. 83
	alto Gertrude Edmunds					Concerto for Piano & Orch. (Koch. 503)	XXV	Nov 24.	Carl Baermann
	Ten Julius Jordan					"Voi che sapete" (with orch)	VI	Nov 11.	Miss Emily Winant
	Bass R. Caille					Aria Idomenus Zeffiretti	X	Dec 9.	Mrs H. F. Knowles
	Organ. B. J. Lang					"Per Picta"	XI	" 16.	Miss Anna Dradil
						"Il Seraglio" Che per aspro	XXIII	Feb 3. 83	Abbie Whinnery
Jensen A.	"Lehn deine Wang" (with Piano)	XXIII	Nov 10. 83	Thos. J. Ded		Op. 11. The Tempest
	"An der Linden"	XV	Jan. 13. 83	Mrs. E. H. Allen	Baermann J. K.	(Conducted by the Composer)	XXIII	Nov 10.
Liszt F.	"Tasso" Symphonic Poem	XIX	Feb 10. 83
	"Rhapsody" No 8 for Piano	I	Oct 7	Carl Baermann
	"Rackety March"	XXVII	Jan 27. 83	"	Raff J.	Symphony Nos. Lenore	XV	Jan 13. 83
	"Au bord d'une Source"	XXII	Nov 3.	Miss Adels		Ouv. "Dame Kobold"	XV	Jan 13. 83
	"In liebes Lust" Song with Piano	XXIII	" 10.	Thos. J. Ded	Reincke	Entr'acte "Maupied"	V	Nov 4.
Massenet	"Scenes Alsaciennes" for orch.	XVI	Jan 20. 83		Rubinstein A.	Symphony Nos in G minor op 107	I	Oct 7
Mendelssohn	Symphony No 3 in A minor op 56	XVI	Jan 20. 83			Concerto for Piano & orch No 3. op 45	XIV	Jan 6. 83	B. J. Lang
	Overture "Ruy Blas" op 95	III	Oct 21.			" No 4. op 70	XIX	Feb 10.	H. G. Tucker
	"Hebrides"	XIV	Jan 6. 83			Etude in C major for Piano	"	"	"
	"Midsummer night dream"	XIX	Feb 10. "			Ballet Music from "Teramors" (orch.)	X	Dec 9.
	"St. Paul"	XXVI	Nov 31. "			"Mein Herz schmückt dich" with Piano	XXIII	Feb 3.	Abbie Whinnery
	Capriccio in B minor for Piano with orch	V	Nov 4.	Miss Olga	Rubinstein Nic.	Parantette for Piano	XXII	Nov 3.	Adèle Mangullis
	Songs - Italy with Piano	IV	Oct 28	Miss H. R.	Saint-Saens	"Danse Macabre" for orch.	V	Nov 4.
	The Charmes "	"	"	"		Dances des Pretres } Sansonnet Delila	XXII	Nov 3. 83
	Concert air "Infelice"	XV	Jan. 13. 83	Mrs. E. H. Allen		Bacchanale
Meyerbeer	Polonaise from "Struensee" orch	VIII	Nov 25			Concerto Piano & orch No 2. op 22	X	Dec 9.	Otto Wendt
	Scene from "Le Profeta" Ah figlio mio with orch.	XXI	Feb 24. 83	Miss Mary
Monigny	Chaconne et Rigodon (Alme)	II	Oct 14.		Schubert	Symphony in B minor	IX	Dec 2.
						" " C	XIII	" 30
						" " B flat nos mss.	XIV	Feb 10. 83
						Ballet Music Rosamunde	XI	Dec 16.
						Ouv. "Alfaro und Estrella"	XXIV	Jan 27. 83
						"Der Lindenbaum" from for Piano by Liszt	"	"	Carl Baermann

TIGHT BINDING

Schumann	Symphony No. 4 op 120.	VI	Nov 11.
	Overture 'Bride of Messina' op 100	IX	Dec 2.
	" Senorena	XXIII	Feb 10.83
	" Skerzo and Finale op 52	XXIV	Dec 30.
	Piano Concerto in A min op 54	I	Oct 7	Carl Baer
	'Carnaval' of 9 for Piano	XXV	Feb 24.83	"
	Dichterliebe Nos. 1. 2. 3 with piano	XVI	Jan 20.83	H. F. Arnold
Stradella	Aria di Chiesa (with orch)	VI	Nov 11.	Emily Wink
Tschaiikowsky	March Slave for orch.	XXI	Feb 24.83
	" Nur wer die Sehnsucht kennt "	XV	Jan. 13.83	Mrs. E.H. Allen
Reusstemp	Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for Violin	VII	Nov 18	Rem. Liston
Talkmann	Serenade for Strings op 63. No 2.	XIII	Nov 25.
Wagner R.	a Faust Overture	XVI	Jan 20.83
	Overture to 'Rienzi'	II	Oct 14
	" "Tannhauser"	XI	Dec 16.
	Intro. to the 'Meistersinger'	XVII	Jan 27.83
	" " "	XX	Feb 17
	Prelude to "Parsifal"	VI	Nov 11.
	" " "	XX	Feb 17.83
	Prelude to 'Tristan u. Isolde'	"	" "
	'Siegfried Idyll'	"	" "
	Death March 'Götterdämmerung'	"	" "
	Huldigungs March	VI	Nov 11.
	Five Chorus from the 'Walkyrie'	XIII	Dec 30.
	Prayer from 'Rienzi' with orch.	II	Oct 14	Chas. A. Adm
	Lohengrin Legend & Farewell (with orch)	XX	Feb 17.83	"

Wotan's Farewell to Brunnhilde	XIII	Dec 30.	Mr. Heuschel
Pogner's address 'Meistersinger'	XX	Feb 17.83	"
Siegfried's Lullaby 'Walkyrie'	XV	Jan 13.83	W. J. Wink
Elizabeth's Greeting 'Tannhauser'	XX	Feb 17.83	Mad. Gabriella Boema
Overture to 'Der Freischütz'	IV	Oct 28
" "Euryanthe"	X	Dec 9.
" "Jubilee"	XXI	Feb 24.83
Polacca Brillante Piano with orch.	XIV	Jan 6.83	B. J. Lang
	arr. by Liszt
'Und ob die Wolke' from Freischütz with orch.	XIII	Nov 25	Mr. G. Heuschel
'Sena u. Aria' Ocean, Oberon	XX	Feb 17.83	Mad. Gab. Boema

Composers, with number of works given

Auber	4
Bach J. S.	1
Bach. Saint-Saens	1
Bargiel	1
Beethoven	18
Bennett M. S.	1
Berlioz	4
Brahms	8
Bruch, Max	3
Chadwick G. W.	1
Cherubini	1
Chopin	3
Cowan F. H.	1
Dvorak	3
Ernst	1
Franz Rott.	1
Gade	2
Gernsheim	1
Gluck	2
Goldmark	1
Gounod	1
Grammann C.	1
Graun	1
Grieg	1
Handel	3
Haydn	2
Hiller F.	1
Henschel G.	2
Jensen A.	1
Liszt F.	5
Massenet	1
Mendelssohn	8
Meyerbeer	2

Monsigny	1
Mozart	8
Pamé J. H.	1
Raff J.	1
Reincke	2
Rubinstein, A.	6
Rubinstein, Nic.	1
Saint-Saens	2
Schubert	6
Schumann	9
Stradella	1
TschaiKowsky	1
Vienatempo	1
Volkmann	1
Wagner	16
Weber	6

Soloists: with dates of appearances.

Piano	Baermann, Carl	Oct 7. 1882
	" "	Dec 2. "
	" "	Jan 27. 1883
	" "	Mar 24. "
	" "
	Bendix, Otto	Dec 9. 1882
	Lang B. J.	Jan 6. 1883
	Marquies, Adèle	Mar 3. "
	Radecke, Olga von	Nov 4. 1882
	Schiller, Madeline	Dec 23. "
Violin	Tucker H. G.	Feb 10. 1883
	Lichtenmann, Bern.	Nov 18. 1882
	Schmidt, Louis	Oct 21. "
Cello
	Müller, Wilh.	Oct 21. 1882

Singers

Adams Chas. R.

Oct 14. 1882

"
Arnheim K. von

Feb 17. 1883

Mich 21. 1883

"
Reeber, Miss Henrietta

May 20. "

Oct 28. 1882

Boema, Mat. Gabr.

Feb 17. 1883

Cirillo V.

Mich 31. "

Drasdel, Miss Anna

Dec 16. 1882

Edmonds, Miss Gertrude

Mich 31. 1883

Henschel Mrs Geo.

Nov 25. 1882

"
Henschel Mr. Geo.

Mich 17. 1883

Dec 30. 1882

"
How, Miss Mary

Feb 17. 1883

Feb 24. "

Jordan, Jules

Mich 31. "

Knowles Mrs H. H.

Dec 9. 1882

Doedt, Theo. J.

Mich 10. 1883

Whinnery, Miss Abbie

Feb 3. "

Wmiant, Miss Emily

Nov 11. 1882

Witch W. J.

Jan 13. 1883

Organ -

Lang B. J.

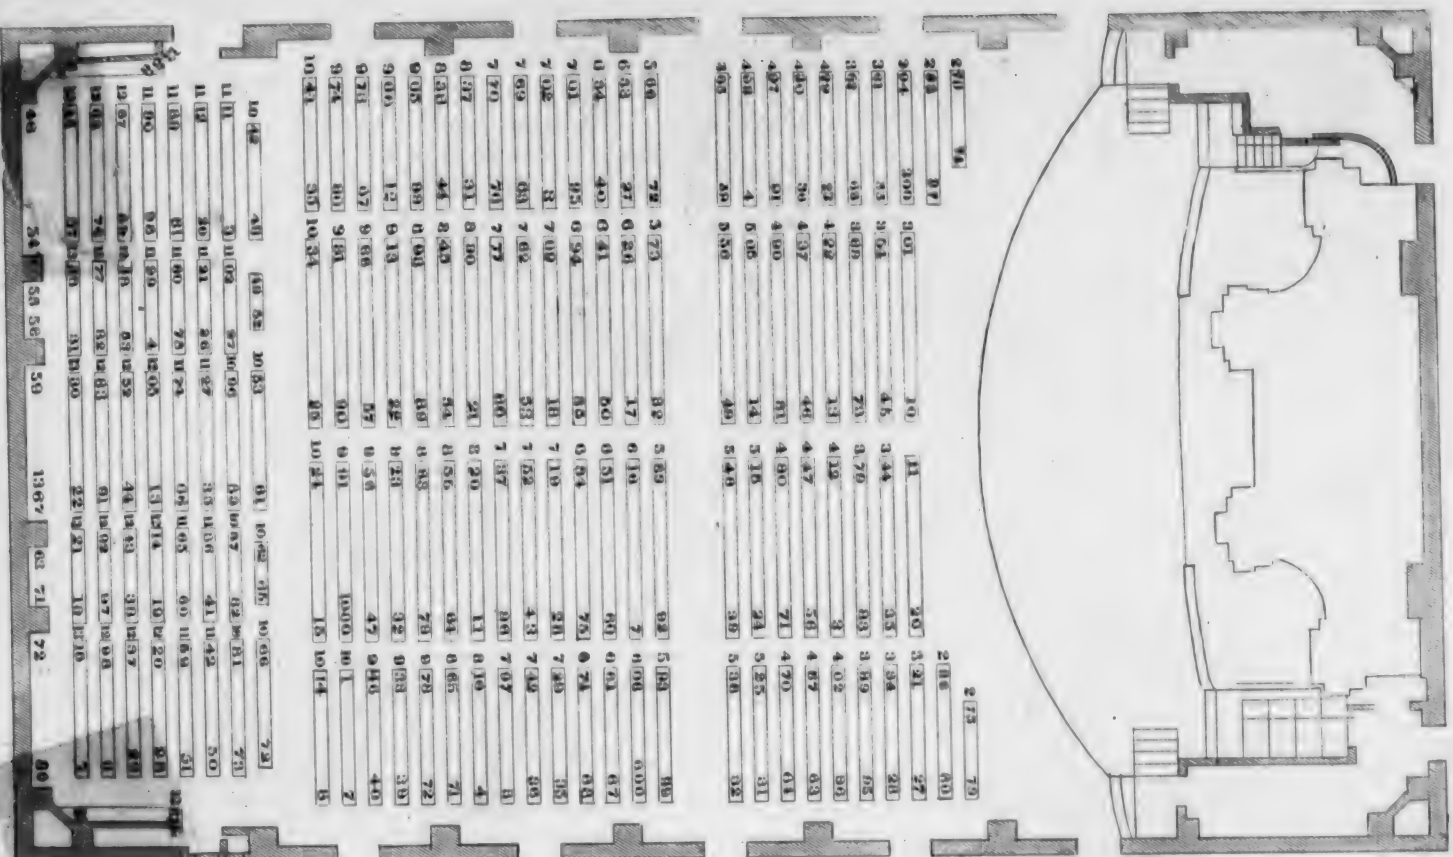

Mich 31. 1883

Also assisted by a full Chorus

Mich 31. 1883

Conductor

Mr George Henschel

Oct. 7	Oct. 14	Oct. 21	Oct. 28	Nov. 4	Nov. 11	Nov. 18	Nov. 25	Dec. 2	Dec. 9	Dec. 16	Dec. 23	Dec. 30	Jan. 6	Jan. 13	Jan. 20
1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. — THE — BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor. — SEASON 1882-'83. —
Mar. 31	Mar. 24	Mar. 17	Mar. 10	Mar. 3	Feb. 24	Feb. 17	Feb. 10	Feb. 3	Jan. 27	Jan. 20	Jan. 13	Jan. 6	Dec. 30	Dec. 23	Dec. 16
26	25	24	23	22	21	20	19	18	17	16	15	14	13	12	11

448 2d. BALCONY.

WHOM DOES IT BENEFIT?

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

I have been given to understand that Mr. H. L. Higginson's motive for his princely liberality in providing the best orchestral concerts given in the United States at a very low price, (losing, even with every ticket sold, from twelve to fifteen thousand dollars), is to place the best music within the means of the middling and lower classes. I am afraid his plan does not work well, judging from the audiences of last season. I saw but few whom I should believe to be poor, or even of moderate means. A large proportion of the audience were as 'swell' as those seen at the grand Italian Opera! "Full dress" was to be seen on every hand. I should be very glad to take my family to hear these educating and refining concerts, but I have not the means to go in full dress; neither can I afford to pay a speculator double the price for tickets that is asked by the manager. Is not Mr. Higginson's scheme a failure, practically?

BOOK-KEEPER.

Boston.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

I was the 44th man in the line at the sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts. When I arrived at the box office I found a very poor choice of seats left, the good ones having been nearly all marked off the diagram. Now allowing that every purchaser had taken the maximum number of tickets (six) there would have been only 258 taken. How is this?

Boston.

BACK BAY.

WITHHOLDING TICKETS.

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

It was announced previous to the opening of the sale of the Boston Symphony Concert tickets that no orders would be taken. Did not this imply that the man who was first in the line would find a clean diagram?

Boston.

ONE OF THE FIRST.

The Music Hall stockholders' tickets are first taken out; then the tickets for the press. We do not know whether any others were reserved. Mr. A. P. Peck told us a few days before the sale that he had returned money sent from Newport and other places for tickets, and that he had declined to fill any orders.

"TRY IT!"

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

The continuous requests of the advocates of the new system of notation remind me—a teacher of long experience—of the remedies recommended by many, who, after saying 'try it,' add 'If it does you no good it will do you no harm!' As if one wished or expected to go on trying every new-fangled notion. There is no cross-lot road to a good thorough musical education.

Philadelphia.

H.

TICKET SPECULATORS.

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

I do not understand why the tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts should be allowed to fall into the hands of speculators. Is it Mr. H. L. Higginson's desire to benefit that class of men?

CHARLES CLARKE.

Cambridge.

It cannot very well be helped if the sale is public. Mr. Higginson, it seems to us, should have limited the number of tickets to be sold to each buyer to four, which would have made the chances for those buying tickets for their own use a little better.

THE ABSURDITY OF COMPLAINTS.

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

It seems to me that the complaints against the management of the Boston Symphony Concerts sale of tickets are unjust and absurd. Here is Mr. Higginson who gives these concerts at a voluntary and enforced loss of $15,000 a year! Why should he not be allowed to reserve as many seats as he likes? If he chooses to reserve half of the house, and sell or even give away the rest of the tickets, whose business is it? The public should be grateful for the privileges extended, and not complain of one who has shown phenomenal public spirit.

Commonwealth Avenue. Boston.

A.

CONSIDERABLE dissatisfaction seems to prevail regarding the manner in which the season tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts were disposed of. There is sure to be more or less grumbling in such cases. There is no doubt whatever that the police service on this occasion was very defective. It is charged that persons were thrust into and out of the line at the option of muscular fellows, who should have been made to respect the principle of 'first come first served.' We understand that the person who was really the first on the spot was roughly driven away, after having waited for over thirty hours! It is stated to us by responsible parties that boys who had been sent to buy tickets were overpowered and their places taken by burly 'roughs,' hired by speculators. Of the method of selling tickets, of which several of our correspondents complain, we have no personal knowledge. We do not believe that Mr. Higginson would announce through an advertisement that no orders would be taken for tickets if he did not intend to place all the tickets (except the few always reserved for the directors and the press) for the public to select from, in regular order. It would be well for our managers to devise some method of selling tickets that shall be more satisfactory to the general public, and to see if the present abuses in the way of speculation in tickets cannot be corrected.

Oct. 7	Oct. 14	Oct. 21	Oct. 28	Nov. 4	Nov. 11	Nov. 18	Nov. 25	Dec. 2	Dec. 9	Dec. 16	Dec. 23	Jan. 30	Jan. 6	Jan. 13	Jan. 20
1	2	3		5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12	13	14	15	16
BOSTON MUSIC HALL. THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA. MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor. SEASON 1882-'83.
Mar. 31	Mar. 24	Mar. 7	Mar. 14	Mar. 21	Mar. 28	Apr. 4	Apr. 11	Apr. 18	Apr. 25	May 2	May 9	May 16	May 23	May 30	Jun. 6
26	25	24	23	22	21	20	19	18	17	16	15	14	13	12	11

448
2d. BALCONY.

WHOM DOES IT BENEFIT?

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

I have been given to understand that Mr. H. L. Higginson's motive for his princely liberality in providing the best orchestral concerts given in the United States at a very low price, (losing, even with every ticket sold, from twelve to fifteen thousand dollars), is to place the best music within the means of the middling and lower classes. I am afraid his plan does not work well, judging from the audiences of last season. I saw but few whom I should believe to be poor, or even of moderate means. A large proportion of the audience were as 'swell' as those seen at the grand Italian Opera! "Full dress" was to be seen on every hand. I should be very glad to take my family to hear these educating and refining concerts, but I have not the means to go in full dress; neither can I afford to pay a speculator double the price for tickets that is asked by the manager. Is not Mr. Higginson's scheme a failure, practically?

BOOK-KEEPER.

Boston.

WHAT DOES IT MEAN?

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

I was the 44th man in the line at the sale of tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts. When I arrived at the box office I found a very poor choice of seats left, the good ones having been nearly all marked off the diagram. Now allowing that every purchaser had taken the maximum number of tickets (six) there would have been only 258 taken. How is this?

Boston.

BACK BAY.

WITHHOLDING TICKETS.

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

It was announced previous to the opening of the sale of the Boston Symphony Concert tickets that no orders would be taken. Did not this imply that the man who was first in the line would find a clean diagram?

Boston.

ONE OF THE FIRST.

The Music Hall stockholders' tickets are first taken out; then the tickets for the press. We do not know whether any others were reserved. Mr. A. P. Peck told us a few days before the sale that he had returned money sent from Newport and other places for tickets, and that he had declined to fill any orders.

"TRY IT!"

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

The continuous requests of the advocates of the new system of notation remind me—a teacher of long experience—of the remedies recommended by many, who, after saying 'try it' add 'If it does you no good it will do you no harm!' As if one wished or expected to go on trying every new-fangled notion. There is no cross-lot road to a good thorough musical education.

Philadelphia.

TICKET SPECULATORS.

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

I do not understand why the tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts should be allowed to fall into the hands of speculators. Is it Mr. H. L. Higginson's desire to benefit that class of men?

CHARLES CLARKE.

Cambridge.

It cannot very well be helped if the sale is public. Mr. Higginson, it seems to us, should have limited the number of tickets to be sold to each buyer to four, which would have made the chances for those buying tickets for their own use a little better.

THE ABSURDITY OF COMPLAINTS.

To the Editor of the Musical Record:

It seems to me that the complaints against the management of the Boston Symphony Concerts sale of tickets are unjust and absurd. Here is Mr. Higginson who gives these concerts at a voluntary and enforced loss of $15,000 a year! Why should he not be allowed to reserve as many seats as he likes? If he chooses to reserve half of the house, and sell or even give away the rest of the tickets, whose business is it? The public should be grateful for the privileges extended, and not complain of one who has shown phenomenal public spirit.

Commonwealth Avenue. Boston.

A.

CONSIDERABLE dissatisfaction seems to prevail regarding the manner in which the season tickets for the Boston Symphony Concerts were disposed of. There is sure to be more or less grumbling in such cases. There is no doubt whatever that the police service on this occasion was very defective. It is charged that persons were thrust into and out of the line at the option of muscular fellows, who should have been made to respect the principle of 'first come first served.' We understand that the person who was really the first on the spot was roughly driven away, after having waited for over thirty hours! It is stated to us by responsible parties that boys who had been sent to buy tickets were overpowered and their places taken by burly 'roughs,' hired by speculators. Of the method of selling tickets, of which several of our correspondents complain, we have no personal knowledge. We do not believe that Mr. Higginson would announce through an advertisement that no orders would be taken for tickets if he did not intend to place all the tickets (except the few always reserved for the directors and the press) for the public to select from, in regular order. It would be well for our managers to devise some method of selling tickets that shall be more satisfactory to the general public, and to see if the present abuses in the way of speculation in tickets cannot be corrected.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The arrangements for the second annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra are rapidly being completed, and promise quite as happy results as those attending the programmes of last season. The membership of the orchestra is practically complete, some two or three engagements only being yet undecided, and the musicians with whom contracts have been signed will give Mr. Georg Henschel as able a body of players as has ever been led by a conductor in this city. The concerts will be given on the 26 successive Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 7, and the sale of tickets for the entire season will open on Monday morning, Sept. 4, at Music Hall. The general character of the programmes for the winter has not as yet been fully determined upon, but it will include many works new to this country by modern composers. One of the most interesting announcements decided upon is that Mr. Henschel's pianoforte concerto will be included in the scheme of programmes, its completion and orchestration having occupied some of the composer's leisure during the last few months. Its presentation will be doubly interesting from the fact that Mr. Carl Baermann has been engaged for the performance of the pianoforte score. There will probably be no advance made in the scale of prices, but the tickets will be placed at an added cost over those of last season, on account of the increased number of concerts, the series of 26 giving $6.50 and $13 as the probable prices, in place of the $5 and $10 rates for last season's 20 concerts. A single public rehearsal of each programme will be given, as during last season, but two prices will be fixed for these tickets, it having been deemed desirable to reserve a certain portion of the seats at a slight advance over last year's 25-cent charge. The advantages of such a series of concerts upon the musical taste and culture of a city will be readily admitted, and they were fully shown last season in the steadily increased popularity of the opening series. This year a number of the New England cities will share with Boston in these advantages, as the 26 concerts of the series here will be repeated in the centres of population in this and adjoining states. The plans for these concerts have not, as yet, been completed, but the same general idea as followed in the Boston series will probably be carried out. August 20-22 Herald

It is suggested that, if Mr. Higginson desires to accomplish his avowed purpose of affording the people of this vicinity an opportunity to become familiar with and appreciate orchestral music, he can best do so by securing the Charitable Mechanics Hall on Huntington avenue for his concerts. A raised platform in the centre of the main floor, it is suggested, would afford a magnificent opportunity for an immense orchestra, and the concerts might be conducted at a profit, even at the lowest price now charged for the symphony concerts. The use of a rubber floor cloth would allow promenading without annoyance, and the spacious gallery would give comfortable sittings to an audience of many thousands, all within hearing distance. Herald

The public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts promise to be quite as popular as last season, and the plan of selling reserved seats in a portion of the house has found very general favor with patrons.

Musical circles are busy just now with surmises about the approaching series of Boston symphony concerts, which are "backed," as was the case last season, by the money of wealthy banker Higginson, and are to be conducted by Mr. Georg Henschel, of whose abilities as a leader so many divergent opinions have been expressed. It would be ungracious not to recognize the value of Mr. Higginson's enterprise. That it will prove a source of some profit as well as pleasure the projector doubtless hopes and expects. If others will follow in the line which Higginson and Henschel have marked out, and give what Boston needs, genuine competition in orchestral concerts, great advantage will be gained. We have not the slightest doubt of the pecuniary as well as artistic success of an orchestral course managed by Boston men who are familiar with the public taste, and enlisting from conductor down to drum player the services of tried and efficient Boston musicians.

The sale of subscription tickets for the Boston symphony concerts opens at 9 o'clock tomorrow morning at the box office in Music Hall. No orders in advance have been considered by Mr. Peck, and a free field and no favor is assured the public. As there are to be twenty-six concerts the present season, the price of subscription tickets will be somewhat greater than last year, but the rate per entertainment will be the same. Intending purchasers should bear in mind that under the new seating arrangement the old Music Hall diagram cannot be utilized, as the numbering has been entirely changed. Mr. Henschel and his orchestra make their first appearance of the season at the public rehearsal on Friday evening, October 6, the regular concert occurring the evening following. The course continues weekly until March 31, and some superb programmes may be looked for.

...A frenzied correspondent writes us to suggest that the Higginson symphony concerts have two public rehearsals each, and be given on Friday as well as Saturday evenings; in this way no family need be without a ticket. Goodness gracious! how the symphony has become the very breath of our nostrils! And this after symphonies have been played for years to a few handfuls of æsthetic Boston ladies of either sex in the self-same hall, and with about the same performers!

...The word of promise that the tickets to the Boston symphony concerts for the coming season would be no higher than last year has been kept to the hope though broken to the eye. The prices are higher, to be sure, but the rates are exactly the same.

...There is talk at Music Hall of putting a stop to the formation of queues the night before a ticket sale. The alleyway is private property and campers can be arrested as trespassers.

...On the new plan of seats in Music Hall, the first seat on the floor is numbered 270. If this does not mean that the organ is to be removed so that the front line of the stage may be set back to make room for 269 seats, its purpose is, to say the least, obscure.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The arrangements for the second annual series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra are rapidly being completed, and promise quite as happy results as those attending the programmes of last season. The membership of the orchestra is practically complete, some two or three engagements only being yet undecided, and the musicians with whom contracts have been signed will give Mr. Georg Henschel as able a body of players as has ever been led by a conductor in this city. The concerts will be given on the 26 successive Saturday evenings, beginning Oct. 7, and the sale of tickets for the entire season will open on Monday morning, Sept. 4, at Music Hall. The general character of the programmes for the winter has not as yet been fully determined upon, but it will include many works new to this country by modern composers. One of the most interesting announcements decided upon is that Mr. Henschel's pianoforte concerto will be included in the scheme of programmes, its completion and orchestration having occupied some of the composer's leisure during the last few months. Its presentation will be doubly interesting from the fact that Mr. Carl Baermann has been engaged for the performance of the pianoforte score. There will probably be no advance made in the scale of prices, but the tickets will be placed at an added cost over those of last season, on account of the increased number of concerts, the series of 26 giving $6.50 and $13 as the probable prices, in place of the $5 and $10 rates for last season's 20 concerts. A single public rehearsal of each programme will be given, as during last season, but two prices will be fixed for these tickets, it having been deemed desirable to reserve a certain portion of the seats at a slight advance over last year's 25-cent charge. The advantages of such a series of concerts upon the musical taste and culture of a city will be readily admitted, and they were fully shown last season in the steadily increased popularity of the opening series. This year a number of the New England cities will share with Boston in these advantages, as the 26 concerts of the series here will be repeated in the centres of population in this and adjoining states. The plans for these concerts have not, as yet, been completed, but the same general idea as followed in the Boston series will probably be carried out. Aug 20. 92 Herald

It is suggested that, if Mr. Higginson desires to accomplish his avowed purpose of affording the people of this vicinity an opportunity to become familiar with and appreciate orchestral music, he can best do so by securing the Charitable Mechanics Hall on Huntington avenue for his concerts. A raised platform in the centre of the main floor, it is suggested, would afford a magnificent opportunity for an immense orchestra, and the concerts might be conducted at a profit, even at the lowest price now charged for the symphony concerts. The use of a rubber floor cloth would allow promenading without annoyance, and the spacious gallery would give comfortable sittings to an audience of many thousands, all within hearing distance. Herald

The public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts promise to be quite as popular as last season, and the plan of selling reserved seats in a portion of the house has found very general favor with patrons.

Sept 3. 92
Musical circles are busy just now with surmises about the approaching series of Boston symphony concerts, which are "backed," as was the case last season, by the money of wealthy banker Higginson, and are to be conducted by Mr. Georg Henschel, of whose abilities as a leader so many divergent opinions have been expressed. It would be ungracious not to recognize the value of Mr. Higginson's enterprise. That it will prove a source of some profit as well as pleasure the projector doubtless hopes and expects. If others will follow in the line which Higginson and Henschel have marked out, and give what Boston needs, genuine competition in orchestral concerts, great advantage will be gained. We have not the slightest doubt of the pecuniary as well as artistic success of an orchestral course managed by Boston men who are familiar with the public taste, and enlisting from conductor down to drum player the services of tried and efficient Boston musicians.

The sale of subscription tickets for the Boston symphony concerts opens at 9 o'clock tomorrow morning at the box office in Music Hall. No orders in advance have been considered by Mr. Peck, and a free field and no favor is assured the public. As there are to be twenty-six concerts the present season, the price of subscription tickets will be somewhat greater than last year, but the rate per entertainment will be the same. Intending purchasers should bear in mind that under the new seating arrangement the old Music Hall diagram cannot be utilized, as the numbering has been entirely changed. Mr. Henschel and his orchestra make their first appearance of the season at the public rehearsal on Friday evening, October 6, the regular concert occurring the evening following. The course continues weekly until March 31, and some superb programmes may be looked for.

...A frenzied correspondent writes us to suggest that the Higginson symphony concerts have two public rehearsals each, and be given on Friday as well as Saturday evenings; in this way no family need be without a ticket. Goodness gracious! how the symphony has become the very breath of our nostrils! And this after symphonies have been played for years to a few handfuls of æsthetic Boston ladies of either sex in the self-same hall, and with about the same performers!

...The word of promise that the tickets to the Boston symphony concerts for the coming season would be no higher than last year has been kept to the hope though broken to the eye. The prices are higher, to be sure, but the rates are exactly the same.

...There is talk at Music Hall of putting a stop to the formation of queues the night before a ticket sale. The alleyway is private property and campers can be arrested as trespassers.

...On the new plan of seats in Music Hall, the first seat on the floor is numbered 270. If this does not mean that the organ is to be removed so that the front line of the stage may be set back to make room for 260 seats, its purpose is, to say the least, obscure.

THE REIGNING ART. *Slide*The Boston Philharmonic Orchestral Enterprise.Gilmore's Band Tonight in Concert at the Boston.Operatic Notes and Prospects—Preludes and Echoes.

The announcement of the forthcoming series of concerts by the Boston Philharmonic orchestra, with that accomplished musician, Carl Zerrahn, as leader, gives welcome evidence that no scheme to establish a monopoly in musical matters in Boston is to be foisted on the public without encountering decided and vigorous opposition. It is in no spirit of antagonism to the good element in Banker Higginson's enterprise that these Philharmonic concerts have been favored—of this the character of the gentlemen who are most interested in the work carries abundant assurance. But there is a feeling among many of the friends of the harmonic art in Boston that Mr. Higginson's plan is not one that is likely to result in any permanent advantage to the musical interests of the city, though as to the financial outcome of a course at popular prices like that of the Boston Symphony series there is a diversity of opinion. Waiving the consideration of the subject from the "box office point of view"—though one may be sure that Mr. Higginson doesn't ignore that—not a few people think his system will ultimately injure instead of help the cause of music here, if it is suffered to continue without a fair test in competition. To illustrate, the engagement of a director for such a series of entertainments as that which is included in the Boston Symphony course ought not, these gentlemen maintain, to depend on the prejudice or whim of any one man. If that individual is presented in the light of a great public benefactor, whose sole purpose in life is the musical education of Boston, regardless of the outlay of money which may be required. It is one thing for a manager to frankly avow his interest in an enterprise which he hopes will put money in his purse, and quite another thing to pose as the munificent donor of a boon which a grateful public should receive and recognize as a precious gift of the Hub's wealth and culture. While Mr. Georg Henschel's good qualities as a singer are cordially recognized on all hands, it is the opinion of a great many people that the experiment which elevated a successful vocalist to the munificently salaried chair of direction at the Boston symphony concerts was unnecessary and even foolish, judged from the musical standpoint. The result of last year's season has made it evident, these gentlemen think, even to Mr. Higginson himself, that something more than a high salary and a good social position is required to transform a singer into a successful orchestral leader. Mr. Henschel has made a record as a director which, under the circumstances, was very creditable; but it did not justify that gentleman, on the one hand, in imagining himself to have "re-created Boston" in the art of orchestral music was concerned, nor on the other hand did it warrant Mr. Higginson in the assumption that his instruction had been wiser than the judgment of many men more devoted to the cause of music. The impression that Mr. Higginson has regarded those critics who did not endorse all of the Henschelian methods as engaged in a cabal can hardly be well founded. With all his brusqueness towards the critics and all his professions of disregard for whatever the newspapers might say about his enterprise, Mr. Higginson has too much of what is called "horse sense" by the rural brethren to long give credence to such an absurd suggestion. Indeed, a person of his practical turn of mind must have come to the conclusion before then, and have acknowledged it to himself, if not to others, that a critic who sings praises to Henschel on all occasions is more likely to be "biased" in his way than the writers who with kindest personal feelings toward the successful singer do not hesitate to note the facts that, like other men, he makes mistakes, and that his career as an orchestral director has not proved uniformly successful. And so, even if in years past Mr. Higginson has defended Mr. Henschel as a model director, and looked upon any adverse criticism of his methods as the outcome of personal hostility, the projector of the Boston symphony concerts must long ere this have risen above these things and looked at the concert question in a broader way. But, whatever may be the outcome of the present symphony season, the championship of orchestral music in a city like Boston ought not to be left to any one man, however long his purse, or however zealous he may be in the hope of gaining renown as the patron for excellence of harmony in the modern Athens. Mr. Higginson, in his wisdom, may conclude to engage Director Henschel for yet another season. He may also make up his mind to choose another leader—some man of higher reputation as a director—in his stead. And it is by no means beyond the bounds of possibility that this may be the last of the series of Higginson's orchestral concerts in Boston. The musical public of this city is, as a matter of course, interested in the plans of Mr. Higginson, so far as they relate to music, and it will recognize, without doubt, at the full value the attraction which his enterprise may present. But while it is "the thing" to go to the Henschel concerts, let not the friends of music forget that the life of true musical enterprise, like that of trade, largely depends on competition. Recognition of Mr. Henschel's earnestness as a leader is not incompatible with a realization of the fact that two grand orchestral courses will do more to develop a healthy musical taste in any community than any would-be monopoly, however well meant. And in the case of these Boston Philharmonic concerts the sentiment of local pride, we think, may well be involved. This orchestra will be made up for the greater part of true and tried Bostonian musicians, and it will be heard under the baton of a director who has devoted the best years of his life to the cause of music in this city, and who never was more capable or more skilled in his art than today. An unpleasant feeling has extended among the musicians of the city that the management and the direction of the Higginson concerts has looked with little favor on their work, and has entertained but a poor idea of their general ability as players. The recent importations of talent from the other country have not tended to diminish this feeling, though in justice to the Boston Symphony direction it should be noted that the great proportion of the orchestra is still made up of home musicians. The forthcoming Boston Philharmonic concert series is peculiarly a Boston enterprise, and as such should not lack the earnest support of the public. It is sincerely to be hoped that the course of orchestral concerts under Mr. Zerrahn's direction may receive from the outset the full degree of favor which is justly its meed.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Time was in Boston when it was doubtful at the beginning of a winter whether lovers of the higher forms of orchestral music would get more than the very meagrest chance of indulging their taste during the ensuing season. Orchestral concerts were few and far between; for every symphony concert there were two or three "star" concerts, composed of the most heterogeneous elements. How different are the musical conditions in our city at present! The steady, persevering work of the Harvard Musical Association; the little, spasmodic fillips given to musical taste by the flying visits of the Thomas Orchestra; later on, the concerts of the Boston Philharmonic Society; and last, but not least, the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have all contributed to bring about this altered state of things. The good done by these various organizations has been quite sufficiently recognized, but it seems to us that few persons have as yet been careful to study the concert movement in Boston during the last ten or fifteen years in all its bearings upon the public, to discover in exactly what ways it has worked for good. An intelligent study of this sort, an analysis of the relations between concerts and public, would be of no small value, for it would be rich in suggestions for the future guidance of those in whose hands the musical destinies of our city lie. Let us try to throw some light upon certain points in our musical history during the last decade or so, which, so far as we know, have escaped critical notice.

One of these points is the great good done by the so-called Lecture-Bureau Concerts. To understand just how these concerts have worked for the general good, we must look back a little. The symphony concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, springing up suddenly amid that almost total dearth of good music (or, indeed, of music of any sort), which followed the closing years of the war, fairly monopolized the musical public for a time. So great was their material success that the association laid up enough money during the first few seasons to enable it to continue the concerts for many years after their general popularity had become a thing of the past. For, although the association has steadily lost money on its concerts, year by year, for the last several seasons, it is tolerably well known that, taking all its seasons together, it has not lost a cent. We mention this merely to show how extraordinarily successful the Harvard Musical Association symphony concerts were during their first few years; they were the concerts. They monopolized the whole music-loving public to such an extent that the old travelling "star" concert troupes had virtually to throw up the sponge in despair; managers knowing full well that a miscellaneous concert had a very slim chance of drawing a paying audience unless it had some such brilliant soloist as Pappas, Nilsson or Mrs. Moulton to serve as a figurehead. How artistically exclusive the policy of the Harvard Musical Association was, will be remembered by all. We, for one, are fully persuaded that this policy was the only wise one for the times. The musical needs of the times were urgent; in the hour of threatened shipwreck we take only that which is most valuable and precious with us into the lifeboat. The exclusive musical policy of the symphony concerts was admirable. But soon an inevitable anomaly began to make itself felt in a more and more painful way. Here were concerts of the very highest sort, attended by practically the whole music-loving public of Boston. Now, the whole musical public of any city, be it of Boston or New York, of Paris, London or Berlin, is a very motley crowd, made up of individuals of every conceivable shade of musical taste, culture and habit. In this huge mass of people the percentage of persons who, we will not say fully appreciate, but really enjoy orchestral music of the very highest class more than they do that of a lighter order, is necessarily small. There will even be a considerable percentage of persons to whom the highest order of orchestral music is by but one degree better than no music at all. Now, the unavoidably heterogeneous audiences of the symphony concerts very soon began to grumble at the musical fare set before them, and it was not long before many discontented listeners began to stay away altogether, preferring starving on no music at all, to burdening their stomachs with, to them, indigestible food. When the first flurry of fashion had subsided, the Harvard musical audiences began to be winnowed, and only persons of real musical staying power remained. This was not only natural, but, artistically speaking, desirable; there is in every community a vast number of very sincere music lovers who have really no business at a symphony concert. Now, the lecture-bureau concerts stepped in to fill a sensible gap in the musical conditions of our city; they attracted and satisfied a large class of music lovers who were doing themselves no good at the Harvard concerts, and were doing the concerts actual harm by introducing an element of discontent, of which the concert givers were, from their very position, powerless to take cognizance. Since the beginning of the Harvard symphony concerts, the lecture-bureau concerts were the first important step taken toward classifying and reducing to order that

26
15, 1882...Triple Sheet

THE REIGNING ART. Globe

The Boston Philharmonic Or- chestral Enterprise.

Gilmore's Band Tonight in Con- cert at the Boston.

Operatic Notes and Prospects—Prel- udes and Echoes.

The announcement of the forthcoming series of concerts by the Boston Philharmonic orchestra, with that accomplished musician, Carl Zerrahn, as leader, gives welcome evidence that no scheme to establish a monopoly in musical matters in Boston is to be foisted on the public without encountering decided and vigorous opposition. It is in no spirit of antagonism to the good element in Banker Higginson's enterprise that these Philharmonic concerts have been favored—of this the character of the gentlemen who are most interested in the work carries abundant assurance. But there is a feeling among many of the friends of the harmonic art in Boston that Mr. Higginson's plan is not one that is likely to result in any permanent advantage to the musical interests of the city, though as to the financial outcome of a course at popular prices like that of the Boston Symphony series there is a diversity of opinion. Waiving the consideration of the subject from the "box office point of view"—though one may be sure that Mr. Higginson doesn't ignore that—not a few people think his system will ultimately injure instead of help the cause of music here, if it is suffered to continue without a fair test in competition. To illustrate, the engagement of a director for such a series of entertainments as that which is included in the Boston Symphony course ought not, these gentlemen maintain, to depend on the prejudice or whim of any one man, if that individual is presented in the light of a great public benefactor, whose sole purpose in life is the musical education of Boston, regardless of the outlay of money which may be required. It is one thing for a manager to frankly avow his interest in an enterprise which he hopes will put money in his purse, and quite another thing to pose as the munificent donor of a boon which a grateful public should receive and recognize as a precious gift of the Hub's wealth and culture. While Mr. Georg Henschel's good qualities as a singer are cordially recognized on all hands, it is the opinion of a great many people that the experiment which elevated a successful vocalist to the munificently salaried chair of direction at the Boston symphony concerts was unnecessary and even foolish, judged from the musical standpoint. The result of last year's season has made it evident, these gentlemen think, even to Mr. Higginson himself, that something more than a high salary and a good social position is required to transform a singer into a successful orchestral leader. Mr. Henschel has made a record as a director which, under the circumstances, was very creditable; but it did not justify that gentleman, on the one hand, in imagining himself to have "re-created Boston" so far as orchestral music was concerned, nor on the other hand did it warrant Mr. Higginson in the assumption that his instruction had been wiser than the judgment of many men more devoted to the cause of music. The impression that Mr. Higginson has regarded those critics who did not endorse all of the Henschelian methods as engaged in a cabal can hardly be well founded. With all his brusqueness towards the critics and all his professions of disregard for whatever the newspapers might say about his enterprise, Mr. Higginson has too much of what is called "horse sense" by the rural brethren to long give credence to such an absurd suggestion. Indeed, a person of his practical turn of mind must have come to the conclusion before then, and have acknowledged it to himself, if not to others, that a critic who sings praises to Henschel on all occasions is more likely to be "biased" in his way than the writers who with kindest personal feelings toward the successful singer do not hesitate to note the facts that, like other men, he makes mistakes, and that his career as an orchestral director has not proved uniformly successful. And so, even if in years past Mr. Higginson has defended Mr. Henschel as a model director, and looked upon any adverse criticism of his methods as the outcome of personal hostility, the projector of the Boston symphony concerts must long ere this have risen above these things and looked at the concert question in a broader way. But, whatever may be the outcome of the present symphony season, the championship of orchestral music in a city like Boston ought not to be left to any one man, however long his purse, or however zealous he may be in the hope of gaining renown as the patron for excellence of harmony in the modern Athens. Mr. Higginson, in his wisdom, may conclude to engage Director Henschel for yet another season. He may also make up his mind to choose another leader—some man of higher reputation as a director—in his stead. And it is by no means beyond the bounds of possibility that this may be the last of the series of Higginson's orchestral concerts in Boston. The musical public of this city is, as a matter of course, interested in the plans of Mr. Higginson, so far as they relate to music, and it will recognize, without doubt, at the full value the attraction which his enterprise may present. But while it is "the thing" to go to the Henschel concerts, let not the friends of music forget that the life of true musical enterprise, like that of trade, largely depends on competition. Recognition of Mr. Henschel's earnestness as a leader is not incompatible with a realization of the fact that two grand orchestral courses will do more to develop a healthy musical taste in any community than any would-be monopoly, however well meant. And in the case of these Boston Philharmonic concerts the sentiment of local pride, we think, may well be involved. This orchestra will be made up for the greater part of true and tried Bostonian musicians, and it will be heard under the baton of a director who has devoted the best years of his life to the cause of music in this city, and who never was more capable or more skilled in his art than today. An unpleasant feeling has extended among the musicians of the city that the management and the direction of the Higginson concerts has looked with little favor on their work, and has entertained but a poor idea of their general ability as players. The recent importations of talent from the other country have not tended to diminish this feeling, though in justice to the Boston Symphony direction it should be noted that the great proportion of the orchestra is still made up of home musicians. The forthcoming Boston Philharmonic concert series is peculiarly a Boston enterprise, and as such should not lack the earnest support of the public. It is sincerely to be hoped that the course of orchestral concerts under Mr. Zerrahn's direction may receive from the outset the full degree of favor which is justly its meed.

ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

Time was in Boston when it was doubtful at the beginning of a winter whether lovers of the higher forms of orchestral music would get more than the very meagrest chance of indulging their taste during the ensuing season. Orchestral concerts were few and far between; for every symphony concert there were two or three "star" concerts, composed of the most heterogeneous elements. How different are the musical conditions in our city at present! The steady, persevering work of the Harvard Musical Association; the little, spasmodic fillips given to musical taste by the flying visits of the Thomas Orchestra; later on, the concerts of the Boston Philharmonic Society; and last, but not least, the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, have all contributed to bring about this altered state of things. The good done by these various organizations has been quite sufficiently recognized, but it seems to us that few persons have as yet been careful to study the concert movement in Boston during the last ten or fifteen years in all its bearings upon the public, to discover in exactly what ways it has worked for good. An intelligent study of this sort, an analysis of the relations between concerts and public, would be of no small value, for it would be rich in suggestions for the future guidance of those in whose hands the musical destinies of our city lie. Let us try to throw some light upon certain points in our musical history during the last decade or so, which, so far as we know, have escaped critical notice.

One of these points is the great good done by the so-called Lecture-Bureau Concerts. To understand just how these concerts have worked for the general good, we must look back a little. The symphony concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, springing up suddenly amid that almost total dearth of good music (or, indeed, of music of any sort), which followed the closing years of the war, fairly monopolized the musical public for a time. So great was their material success that the association laid up enough money during the first few seasons to enable it to continue the concerts for many years after their general popularity had become a thing of the past. For, although the association has steadily lost money on its concerts, year by year, for the last several seasons, it is tolerably well known that, taking all its seasons together, it has not lost a cent. We mention this merely to show how extraordinarily successful the Harvard Musical Association symphony concerts were during their first few years; they were the concerts. They monopolized the whole music-loving public to such an extent that the old travelling "star" concert troupes had virtually to throw up the sponge in despair, managers knowing full well that a miscellaneous concert had a very slim chance of drawing a paying audience unless it had some such brilliant soloist as Pappas, Nilsson or Mrs. Moulton to serve as a figurehead. How artistically exclusive the policy of the Harvard Musical Association was, will be remembered by all. We, for one, are fully persuaded that this policy was the only wise one for the times. The musical needs of the times were urgent; in the hour of threatened shipwreck we take only that which is most valuable and precious with us into the lifeboat. The exclusive musical policy of the symphony concerts was admirable. But soon an inevitable anomaly began to make itself felt in a more and more painful way. Here were concerts of the very highest sort, attended by practically the whole music-loving public of Boston. Now, the whole musical public of any city, be it of Boston or New York, of Paris, London or Berlin, is a very motley crowd, made up of individuals of every conceivable shade of musical taste, culture and habit. In this huge mass of people the percentage of persons who, we will not say fully appreciate, but really enjoy orchestral music of the very highest class more than they do that of a lighter order, is necessarily small. There will even be a considerable percentage of persons to whom the highest order of orchestral music is by but one degree better than no music at all. Now, the unavoidably heterogeneous audiences of the symphony concerts very soon began to grumble at the musical fare set before them, and it was not long before many discontented listeners began to stay away altogether, preferring starving on no music at all, to burdening their stomachs with, to them, indigestible food. When the first flurry of fashion had subsided, the Harvard musical audiences began to be winnowed, and only persons of real musical staying power remained. This was not only natural, but, artistically speaking, desirable; there is in every community a vast number of very sincere music lovers who have really no business at a symphony concert. Now, the lecture-bureau concerts stepped in to fill a sensible gap in the musical conditions of our city; they attracted and satisfied a large class of music lovers who were doing themselves no good at the Harvard concerts, and were doing the concerts actual harm by introducing an element of discontent, of which the concert givers were, from their very position, powerless to take cognizance. Since the beginning of the Harvard symphony concerts, the lecture-bureau concerts were the first important step taken toward classifying and reducing to order that heterogeneous and chaotic mass of individuals known as the general musical public of Boston. Another admirable step in a similar direction was the setting apart of the Philharmonic concerts under Mr. Listemann, and afterwards under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society. These concerts (whether intentionally or not matters little now) had for their first result the satisfying of that portion of the music-loving public who, enjoying the highest order of orchestral music, were tired of remaining in the time-honored classic field of Bach, Beethoven, Haydn, Mozart, Mendelssohn and Schumann, and were anxious to familiarize themselves with contemporary composers. The Philharmonic Society served still further to "classify" our public.

24

The Harvard Musical Association and the Philharmonic Society (the former noted for its predominantly classical, the latter for its "modern" tendencies, albeit that the line of demarcation between the two could by no means be sharply drawn) might have gone on occupying the whole field of higher orchestral music between them, had not Mr. Higginson stepped in as deus ex machina, and founded the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, with Mr. Henschel as musical director. Mr. Henschel, with his large number of concerts during a season, had plenty of room to combine in a single course the distinctive aims of both the other orchestral organizations, and cover the whole field himself, in so far as the making up of programmes was concerned. The popular success of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and by this we mean its power of drawing large audiences, is at present fully comparable to that of the Harvard Musical Association at the beginning of its concert-giving career. Whether the two other societies continue giving concerts or not, the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra are, of themselves, fully competent to cover the whole field of orchestral music of the higher sort, in so far as the selection of programmes is concerned, and this is the only matter with which we have to do in the present article. Let us, for the sake of argument, assume that the Boston Orchestra really does cover this field, and drop the two other societies from the discussion, not that we wish to regard them as either moribund or dead (for this is far from the case), but simply to save ourselves the trouble of writing three names where one will do as well. Let us see in how far the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the lecture-bureau concerts cover the whole musical field in our city. If we leave the Handel and Haydn Society, the Cecilia, the Boylston and the Apollo clubs, and the Euterpe out of the question at present, it is for a reason that will soon become apparent.

To our mind there is a serious gap in the musical conditions in Boston, which has existed ever since the cessation of the old Orchestral Union concerts. This is a gap which none of the choral societies we have mentioned, nor the Euterpe, can possibly fill, and which none of our orchestral organizations (since the days of the Orchestral Union, with its Wednesday-afternoon concerts) nor the lecture-bureau concerts have as yet thought of trying to fill. We have in Boston nothing to serve as a connecting link (so to speak) between the utterly divergent musical aims of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the lecture-bureau concerts. The former appeals solely to the highest and most cultivated musical intelligence, the latter appeal almost as solely to the lowest and least cultured. But there is no course of concerts which appeal directly to what we will call the mean musical intelligence, to the average musical taste of our community; no concerts which can thoroughly satisfy that unavoidably large class of music-lovers who are above enjoying the general run of miscellaneous concerts, but who feel in their heart of heart that the standard symphony concert is a pretty severe dose. Here is the gap, and if it is not generally felt now, we mistake very much if it will not be felt soon.

The audiences at the symphony concerts given last winter by the Boston Symphony Orchestra were abnormally large, just as the audiences during the first few years of the Harvard concerts were. Let no patriotically inclined optimist flatter himself that these large audiences were chiefly made up of ardent music worshippers who hitherto had been unable to afford to go to symphony concerts at dollar tickets, and who now eagerly grasped the chance of enjoying a long-coveted pleasure at twenty-five cents a head. No doubt there were some few poor persons to whom these cheap concerts came as a long-wished-for boon, but their number was inconsiderable. Unless we assert that the Boston public is by far the most musical public in the world, we must admit that these audiences were large beyond all musical reason. Audiences of this size are unknown at a first-class symphony concert in Germany; the Royal Orchestra in Berlin plays to audiences of about seven hundred, and is, in this respect, no exception to the general rule. When Ferdinand David was asked why the Gewandhaus orchestra did not get a larger hall, he answered, "Because our present small hall can hold all the audience we can collect to listen to such concerts as we wish to give." And this was in Leipzig, the very centre and stronghold of musical classicism in Germany!

It is in the nature of things that, among the huge audiences that filled the Music Hall last winter, there must have been a large percentage of persons to whom a standard symphony programme is exceedingly hard of digestion. It is equally in the nature of things that, after the first flurry of fashion has subsided, those persons will begin to grumble and then to stay away. This will be not only natural, but perfectly rational, logical and normal; such persons have no business at a symphony concert; it does them no good, for the programmes are beyond their powers of digestion, and it is only what a man digests that nourishes him. We are morally sure that, when the audiences at the symphony concerts have dwindled down to their normal proportions, as they ought to dwindle down by rights, it will be found that the concerts are given in far too large a hall, and at a ridiculously low price.

We are fully persuaded that cheap and frequent orchestral concerts can be one of the greatest conceivable godsend to our city.

But we are equally firm in our belief that symphony concerts of the highest order should be neither cheap nor very frequent. The cheap orchestral concerts of which our city stands in need are what may properly be termed popular concerts; the programmes to appeal to the "mean musical intelligence" of the general public, and to consist chiefly of such music as requires a thoroughly good and complete orchestra for its satisfactory performance, but which, from its character, would be anomalous and disturbing on the programme of a standard symphony concert; Auber, Hérold, Nicolai overtures, popular fragments of symphonies, Strauss waltzes, good ballet music, ear-tickling orchestral transcriptions, operatic selections, even pot-pourris. Concerts of this sort are given, and largely attended, all over Germany; they are cheap, within the means of all, and are thoroughly enjoyed by those who regularly attend them. Could we have them—and many of them—in Boston, they would complete the work of "classifying" our public. Between the symphony concerts, the various chamber concerts, the performances of our several choral societies and the lecture-bureau concerts, the whole musical field would be well covered; there would not be a music lover in the city who had not concerts provided for him, exactly suited to his musical needs and intelligence. We should have no more heterogeneous audiences, no more people going to this concert or that simply because they have no other to go to; concert goers would feel sure of their audiences, sure that they were addressing (so to speak) their own people; the music given would be not only listened to, but digested, and nobody would be bored.

27
And remember, finally, that it is only by such a division of the whole field of music between different organizations or societies that this wholesome end can be accomplished. There is nothing more fatal to art, more inartistic and deplorable, than a concert which has no distinct musical aim, the programme of which is divided against itself, and which attempts to appeal to too many musical tastes at once. We should be the very first to cry out, and lustily, too, against the first symptom manifested by our standard symphony concerts of catering to any but the highest, profoundest and most cultivated musical intelligence. Nay, if these concerts were to adopt the old plan of the Royal Orchestra at Berlin, of giving two symphonies and two overtures, without intervening solos, we should be immeasurably delighted. The only fault we have to find with our symphony concerts is that there are too many of them, considering the total dearth of good "popular" orchestral concerts. Until Boston has a series of cheap, popular orchestral concerts of good, light music every winter, our musical conditions will continue to be lamentably incomplete, and we shall still be open to the charge of musical provincialism, and what is worse, of sham, cant and Bunthornism.

Sale of Tickets for the Symphony Concerts.

The interest taken in the coming series of symphony concerts by the Boston Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, is shown by the demand for season tickets. A few appeared at the box office at Music Hall on Saturday morning for the purpose of securing positions in the line of purchasers. As Music Hall was to be used they were not allowed to stand in the passageway, and, accordingly, stood in line on Winter street. Some time yesterday afternoon others came and formed a line in Music Hall place. When this was noticed those around the corner made a rush, and some who had secured good positions in the first place were not so fortunate at the time of the change. Early Sunday evening the line rapidly lengthened, and at seven o'clock there were more than a hundred persons in line, and at nine o'clock the number had increased to at least two hundred. Chairs, camp-stools and even a long wooden settee were in the service of these patient ones, and the floor of the doorway leading to the vestibule was covered by about ten individuals lying packed as close as sardines. The time was passed in smoking, chatting, and by occasionally taking a promenade, a neighbor securing the seat of the absent one until he returned. When the sale of tickets began there were about 350 persons in line, many of them being boys who were holding positions for others. Some who intended purchasing only two tickets would take orders for four more, six tickets to each person being the limit. It is said that the second man in the line sold his position for thirty-five dollars. When it began to rain umbrellas were raised and a few left the line.

To the Editor of the Transcript: It is rumored that the present active managers of the Music Hall intend to make still further improvements in the hall during the coming summer. The entrance on Hamilton place and the repainting of the hall last season gave us much to thank them for, but more remains to be done. No doubt they are anxious for advice from all quarters, even from anonymous newspaper correspondents, and therefore this letter is written. The most obvious improvement still to be made is, it is understood, already decided upon, namely, the substitution of roomy, comfortable folding chairs for the preternaturally hard benches on which our bones have ached for so many years.

These should be fastened to the floor, to prevent first comers from moving their seats, as is so often done now, and stealing space from their neighbors. Then the aisles, both up and down and across the hall, should be made at least twice as wide as the present ones, in which it is impossible for persons to pass without collision.

Improvement in the ventilation of the hall would also be most welcome. Air should be forced into the hall at a suitable temperature in sufficient quantities to maintain a constant upward current, thus avoiding the downward draught of cold air from the ventilators, which is now so disagreeable and dangerous in certain places. Last, but by no means least—though it may sound to some like heresy to say it—the big organ should be banished and replaced by a modern instrument, which should be put behind the south wall of the hall, leaving the stage end nearly as flat as the opposite side of the room. A far better instrument than the present one could be had, for there are half a dozen organ-builders in this country who could put in, at a moderate cost, an organ which would be better in every way than the present worn-out one, which it is impossible to keep in tune or in order, and which is constantly growing worse. Probably there is not an organist who ever has occasion to use the present organ who would not rejoice to see it superseded. But the greatest advantage to be gained by the change would be immediately perceptible to the audience. A stage could then be had which would be unencumbered by a huge, ungainly structure, dividing it in such a way as to make a large part of it entirely useless, and a broad, open space would be secured which would render the temporary stages now necessary for nearly all the concerts given in the hall almost, if not quite, useless. Permanent seats could be built at the back which would accommodate, at least in part, the larger vocal societies which so frequently use the hall, and which are now compelled to be at great expense in the erection of temporary platforms every time they hire the hall; and the front part of the stage could be easily adapted to the use of the orchestra at slight expense. The stage, in that case, would not have to be so deep as it now is, and many now undesirable seats would be among the best in the house. In fact, there are a dozen reasons in favor of this improvement, and not one, as it seems to me, against it, except the veneration which we Bostonians have, or profess to have, for old things; but when old things have survived much of their usefulness, and have become positive nuisances, it is quite time that they should be replaced by new ones. If this change were made, I venture to say that there would be nothing but rejoicing as soon as its great advantages were seen.

(a. Reed) R. D.

A CORRESPONDENT calls attention to some proposed changes in the Music Hall and suggests others which, in his mind, would add to the comfort and convenience of performers and auditors there. His views in regard to the organ, however, will not be received with much favor, one may venture to prophesy. Is time flying so fast that twenty years makes an instrument of this kind antiquated? Must a great organ that was the wonder and admiration of 1863, or thereabouts, be entirely discarded in 1882? What use to subscribe for monuments of art if they are to be so soon discredited? Our esteemed correspondent goes too far in asking that the organ be set adrift. Its imperfections are such as can readily be removed, the action, for instance, being really all that needs improvement. It might be possible, too, to reconstruct the case so that it would not take up the space that it now occupies, and even permit the erection of a permanent amphitheatre on the stage; and surely the case of the organ is worth preserving as a work of art. There are matters other than those mentioned by our correspondent that need attention. The new arrangement of the staircase leading from the lobby on the Tremont-street side to the main entrance has already been found awkward, and even dangerous when a large crowd has been making its way out of the hall. Something should be done, too, for exit from the galleries on the east side, before almost anything else, indeed. One may also be permitted to entertain the opinion that the repainting of the hall last season was hardly an improvement.

Transcript

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS TICKET SALE.

Sept. 82

To the Editor of the Transcript: I happened to be in the line of some two or three hundred at Music Hall yesterday morning to secure tickets to the symphony concerts. The modest advertisement, announcing the time of sale of tickets, ends with this notice: "No orders for tickets received."

The impression made on my mind by that notice, and which, I believe, it was intended to convey, was that everybody would stand the same chance, that the first man in the line would have the whole house to choose from, and those who followed would have their choice from what were left. I happened to be near the head of the line, paying a large premium for my position, and less than fifty seats should have been marked off the plan before me. When I reached the window, however, greatly to my surprise, a large part of the floor and many of the best seats in both balconies were erased as "taken," and the position which I wanted in any one of several rows back of the centre—an end seat—I could not get. It seems to me that with a pretension of fairness on the part of the management, they are far from just in their dealings with the public, and are entitled to some sharp criticism. I mused as I went away, "if one near the head of the line is too late to secure some of the best seats, what chance does the three hundredth man in the line stand?" Perhaps the readers of the Transcript can answer; at any rate I should like them to know the facts.

JUSTICE.

[Our correspondent has our sympathy. But, if he is philosophical, he will reflect that the hall and the concerts are practically the property of a private citizen, who is under no obligations, real or implied, to sell any more tickets than he sees fit. Suppose, for instance, that he had announced that but half of the house would be sold; would the rush of customers have been any smaller? Some years ago when tickets for the Harvard concerts were in great demand, complaint was made every season that the guarantors of the concerts had taken the best seats before the public were allowed a chance to buy. After a while the guarantors surrendered their rights, and then the public suddenly manifested coldness and indifference. As to the best seats—it is not too much to say that poor seats, for hearing, are very few in Music Hall. Another point: Our correspondent admits that he paid a handsome premium for his position in the line. Say that this was ten dollars; now would he have been willing to pay twenty-three and a half dollars for a season ticket? Perhaps he will reply "yes, willingly." But the majority of the patrons of the enterprise are not willing to pay that amount, and it is largely because the tickets are offered at very low prices that the demand for them is so general, for without disparaging the scheme in any manner, it is a safe assumption that were the prices raised to the point where they would, with full houses, prove profitable, the audiences, instead of numbering 2500, would hardly count a fall thousand.

Hunting Down a Sensation.

Madame Rumor is responsible for a story that set newspaperdom in a whirl this forenoon. It was none of your picayunish, every-day affairs, but a first-class, megatherian, mastodon, greatest-show-on-earth sensation. The substance of it was this: Hamilton place was to be depopulated; tenants-at-will were invited to leave instantaneously, and leaseholders were to be bought out for fabulous bonuses. The buildings were then to be pulled down and elegant six-story structures were to take their place. These were to be balconied from base to upper story, and overarched all and springing from side to side was to be a great iron-and-glass roof—like that over the Lowell depot, only grander—the whole length of the place. This grand arcade, lined on either side by sumptuous palaces of trade, filled with the wealth of Ormus and of Ind, East Cambridge and Attleborough, and forming in itself a grand bazaar of all nations, was to be the entrance to a mammoth opera house, compounded of the Music Hall, the Conservatory of Music building and such other houses and lands, however described or bounded, as might be necessary to the proper rounding out of this truly magnificent temple of the lyric drama.

Now, this was a most promising sensation, and it lacked not foundation in certain corroborating reports. It was already known that the Conservatory was to remove. It was also ascertained that certain parties in Hamilton place were about to vacate. Taking these several removals together, in connection with reports of several others, the story looked plausible, to say the least. It must be looked up.

Colonel Higginson was the first gentleman waited upon. He, of all men, should know all about this grand opera house. But he did not. He knew no more about it than the man in the moon, he said. What's more, he did not believe there was anything in it; notwithstanding his business, he took no stock in that arcade; he was altogether in the dark as to those palaces of trade. Next to the registry of deeds. Result nothing. Then to the tenants of Hamilton place. A few were to remove, but some were to remain. This looked bad for the arcade. However, one more trial; this time Mr. Cotting. He said it was true that certain deeds of property on the place were to pass in a day or two (oh, joy!); but (oh, that but!) they were simply confirmatory of what had already been done in establishing an entrance there and giving the Music Hall Society a right of way over the place. No changes would be made there at present. In time some of the older buildings would be remodelled, but there was to be no clearing out of tenants, no arcade, no grand opera house! The Tremont-street entrance to the hall would soon be closed, and the Hamilton-place entrance be used in its stead. That was all. The Conservatory's removal had nothing to do with that supposititious grand opera house. The Music Hall Society had offered to renew Mr. Tourjée's lease within three months, and was sorry to have him go.

Thus perish arcade and grand opera house! Sic transit gloria mundi!

SYMPHONY CONCERT PROGRAMME.

The scheme of programmes arranged for the concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra, during the coming season, has been largely completed, and its general characteristics will be found to be the same as that of last year. Mr. Higginson is to be credited with the maintenance of the standard of the opening series of programmes, and, whatever criticism may be made upon his ideas, as shown in the plans for the coming season, by those who look forward to the concerts solely as a source of amusement, it must be admitted that the decision made regarding the season's scheme is a wise one, looking at the concerts from an educational standpoint. As the orchestra was established, and is maintained, at a large expense by Mr. Higginson, with a view to affording the musical public an opportunity to study the best orchestral music under the most favorable circumstances, his adherence to last year's plan is hardly open to criticism. In the arrangement of all of the programmes of the coming season there will be an effort made to include something bright and pleasing in the way of light music, either in the overture or the concluding number, but an entire symphony will be the principal feature of each concert. Mr. Henschel will repeat the nine symphonies of Beethoven, reserving the choral symphony for the final number of the season; and other works of this class contemplated in the scheme are the Schumann D minor and E flat symphonies, the Schubert C major and D minor, the Brahms D major the Gade A minor, the Raff "In the Woods," the Rubenstein G minor, as well as a manuscript symphony by Max Bruch, one by Dvorak, dedicated to Hans Richter, one in D minor by J. O. Gromin, and others by Mozart and Haydn. Wagner will be represented on the programmes by selections from "Tristan," "The Meistersingers," "Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser" and "Rienzi." The admirable plan of limiting the length of the programmes, so that they will not exceed two hours, will be adhered to as far as possible, and otherwise the general plan of the opening season will be followed. The sale of seats, about two-thirds of the hall being sold at the rate of $13, and the balance at $6.50 for each seat, for the season, will open at Music Hall on Monday morning, Sept. 4, and the only way that tickets can be had will be by personal application at that place and at that time. It should be remembered that the re-seating of the hall makes all the old plans useless. Mr. Peck will have new plans ready for free distribution at the box office of the hall early the present week.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra—Its First Rehearsal.

The first public rehearsal of the Boston symphony orchestra, at Music Hall, yesterday afternoon, was attended by an audience well nigh equal to the entire seating capacity of the auditorium, and its musical education was shown clearly by the quick appreciation of each number of the programme and the attention given the players throughout the afternoon. Mr. Henschel was greeted with enthusiastic applause as he entered and took his place at the conductor's desk, and Mr. Carl Baermann, the piano soloist of the day, was the recipient of an equally flattering ovation upon making his appearance to play the Schumann concerto. The orchestra has among its members a number of musicians whose faces have not been familiar in the concert halls of this city in past seasons, and the playing of the several numbers gave evidence that good results may be expected from their work during the coming season. The orchestra numbers 69 musicians, and its make-up and membership is as follows:

First Violins—B. Listemann, Theodore Human, J. Akeroyd, Daniel Kuntz, F. Listemann, L. Schmidt, Jr., M. Löffler, G. Dannreuther, J. W. Dehn, L. Lichtenberg, John Behr, C. F. Higgins. 12.
Second violins—C. H. Eichler, J. E. Eichler, H. Mullaly, V. Akeroyd, J. B. Proctor, F. A. Oliver, F. E. Schuchmann, E. B. Marble, H. J. Haldeman, W. W. Swornsbourne, C. Troutmann, Adolph Grethen. 12.
Violas—H. Biall, E. Beyer, E. Von Ette, G. A. Patz, W. Kietzel, Louis Post, R. E. Tower, Charles J. Weintz. 8.
Violoncellos—W. Müller, A. Heindl, A. P. F. Suck, Carl Behr, Max Korth, A. Stockbridge, Ernst Jonas, Ernst Schmidt. 8.
Double basses—George Bareither, H. A. Greene, L. Jennewein, A. Messerschmidt, A. Goldstein, L. E. Manoly, J. Blettermann, H. J. Butler, August Stein. 9.
Harp—A. Freygaug. 1.
Flutes—E. M. Heindl, 1st; Paul Fox, 2d. 2.
Clarinets—E. Strasser, 1st; P. Metzger, 2d. 2.
Oboes—Hugo Hemmann, 1st; Wilhelm Ross, 2d. 2.
Bassoons—Christian Dietrich, 1st; Paul Elitz, 2d. 2.
Trumpets—E. M. Bazley, 1st; Benj Bowron, 2d. 2.
Horns—E. Schormann, 1st; A. Hockebarth, 2d; L. Lippoldt, 3d; C. Schumann, 4th. 4.
Trombones—A. Ritz, 1st; D. H. Moore, 2d; G. W. Stewart, 3d. 3.
Tuba—W. C. Nichols. 1.
Tympani—H. D. Simpson. 1.

The programme presented was that already announced for this evening, when the first of the 26 concerts of the season will be given, the numbers being the Beethoven overture, "Dedication of the House," the Schumann concert for pianoforte in A minor, the Rubinstein symphony in G minor, three Hungarian dances set by Brahms, and two pianoforte solos.

The Symphony Concerts.

The opening concert of the second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel, conductor, will occur next Saturday evening in Music Hall. The first public rehearsal will take place Friday afternoon. Every means are at hand for making the second season even a more brilliant one than the first. There will be the same crowded houses throughout, and the programmes will be selected with judicious care. Many of the greatest works given last year will be reproduced, in order that the public may become better acquainted with them; but most of the minor numbers of the programme will be given for the first time by this orchestra. An entire symphony will be given each evening, thus continuing the plan adopted last year. All of the nine great works of Beethoven will be given, the choral symphony closing the season. The works of Wagner, Haydn, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert and other masters will hold a prominent place on the programmes. The custom of having one or more prominent artists as soloists at the concerts will be continued. Carl Baermann, the pianoforte favorite of last season, will play Schumann's concerto in A minor at the first concert. Those who heard him perform this great work last year will not be sorry to see it upon the programme again. The first number of the opening programme will be the same appropriate and noble overture selected last year, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House." These two numbers are the only ones on the opening programme which were given in this city last season by any orchestra. The entire programme is as follows:

Overture, opus 124, "Dedication of the House." Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54. Schumann
Professor Carl Baermann and orchestra.
Symphony in G minor, No. 5, opus 107. Rubinstein
Piano solo.
(a) "Two Bagatelles" Beethoven
(b) Rhapsody, No. 8. Liszt
Professor Carl Baermann.
Three Hungarian dances. Brahms

The comfort of the many patrons of the concerts will be secured by the recent reseating of the hall, in which excellent and comfortable opera chairs were substituted for the old highly unsatisfactory arrangement.

Harold

add. Oct 7-8 NOTE.

Wilhelm Mueller, who is to be the first and solo violoncellist of the Boston symphony orchestra next season, was born in Braunschweig, Germany, where his father, Karl Mueller, was conductor of the opera orchestra of the Duke of Braunschweig. Young Mueller at the age of fourteen entered as violoncellist in the opera orchestra of the Duke of Braunschweig, beginning his musical career in company with his brothers as court-quartet at Meiningen. This quartet travelled through Germany, Russia, France, Holland, Denmark, Italy, etc., with great success. From 1869 to 1879 he was royal concert-master at the imperial opera, at Berlin, and royal professor at the royal high school of music. Mueller arrived in New York in 1880, where he was a member of the Philharmonic Society, and leading violoncellist of Theodore Thomas's and Dr. Damrosch's orchestras. He has now decided to remain in this city permanently. Herr Mueller received many titles and marks of distinction from the courts of Europe, among which may be noted the Order of the Saxon Ernestine House. He also enjoys the distinction of being solo violoncellist to the Emperor of Germany.

Sunday Herald July 23, 1882

The uninterrupted success of the concerts of the Symphony orchestra last season is sure to be repeated during the coming winter, whatever programmes may be announced; but, whether this support can be counted upon for any continuous number of seasons appears to be a matter of doubt, unless there is an effort made to interest the largest possible portion of the musically-inclined residents of the city and vicinity. In other words, it appears unreasonable to suppose that a concert-going public has suddenly sprung into existence in this vicinity which is capable of hearing intelligently and enjoying an entire season's series of the highest classical programmes of orchestral music. All things appear possible in this age of rapid development, but it seems unreasonable that such a general love for a class of music calling for a fair musical education for its appreciation should not have been suspected earlier by those interested in such matters. The immense sale of what are styled popular musical compositions, as compared with the standard works of the world's composers, is a pretty sure indication that the average musical culture of the people is not of the highest order, and the relative sales of the two classes of publications named is much the same in this vicinity as elsewhere. Any educational system will be a failure if it assumes too high a degree of intelligence among those whom it is designed to benefit. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the programmes of the symphony concerts for future seasons may be so arranged that they will interest, not only students of music, but the public at large as well, and thus insure a steadily growing constituency for the patronage of these concerts. Undoubtedly it will be wiser to make the sale of season tickets for the entire series of 26 concerts, for there are practical objections to making a division of the season's subscription sale which cannot be fully appreciated by the public. An arrangement by which certain evenings, say 10 of the 26, should be given to classical programmes and 15 for programmes of lighter compositions, would be sure to find favor with the public, because such a plan would interest a much larger number of concert patrons than if the scheme of programmes were restricted to either one class of music. With the magnificent resources at Mr. Henschel's command, the lighter programmes could be given with an effect never before known in this city. They would attract audiences which would find classical works above their comprehension. It is also to be hoped that the final programme of the coming season may be made a "request" one, some plan being devised to get an honest expression of opinion as to the relative attractiveness, to the audiences, of each and every programme during the season. A well arranged plan for such a request programme would serve as a sort of examination of the audiences, and indicate the best course to be pursued during the next succeeding season.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

I. CONCERT. /832

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Dedication of the House." Op. 124. BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in A minor, op. 54. SCHUMANN.

Allegro affettuoso, Andante espressivo; Tempo Primo; Allegro molto,— Intermezzo (Andantino grazioso). Allegro vivace.—

SYMPHONY in G minor. (Russian.)

No. 5, op. 107. [FIRST TIME.] A. RUBINSTEIN.

Moderato assai.—Allegro non troppo, moderato assai; Tempo primo.—
Andante.—Allegro vivace.—

PIANO SOLO.

(a) Two Bagatelles. BEETHOVEN.

(b) Rhapsody No. 8. LISZT.

HUNGARIAN DANCES, set by BRAHMS.

Poco Andante. (No. 11.)—Andantino grazioso. (No. 13.)—Allegro molto. (No. 1.)

SOLOIST:

PROFESSOR CARL BAERMANN.

Mr. BAERMANN will use a Chickering Piano.

The Symphony Concerts.

The opening concert of the second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel, conductor, will occur next Saturday evening in Music Hall. The first public rehearsal will take place Friday afternoon. Every means are at hand for making the second season even a more brilliant one than the first. There will be the same crowded houses throughout, and the programmes will be selected with judicious care. Many of the greatest works given last year will be reproduced, in order that the public may become better acquainted with them; but most of the minor numbers of the programme will be given for the first time by this orchestra. An entire symphony will be given each evening, thus continuing the plan adopted last year. All of the nine great works of Beethoven will be given, the choral symphony closing the season. The works of Wagner, Haydn, Mozart, Schumann, Schubert and other masters will hold a prominent place on the programmes. The custom of having one or more prominent artists as soloists at the concerts will be continued. Carl Baermann, the pianoforte favorite of last season, will play Schumann's concerto in A minor at the first concert. Those who heard him perform this great work last year will not be sorry to see it upon the programme again. The first number of the opening programme will be the same appropriate and noble overture selected last year, Beethoven's "Dedication of the House." These two numbers are the only ones on the opening programme which were given in this city last season by any orchestra. The entire programme is as follows:

Overture, opus 124, "Dedication of the House." Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54. Schumann
Professor Carl Baermann and orchestra.
Symphony in G minor, No. 5, opus 107.....Rubinstein
Piano solo.
(a.) "Two Bagatelles".....Beethoven
(b.) Rhapsody, No. 8.....Liszt
Professor Carl Baermann.
Three Hungarian dances.....Brahms

The comfort of the many patrons of the concerts will be secured by the recent reseating of the hall, in which excellent and comfortable opera chairs were substituted for the old highly unsatisfactory arrangement.

ad. 4-8-82 NOTE.

Wilhelm Mueller, who is to be the first and solo violoncellist of the Boston symphony orchestra next season, was born in Braunschweig, Germany, where his father, Karl Mueller, was conductor of the opera orchestra of the Duke of Braunschweig. Young Mueller at the age of fourteen entered as violoncellist in the opera orchestra of the Duke of Braunschweig, beginning his musical career in company with his brothers as court-quartet at Meiningen. This quartet travelled through Germany, Russia, France, Holland, Denmark, Italy, etc., with great success. From 1869 to 1879 he was royal concert-master at the imperial opera, at Berlin, and royal professor at the royal high school of music. Mueller arrived in New York in 1880, where he was a member of the Philharmonic Society, and leading violoncellist of Theodore Thomas's and Dr. Damrosch's orchestras. He has now decided to remain in this city permanently. Herr Mueller received many titles and marks of distinction from the courts of Europe, among which may be noted the Order of the Saxon Ernestine House. He also enjoys the distinction of being solo violoncellist to the Emperor of Germany.

Sunday Herald July 23, 1882

The uninterrupted success of the concerts of the Symphony orchestra last season is sure to be repeated during the coming winter, whatever programmes may be announced; but, whether this support can be counted upon for any continuous number of seasons appears to be a matter of doubt, unless there is an effort made to interest the largest possible portion of the musically-inclined residents of the city and vicinity. In other words, it appears unreasonable to suppose that a concert-going public has suddenly sprung into existence in this vicinity which is capable of hearing intelligently and enjoying an entire season's series of the highest classical programmes of orchestral music. All things appear possible in this age of rapid development, but it seems unreasonable that such a general love for a class of music calling for a fair musical education for its appreciation should not have been suspected earlier by those interested in such matters. The immense sale of what are styled popular musical compositions, as compared with the standard works of the world's composers, is a pretty sure indication that the average musical culture of the people is not of the highest order, and the relative sales of the two classes of publications named is much the same in this vicinity as elsewhere. Any educational system will be a failure if it assumes too high a degree of intelligence among those whom it is designed to benefit. It is to be hoped, therefore, that the programmes of the symphony concerts for future seasons may be so arranged that they will interest, not only students of music, but the public at large as well, and thus insure a steadily growing constituency for the patronage of these concerts. Undoubtedly it will be wiser to make the sale of season tickets for the entire series of 26 concerts, for there are practical objections to making a division of the season's subscription sale which cannot be fully appreciated by the public. An arrangement by which certain evenings, say 10 of the 26, should be given to classical programmes and 15 for programmes of lighter compositions, would be sure to find favor with the public, because such a plan would interest a much larger number of concert patrons than if the scheme of programmes were restricted to either one class of music. With the magnificent resources at Mr. Henschel's command, the lighter programmes could be given with an effect never before known in this city. They would attract audiences which would find classical works above their comprehension. It is also to be hoped that the final programme of the coming season may be made a "request" one, some plan being devised to get an honest expression of opinion as to the relative attractiveness, to the audiences, of each and every programme during the season. A well arranged plan for such a request programme would serve as a sort of examination of the audiences, and indicate the best course to be pursued during the next succeeding season.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

I. CONCERT. /882

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 7TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. "Dedication of the House." Op. 124. BEETHOVEN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in A minor, op. 54. SCHUMANN.

Allegro affettuoso, Andante espressivo: Tempo Primo; Allegro molto.—
Intermezzo (Andantino grazioso), Allegro vivace.—

SYMPHONY in G minor. (Russian.)

No. 5, op. 107. (FIRST TIME.) A. RUBINSTEIN.

Moderato assai.—Allegro non troppo, moderato assai: Tempo primo.—
Andante.—Allegro vivace.—

PIANO SOLO.

(a) Two Bagatelles. BEETHOVEN.

(b) Rhapsody No. 8. LISZT.

HUNGARIAN DANCES, set by BRAHMS.

First Andante, No. 11.—Andantino grazioso, No. 12.—Allegro molto, No. 1.

SOLOIST:

PROFESSOR CARL BAERMANN.

Mr. BAERMANN will use a Chickering Piano.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Henschel's orchestra opened its second season in the Music Hall last Saturday evening. The audience was very large, albeit there were a goodly number of empty seats, especially on the floor. But it was noticeable that these unoccupied seats were invariably especially good ones, evidently belonging either to subscribers who had not yet come to town from their summer quarters, or else (as is whispered) held by speculators, several of whom were quietly but firmly debarred from plying their trade within the limits of Music Hall place on the evening of the concert. In the orchestra several new faces were to be seen, notably Mr. Wilhelm Müller, of quartet fame, at the head of the 'celli. Some few familiar faces were also conspicuously absent, among them Mr. Wulf Fries and Mr. C. N. Allen. After the first few measures of the opening piece it was evident that Mr. Henschel had abandoned his last year's plan of placing the first and second violins; now he has them in their traditional relative positions—all the first violins on his left, and all the second on his right. Bravo!

The programme was—

Overture—"Dedication of the House." Op. 124.....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54.....Schumann
Symphony in G minor. (Russian.)
No. 5, op. 107. [First time.].....A. Rubinstein
Piano Solo.

(a) Two Bagatelles.....Beethoven
(b) Rhapsody No. 8.....Liszt
Hungarian Dances, Nos. 11, 13 and 1.....Brahms

Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist. When Mr. Henschel stepped up to the conductor's desk he was greeted with a splendid salvo of enthusiastic hand-clapping, as was also Mr. Baermann on his first appearance in the hall. The playing of the Beethoven overture was in marked contrast to the style in which the same piece was performed at the first concert last year. Not a whit, of the whilom hurry-scurry playing was to be detected. The overture was given with admirable dignity, precision, careful attention to light and shade—in a word, superbly. Especially praiseworthy was the way in which some fine crescendo passages were played, the crescendo not making its appearance too soon, but waiting until the moment when the musical sense of the listener absolutely cannot spare it—a very characteristic trait in Beethoven's music, and one not often italicised by conductors. The accelerando passage between the opening slow movement and the allegro was also managed with masterly skill. Here, in fact, was a truly grand performance of a noble work, a performance admirable both in technique and in musicianly appreciation of the true character of the composition. And yet, we did feel the want of one thing. We could not help missing Mr. Henschel's old quasi-dramatic manner, and its electric effect both upon the orchestra and upon ourselves. Last year, Mr. Henschel, so to speak, put the whole audience in his pocket with a far less praiseworthy performance of this very overture; this year the incomparably superior performance left us comparatively cold.

Some people used to laugh a little at what they called Mr. Henschel's "drum-major flourish"—a thing which, after all, does not come within the pale of musical criticism, and we should not speak of it here had it not seemed wholly admirable and effective to us; it really helped the music. Such outspoken dramatic conducting lays itself open to the charge of charlatanism only when it puts itself forward as a substitute for really fine playing by the orchestra; but it adds infinite zest to a thoroughly fine performance, and we, personally, cannot but regret its absence, having once enjoyed its presence. The performance of the Rubinstein symphony was almost as fine as that of the overture, in some passages overwhelmingly powerful. Of the symphony itself we cannot speak intelligently after but a single hearing, but it certainly struck us as being the strongest and most enjoyable work of its composer since the Ocean Symphony. It will probably take some time for Western listeners to appreciate this composition at its true value. All the themes are thoroughly Russian in character, and we have hitherto been too prone to enjoy Slavic melody for its strangeness and piquancy only—qualities which lose their savor when too much harped on, as in a long symphonic work. We must learn to see the true inner soul of this melody, to recognize it as a familiar and lovable musical spirit, before we can appreciate its worth as a basis for extended symphonic development. Still another circumstance places us at a disadvantage: Ever since Meyerbeer and his imitators began to exploit the "national characteristic" element in music, all sorts of theatrical and trivial associations have clustered gratuitously around these strange peoples' melodies; it is hard at first to rid them of a certain smell of the footlights. But with time, and frequent hearings of such works as Rubinstein's G minor symphony, we shall rid ourselves of these ungracious associations, and feel so at home in the Slavic musical element that true appreciation can take the place of mere ear-deep enjoyment. The Brahms dances were given with delightful snap and zest. Upon the whole the orchestra played in a way utterly to eclipse all its doings last year. Mr. Baermann played the great Schumann concerto astonishingly well. Saving an occasional over use of the pedal, his performance was technically as fine as any pianoforte playing we have ever heard. Moreover it was full of fire, animation and brilliancy, with now and then moments of exquisite tenderness and grace. In point of conception we liked Mr. Baermann's rendering of the last two movements better than his playing of the first Allegro affettuoso. In this movement it seemed to us, somehow, that with all the pianist's superb and wholly musicianly playing, the peculiar, warm, sentimental side (what classical purists used to call the morbid side) of Schumann's genius was left out. We did not feel that undercurrent of deep pathos which is so eminently Schumannesque. The orchestra accompanied the concerto in a style that can only be called superb. We have only one real criticism to make on the performance; the grand, incisive accent and moderate speed with which Mr. Baermann gave out the opening theme of the last movement did not return again when the theme itself returned. If Mr. Henschel had only held back his orchestra a little in the brilliant tutti passages, so as to prevent this theme's losing its initial dignity and force, it would have been better. Mr. Baermann's playing of the Beethoven bagatelles was the perfection of graceful humor and sensibility. Of his performance of the Liszt rhapsody we can only say that, with all its brilliancy, it did not succeed in making an uninteresting composition interesting.

The programme for the second concert will be: Overture, prayer (Rienzi), Wagner; symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21, Beethoven; Chaconne et Rigodon (Aline), Monsigny; slumber air, overture (Masaniello), Auber. Mr. Charles R. Adams will be the singer.

Opening of the Boston Symphony Concerts—Preludes and Echoes.

Sunday Globe

That the great organ in Music Hall is not a useless and cumbrous piece of mechanism the fine playing of Mr. W. J. D. Leavitt in the Bay State course concert the other evening gave abundant evidence, if that were required. It will be cause for sincere regret if, because of public apathy or private greed, under the convenient mask of philanthropy, the organ is allowed to be taken from the city. An outlay of a few thousand dollars would undoubtedly remedy, to a large extent at least, the defects now observable in the action of the instrument; and, while the organ can be spared from Music Hall, it should be assured in that event a permanent home in Boston, either under the control of one of our great musical schools or in charge of a special association of citizens. It is a somewhat curious commentary on the claims which have been made on behalf of the present monopoly in orchestral music in Boston, as some people think, that the management credited with such remarkable zeal for popular happiness should look at the organ question from such a cold-blooded, grad-grind point of view. Sell the great organ, that cherished "institution?" the horrified old ladies of the Hub may ask. Yes, indeed; the Music Hall directing power would dispose of it gladly, to Chicago, Oshkosh, Kalamazoo or any other city for a good price. Has not the capacity of the hall been reduced by putting in the new seats, and does not the present plan of the hall give evidence on its face of a purpose to remove the organ and reconstruct the stage at as early a time in the future as convenience will allow? But these seeming inconsistencies are rapidly dispelled of course in the light of reason. Mr. Higginson must really think a great organ unesthetic, unworthy of being even looked on by Boston Brahmins; and this, and not in the least any considerations of a financial sort, must lead him to seek to get rid of the instrument to some less cultivated community, that would gladly "live up" to the famous Waleker instrument. Mr. Higginson is the great sustainer of orchestral concerts in Boston; without him the Hub would languish for want of harmonic sounds; and in view of these facts it is most unbecoming that there should be any censorious criticism of his avowed purpose to get rid, if possible, of the great organ in Music Hall. It is not every city which has such a musical patron to be proud of, and while no objection will be made by the Music Hall management to any feeling of regard for the organ decorously expressed, due regard to its position should prevent all carping at the plans, destructive or otherwise, which its wisdom may evolve. It may be therefore taken for granted that Mr. Higginson will not seriously oppose any public scheme by which the organ may be secured a permanent home in Boston. If the measure is not pushed in an ungrateful or offensive way. Still further it may be assumed, we think, that the Higginson interest will not expect from any intending Boston purchasers of the organ it is desired to sell more than a reasonably fair price. Mr. Higginson desires to get rid of the instrument, and between now and spring time there ought to be abundant evidence shown him that other Bostonians are anxious to keep the organ in the city, and the proposition to send it out of town to seek an abiding place put beyond the possibilities of the future.

Opening of the Higginson Concerts.

The second season of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts has begun. The public rehearsal for the opening entertainment was given in Music Hall, Friday afternoon, and the first concert at the same place last evening. On both occasions it is hardly necessary to say the spacious auditorium was crowded. At the public rehearsal it was discovered that though the most desirable portion of the house had been reserved for the holders of season tickets, there was still plenty of room left for those paying the twenty-five cents' admission fee. One of the first things that attracts the notice of one who is present on both occasions is the fact that there is a marked difference between the audience which attends the public rehearsals and the one assisting at the regular concerts. Besides the throng of the lovers of music who attend both performances there is probably a larger number of people of real musical taste and discretion at the rehearsals than at the concerts. Beside those who appreciate and criticize there are those who merely endure or are pleased without knowing exactly why. A careful comparison of the two audiences during the past season cannot have failed to make it plain to the judicious observer that this latter class has a few representatives at the evening concerts. The fact is that the Henschel concerts have created a great furor. It has come to be quite the proper thing to hold seats for the series. The floor of the Music Hall thus becomes in a degree a kind of musical milliner's shop, where the grand harmonies of Beethoven and the pretty concerts of some of the lesser masters serve as a sort of seasoning to the brilliant panorama of fall bonnets and shirt fronts. The people who attend the public rehearsal are for the most part musical and critical, and so it happened that when Georg Henschel came upon the platform Friday afternoon there was not a single reverberation of applause throughout the great auditorium. Later in the afternoon, however, his intelligent and really satisfactory efforts in the Rubenstein symphony drew forth several rounds of applause. It is evident that Mr. Henschel is on trial. His uneven and not altogether judicious leading last season has left his critical auditors with a rather doubtful sentiment in his favor. It is at the same time not forgotten that Mr. Henschel is a young man, and that he assumed his arduous duties for the first time last season. He still has the opportunity before him to raise himself in the estimation of those who are now rather inclined to look upon him with disfavor. His appearance upon the stage Saturday evening was the signal for an enthusiastic outburst of applause from his fashionable admirers who are pretty apt to applaud him whether he does a meritorious thing or no, and are evidently not quite able to distinguish in their minds between the barytone deservedly eminent as a soloist and the question of his eminence in quite a different department of his art.

The orchestra last evening was arranged on the plan adopted by the leader last year—that is, upon tiers of wooden platforms rising higher and higher to the back of the stage, with the violins in the front semicircle and the double basses in the rear. The orchestra, which presents the usual almost solid phalanx of German faces, numbers about sixty-five members, and is substantially the same as last season. There are, however, some few notable exceptions. Bernhard Listemann, as before, is first violin, but the familiar face of C. N. Allen, who formerly read from the same score with him, is no longer to be seen. Other changes have been made.

The programme of the evening appropriately began with the grand old overture of Beethoven, "The Dedication of the House," op. 124. This work was written by the master during the summer and autumn of 1822, for the opening of the Josephstadt Theatre, at Vienna. The overture is, perhaps, more in the style of some of Beethoven's earlier productions than any other work written at so late a period. Both the opening majestic and sustained movement and the brilliant allegro movement into which it merges were taken last evening in what appeared to be excellent time. But in the course of the overture one had an opportunity to be reminded that even the Boston Symphony orchestra, which a popular superstition credits with the enormous feat of getting away with some $25,000 more or less than the receipts of the season, was not perfect. There is, in fact, a very noticeable defect in the substitution of the modern cornet for the older and more effective trumpet. Valve instruments are said to have been the invention of a man named Adams not such a very long time ago, and the cornet has become since his day almost entirely substituted for its simpler predecessor. But all of the old scores are written for trombi, as was the particular work in question, and when the cornet is used in their place the effect is in most instances by no means what was intended by the composer. The piercing blast of the trumpet rising above the storm of an orchestral forte passage cannot be imitated by its feeble though more pliable successor. In other words, an instrument with a short tube cannot produce the sound which one with a long tube can. In the particular work in question the trumpet passages, which certainly were intended to be heard, were entirely inaudible to most of the audience. Of course trumpets cannot be substituted for cornets without expense and trouble. It is no easy matter in these days to secure a good trumpet player; but it would seem as though it ought to be done, even at the risk of making the annual loss amount to as much as $30,000.

Following the Beethoven overture came the Schumann concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54, performed by Carl Baermann. The manner in which this splendid work was accompanied by the orchestra evidenced much drill and care. There is nothing new to be said at this late day about Carl Baermann's playing. The people of Boston have already made up their minds in this matter, and the hearty and prolonged applause with which this excellent pianist was greeted must have seemed very flattering to him. His mastery over the instrument with which his name is associated is not only already well known, but he has even performed this very concerto here within a few months. He certainly has not lost any of his wonderful skill since that time. Later in the evening he gave three piano solos—two bagatelles from Beethoven and Rhapsody No. 8, by Liszt, both of which were played with his usual discretion, and were warmly applauded.

The great event of the evening was the production, for the first time in America, of Anton Rubinstein's G minor Russian symphony (No. 5, op. 107). This work was a surprise to many, even of Rubinstein's particular admirers, and a delight to all who listen to music for music's sake. It is in four movements, but the first movement alone would be sufficient to entitle the composer to fame. It is a moderato assai filled with the broadest drolleries and the most humorous effects which man ever put into an orchestral score; and this same remark holds good throughout much of the remaining movements. It is not all gayety and brightness, however. At one point a cloud blows up into the zenith, and a storm arises which works itself out with all the fury which the brasses, the drums and the basses together can produce. The instrumentation throughout is simply splendid. The themes are interwoven, abruptly changed, passed about among the different instruments, brought up again in unexpected places in a manner which cannot fail to charm and delight on first hearing. There is one passage which the horns, oboe and fagotti trip off with in the most lively and humorous way, and which they persist in taking up again in spite of the remonstrance of the violins, until they are finally overpowered by the full orchestra. Even then, for a short time, the basses cannot bear to part with the air, and keep it up obstinately beneath the current of harmony till forced into something else. But it would be a long task to recount half the ideas and expressions developed in the course of the work, which can hardly be accorded too much praise. The horn players deserve particular credit for the ease with which they carried themselves through some very difficult passages, and the fagotti, too, did some most excellent work. Exactly in what manner Mr. Henschel erred or excelled in the production of this work ought not to be determined, perhaps, without greater familiarity with the work itself; but it is but fair to say that he appeared to carry it out with good discretion and judgment. He was indeed better contained and painstaking last night than he has been wont to be.

Three Hungarian dances, instrumented by Brahms, formed the closing feature of the concert. These brief movements were quaint and odd enough in all conscience, and seemed to please the audience greatly by their novelty.

To sum up, the concert altogether was excellent, the programme good, the effect pleasing, and the large audience went away for the most part highly satisfied with the inaugural entertainment of what everybody would like to predict a brilliant and useful series. The programme for the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the concert on Saturday evening next will be as follows:

Overture	(Rienzi)	Wagner
Prayer
Symphony in C No. 1, op. 21		Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio—Andante cantabile con moto.
Menuetto.	(Allegro molto e vivace.)—Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.
Chaconne et Rigodon—(Aline)		Monsigny
Slumber Air	(Masaniello)	Auber
Overture
Soloist:
Mr. Charles R. Adams.

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS.

THE musical season in Boston has begun much earlier than usual. This early beginning was chiefly due to the Boston Symphony Concerts which Mr. Henschel commenced October 7. The concerts have been different from those of last season in some respects. Although the nine Beethoven symphonies are to constitute, as before, the nucleus of the symphonic work, there is evidently an effort being made to lighten the programmes in consonance with popular tastes.

The introduction of French Rigaudons, of Auber's Masaniello overture, and of Gounod's Funeral March of a Marionette proves this.

Thus far, the chief novelty at the concerts has been the performance of Rubinstein's new Russian Symphony. The work is too odd in its flavor to charm at once. The themes have all that mournful vein which is characteristic of the northern nations. Rubinstein endeavors to overcome the consequent monotony of gloom by skilful contrapuntal treatment; but even this, masterly though it be, scarcely suffices to afford contrasts. The scherzo movement, however, has for its chief theme a melody evidently taken from Southern Russia, possibly from beyond the Caucasus, since in its style and treatment the effect of a Persian dance rhythm is produced. All through the work, the deepest instruments have heavy labors thrust upon them, the contra-basses becoming at times almost solo instruments. Mus. Herald composition interesting.

The programme for the second concert will be: Overture, prayer (Rienzi), Wagner; symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21, Beethoven; Chaconne et Rigodon (Aline), Monsigny; slumber air, overture (Masaniello), Auber. Mr. Charles R. Adams will be the singer.

Opening of the Boston Symphony Concerts—Preludes and Echoes.

Sunday Globe

That the great organ in Music Hall is not a useless and cumbrous piece of mechanism the fine playing of Mr. W. J. D. Leavitt in the Bay State course concert the other evening gave abundant evidence, if that were required. It will be cause for sincere regret if, because of public apathy or private greed, under the convenient mask of philanthropy, the organ is allowed to be taken from the city. An outlay of a few thousand dollars would undoubtedly remedy, to a large extent at least, the defects now observable in the action of the instrument; and, while the organ can be spared from Music Hall, it should be assured in that event a permanent home in Boston, either under the control of one of our great musical schools or in charge of a special association of citizens. It is a somewhat curious commentary on the claims which have been made on behalf of the present monopoly in orchestral music in Boston, as some people think, that the management credited with such remarkable zeal for popular happiness should look at the organ question from such a cold-blooded, grad-grind point of view. Sell the great organ, that cherished "institution?" the horrified old ladies of the Hub may ask. Yes, indeed; the Music Hall directing power would dispose of it gladly, to Chicago, Oshkosh, Kalamazoo or any other city for a good price. Has not the capacity of the hall been reduced by putting in the new seats, and does not the present plan of the hall give evidence on its face of a purpose to remove the organ and reconstruct the stage at as early a time in the future as convenience will allow? But these seeming inconsistencies are rapidly dispelled of course in the light of reason. Mr. Higginson must really think a great organ unaesthetic, unworthy of being even looked on by Boston Brahmins; and this, and not in the least any considerations of a financial sort, must lead him to seek to get rid of the instrument to some less cultivated community, that would gladly "live up" to the famous Walcker instrument. Mr. Higginson is the great sustainer of orchestral concerts in Boston; without him the Hub would languish for want of harmonic sounds; and in view of these facts it is most unbecoming that there should be any censorious criticism of his avowed purpose to get rid, if possible, of the great organ in Music Hall. It is not every city which has such a musical patron to be proud of, and while no objection will be made by the Music Hall management to any feeling of regard for the organ decorously expressed, due regard to its position should prevent all carping at the plans, destructive or otherwise, which its wisdom may evolve. It may be therefore taken for granted that Mr. Higginson will not seriously oppose any public scheme by which the organ may be secured a permanent home in Boston. If the measure is not pushed in an ungrateful or offensive way. Still further it may be assumed, we think, that the Higginson interest will not expect from any intending Boston purchasers of the organ it is desired to sell more than a reasonably fair price. Mr. Higginson desires to get rid of the instrument, and between now and spring time there ought to be abundant evidence shown him that other Bostonians are anxious to keep the organ in the city, and the proposition to send it out of town to seek an abiding place put beyond the possibilities of the future.

Opening of the Higginson Concerts.

The second season of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concerts has begun. The public rehearsal for the opening entertainment was given in Music Hall, Friday afternoon, and the first concert at the same place last evening. On both occasions it is hardly necessary to say the spacious auditorium was crowded. At the public rehearsal it was discovered that though the most desirable portion of the house had been reserved for the holders of season tickets, there was still plenty of room left for those paying the twenty-five cents' admission fee. One of the first things that attracts the notice of one who is present on both occasions is the fact that there is a marked difference between the audience which attends the public rehearsals and the one assisting at the regular concerts. Besides the throng of the lovers of music who attend both performances there is probably a larger number of people of real musical taste and discretion at the rehearsals than at the concerts. Beside those who appreciate and criticize there are those who merely endure or are pleased without knowing exactly why. A careful comparison of the two audiences during the past season cannot have failed to make it plain to the judicious observer that this latter class has a few representatives at the evening concerts. The fact is that the Henschel concerts have created a great furor. It has come to be quite the proper thing to hold seats for the series. The floor of the Music Hall thus becomes in a degree a kind of musical milliner's shop, where the grand harmonies of Beethoven and the pretty concerts of some of the lesser masters serve as a sort of seasoning to the brilliant panorama of fall bonnets and shirt fronts. The people who attend the public rehearsal are for the most part musical and critical, and so it happened that when Georg Henschel came upon the platform Friday afternoon there was not a single reverberation of applause throughout the great auditorium. Later in the afternoon, however, his intelligent and really satisfactory efforts in the Rubenstein symphony drew forth several rounds of applause. It is evident that Mr. Henschel is on trial. His uneven and not altogether judicious leading last season has left his critical auditors with a rather doubtful sentiment in his favor. It is at the same time not forgotten that Mr. Henschel is a young man, and that he assumed his arduous duties for the first time last season. He still has the opportunity before him to raise himself in the estimation of those who are now rather inclined to look upon him with disfavor. His appearance upon the stage Saturday evening was the signal for an enthusiastic outburst of applause from his fashionable admirers who are pretty apt to applaud him whether he does a meritorious thing or no, and are evidently not quite able to distinguish in their minds between the barytone deservedly eminent as a soloist and the question of his eminence in quite a different department of his art.

The orchestra last evening was arranged on the plan adopted by the leader last year—that is, upon tiers of wooden platforms rising higher and higher to the back of the stage, with the violins in the front semicircle and the double basses in the rear. The orchestra, which presents the usual almost solid phalanx of German faces, numbers about sixty-five members, and is substantially the same as last season. There are, however, some few notable exceptions. Bernhard Listemann, as before, is first violin, but the familiar face of C. N. Allen, who formerly read from the same score with him, is no longer to be seen. Other changes have been made.

The programme of the evening appropriately began with the grand old overture of Beethoven, "The Dedication of the House," op. 124. This work was written by the master during the summer and autumn of 1822, for the opening of the

Josephstadt Theatre, at Vienna. The overture is, perhaps, more in the style of some of Beethoven's earlier productions than any other work written at so late a period. Both the opening majestic and sustained movement and the brilliant allegro movement into which it merges were taken last evening in what appeared to be excellent time. But in the course of the overture one had an opportunity to be reminded that even the Boston Symphony orchestra, which a popular superstition credits with the enormous feat of getting away with some $25,000 more or less than the receipts of the season, was not perfect. There is, in fact, a very noticeable defect in the substitution of the modern cornet for the older and more effective trumpet. Valve instruments are said to have been the invention of a man named Adams not such a very long time ago, and the cornet has become since his day almost entirely substituted for its simpler predecessor. But all of the old scores are written for trombi, as was the particular work in question, and when the cornet is used in their place the effect is in most instances by no means what was intended by the composer. The piercing blast of the trumpet rising above the storm of an orchestral forte passage cannot be imitated by its feebler though more pliable successor. In other words, an instrument with a short tube cannot produce the sound which one with a long tube can. In the particular work in question the trumpet passages, which certainly were intended to be heard, were entirely inaudible to most of the audience. Of course trumpets cannot be substituted for cornets without expense and trouble. It is no easy matter in these days to secure a good trumpet player; but it would seem as though it ought to be done, even at the risk of making the annual loss amount to as much as $30,000.

Following the Beethoven overture came the Schumann concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54, performed by Carl Baermann. The manner in which this splendid work was accompanied by the orchestra evidenced much drill and care. There is nothing new to be said at this late day about Carl Baermann's playing. The people of Boston have already made up their minds in this matter, and the hearty and prolonged applause with which this excellent pianist was greeted must have seemed very flattering to him. His mastery over the instrument with which his name is associated is not only already well known, but he has even performed this very concerto here within a few months. He certainly has not lost any of his wonderful skill since that time. Later in the evening he gave three piano solos—two bagatelles from Beethoven and Rhapsody No. 8, by Liszt, both of which were played with his usual discretion, and were warmly applauded.

The great event of the evening was the production, for the first time in America, of Anton Rubinstein's G minor Russian symphony (No. 5, op. 107). This work was a surprise to many, even of Rubinstein's particular admirers, and a delight to all who listen to music for music's sake. It is in four movements, but the first movement alone would be sufficient to entitle the composer to fame. It is a moderato assai filled with the broadest drolleries and the most humorous effects which man ever put into an orchestral score; and this same remark holds good throughout much of the remaining movements. It is not all gayety and brightness, however. At one point a cloud blows up into the zenith, and a storm arises which works itself out with all the fury which the brasses, the drums and the basses together can produce. The instrumentation throughout is simply splendid. The themes are interwoven, abruptly changed, passed about among the different instruments, brought up again in unexpected places in a manner which cannot fail to charm and delight on first hearing. There is one passage which the horns, oboe and fagatti trip off with in the most lively and humorous way, and which they persist in taking up again in spite of the remonstrance of the violins, until they are finally overpowered by the full orchestra. Even then, for a short time, the basses cannot bear to part with the air, and keep it up obstinately beneath the current of harmony till forced into something else. But it would be a long task to recount half the ideas and expressions developed in the course of the work, which can hardly be accorded too much praise. The horn players deserve particular credit for the ease with which they carried themselves through some very difficult passages, and the fagatti, too, did some most excellent work. Exactly in what manner Mr. Henschel erred or excelled in the production of this work ought not to be determined, perhaps, without greater familiarity with the work itself; but it is but fair to say that he appeared to carry it out with good discretion and judgment. He was indeed better contained and painstaking last night than he has been wont to be.

Three Hungarian dances, instrumented by Brahms, formed the closing feature of the concert. These brief movements were quaint and odd enough in all conscience, and seemed to please the audience greatly by their novelty.

To sum up, the concert altogether was excellent, the programme good, the effect pleasing, and the large audience went away for the most part highly satisfied with the inaugural entertainment of what everybody would like to predict a brilliant and useful series. The programme for the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon and the concert on Saturday evening next will be as follows:

Overture	(Rienzi).....	Wagner
Prayer
Symphony in C No. 1, op. 21.....	Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio—Andante cantabile con moto.
Menuetto. (Allegro molto e vivace.)—Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.
Chaconne et Rigodon—(Aline).....	Monsigny
Slumber Air (Masaniello).....	Auber
Overture
Soloist:
Mr. Charles R. Adams.

REVIEW OF RECENT CONCERTS.

THE musical season in Boston has begun much earlier than usual. This early beginning was chiefly due to the Boston Symphony Concerts which Mr. Henschel commenced October 7. The concerts have been different from those of last season in some respects. Although the nine Beethoven symphonies are to constitute, as before, the nucleus of the symphonic work, there is evidently an effort being made to lighten the programmes in consonance with popular tastes.

The introduction of French Rigaudons, of Auber's Masaniello overture, and of Gounod's Funeral March of a Marionette proves this.

Thus far, the chief novelty at the concerts has been the performance of Rubinstein's new Russian Symphony. The work is too odd in its flavor to charm at once. The themes have all that mournful vein which is characteristic of the northern nations. Rubinstein endeavors to overcome the consequent monotony of gloom by skilful contrapuntal treatment; but even this, masterly though it be, scarcely suffices to afford contrasts. The scherzo movement, however, has for its chief theme a melody evidently taken from Southern Russia, possibly from beyond the Caucasus, since in its style and treatment the effect of a Persian dance rhythm is produced. All through the work, the deepest instruments have heavy labors thrust upon them, the contra-basses becoming at times almost solo instruments. Mrs. Herald

SWEET SOUNDS.

The First of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Concerts.

The first of the 26 symphony concerts announced for the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, was given at Music Hall last evening under the direction of Mr. Georg Henschel, and with the assistance of Mr. Carl Baermann as pianist. The programme was as follows:

Overture, op. 124, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54, Schumann
Symphony in G minor, No. 5, op. 107, Rubinstein
Piano solos:
"Two Bagatelles," Beethoven
Rhapsodie, No. 8, Liszt
The Hungarian dances, Brahms

The entrance of Mr. Henschel was the signal for a perfect ovation in the shape of applause, and Mr. Baermann had an equally cordial greeting, the audience, which filled all seats not controlled by speculators, having the air of a sort of musical reunion, the faces seen at last season's concerts being everywhere observable, and the assembly having a very much "at home" appearance. The orchestra, numbering 69 players, has 12 first and 12 second violins, 8 each of violas and cellos, 9 double basses, 1 harp, 2 each of flutes, clarinets, oboes, bassoons and trumpets, a horn quartet, 3 trombones, and tuba and tympani. By the introduction of new men the organization has been materially improved over that of last year, and, in the performance of the programme of the evening, there was a degree of unity, spirit, care and artistic finish that promises much enjoyment for the patrons of these concerts during the season. The novelty of the programme, the Rubinstein symphony, proved to be a thoroughly pleasing work, full of melodious themes, skillfully arranged, richly orchestrated and admirably contrasted movements, making, as a whole, one of the most entertaining works presented during the last few seasons. It is said to have been written by Rubinstein as a tribute to the Grand Duchess Helene Pawlowna, one of his earliest patronesses. It has fair movements, moderate assai, allegro non troppo, moderato assai, tempo primo, andante and allegro vivace, the first being based upon the Russian folk songs, the second and fourth upon the national dances of Russia, and the third having a semi-religious character in its leading themes. The predominance of the minor key in all these national compositions gives the work an air of sadness, despite the brilliant gaiety of many of its measures. The first movement is rich in tuneful themes, put in the composer's happiest way, the selection and combination of the subjects giving a very unique and pleasing character to this part of the symphony. There is an air of festive gaiety in the second movement, and the originality shown in its instrumentation makes it the most pleasing of the four movements. In the third movement the leading theme, first taken by the horns, is a melodious bit of writing of a semi-religious character, which has a fascinating beauty, in contrast with the brilliant coloring of the preceding themes. The national dance called "Trepak" makes the one big theme of the last movement, and introduces a brilliant ending to the composition. In its playing in this part of the programme the orchestra showed the result of a skillful shaping of its members into a well-directed band, as there were notably few places where a further study appeared necessary. The concerto again displayed the marvellous ability of Mr. Baermann as pianist, and it is hardly necessary to further enlarge upon his success of his chosen instrument. His playing was rewarded with enthusiastic applause, which grew to a demonstration as he concluded his solo numbers. The overture was played in a masterly fashion, and the Brahms dances were rendered with splendid dash and spirited effect. Next to squaring the circle, the most difficult problem has heretofore been to place a pianoforte in a concert room so that it shall not obstruct the view of the orchestra, and be out of the way without causing a panic among its members. A small pianoforte platform has been built and put on castors, and this is shoved into position when needed.

MUSICAL. Parade

Boston Symphony Concert.

The first of the season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night in presence of a very fine audience. The orchestra was seated upon the same plan as that observed last season. There were many new faces among the players, and the absence of many faces with which we have long been pleasantly familiar at our classical concerts. The programme was rather dry, and was too much in a minor key. Schumann's piano concerto in A minor, and Rubinstein's symphony in G minor, together with a prevalence of minor in Brahms' Hungarian dances, gave a somewhat lugubrious and monotonous tone to the selections as a whole. The concert opened with Beethoven's "Dedication of the House" overture, by no means the most interesting of the master's works in this kind, and one which we feel almost wicked enough to assert should be permitted to enjoy a little well-earned repose. It was well and spiritedly played. Mr. Baermann followed with the Schumann concerto. He was received with the most hearty enthusiasm, and with every manifestation of sincere pleasure. His performance of this work was one of the finest we have ever listened to. There is no necessity to dwell upon the technical features of Mr. Baermann's rendering. It must be taken for granted that they were perfect to the highest degree of finish down to the minutest detail. The opening allegro was given with a wonderful depth of poetic feeling, a largeness of style, a broad, masterly intelligence, and with a refined delicacy of sentiment that brought out fresh beauties in the familiar work. The cadenza in the first allegro was a revelation in the strong and new color the artist gave it. He properly treated it purely and simply as a cadenza instead of a bit of mingled sentiment and mild virtuosity as it is usually interpreted, and the effect was as surprising as it was delightful. The andante was played with a grace and a tenderness that were exquisite. His reading of the finale, to say nothing of the amazing clearness, the precision, the brilliancy, and the clean-cut energy of the technique he brought to bear upon it, would alone stamp him as an artist of the highest quality of thought and power. Nothing more beautiful, more impressive, more truthful, or more musically in piano playing can be imagined or desired than this really great artist's interpretation of the concerto. At its conclusion he was applauded without stint, and with a genuine appreciation of the beauty of his achievement, for his manner was so unobtrusive, and the difficulties he had to deal with were overcome with so little of apparent effort that there was nothing to appeal to his hearers but his playing and its effect. He was recalled three times. Later in the evening he played two Bagatelles by Beethoven, which we do not remember to have heard before on the concert stage. They are simple and unpretentious compositions, not above the technical abilities of the average skilled amateur, but Mr. Baermann's touch, searching expressiveness of style and masterly intelligence interpreted these seeming trifles into works of rarest beauty. This was followed by Liszt's Rhapsody No. 8, which is rarely heard in public. In fact, we cannot recall that we have heard it here before. In this Mr. Baermann's marvellous technique had every opportunity for its fullest display, and the result was most exciting to his hearers, though the artist himself seemed calm enough, despite the bristling difficulties with which he was dealing. He was again recalled three times with the wildest furor. The Rubinstein symphony was heard here for the first time. It is a wild, almost savage, work in general, and by no means a pleasing one on the whole. The most vulgar commonplace and the most abstruse dryness are curiously mingled in it. There is much noise, much counterpoint, much groping after nothing in particular, and more confusion. It may possibly improve upon a closer acquaintance, but there is overmuch caterwauling in it that can never be pleasing. It taxed the virtuosity of the orchestra to the fullest extent. We believe that an equal amount of unpleasing noise could have been obtained without so great an expenditure of thought or as reckless a waste of learning. The orchestra acquitted itself excellently throughout the whole concert, save that it was here and there, somewhat too loud in the accompaniment of the concerto. At the next concert, the programme will consist of the Overture to "Rienzi" by Wagner, and a prayer from the same opera, Beethoven's Symphony, No. 1, a Chaconne and Rigodon, by Monsigny, and the "Slumber" air and Overture of "Masaniello." Mr. C. R. Adams will be the soloist.

MUSIC AND MUSICIANS.

Concise

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last night was nothing if not characteristic. National schools of composition jostled each other in constant profusion. The only serene numbers of the programme were the Dedication of the House, and two Bagatelles for piano, all by Beethoven. The latter were played with most delicate and artistic refinement by Professor Baermann; the former was played without either quality by the orchestra. From the entrance of the trumpet theme there was a want of clearness and a lack of balance apparent. The contrapuntal figures of the woodwind, against the above theme, was not distinct, and the violins lagged in subsequent portions of the work. The Schumann concerto for the piano, Op. 54, was performed with more precision on the part of the orchestra, and with great artistic power by Professor Baermann, whose cadenza was gloriously played, yet he reached his best effects in the final movement, the first portions not having the absolute balance which is generally characteristic of this great artist. In the broad and noble vein of the finale however, he burst forth with both technical and poetic power, causing the only furor of the evening, since even the applause which greeted Mr. Henschel on his appearance seemed carefully doled out by a calm, not to say cool, public.

The new symphony by Rubinstein is outré, bizarre, weird, and in short, deserves all the adjectives which would be applied to Russian, Cossack and Persian themes. A sombre Russian melody, like that sung by the sailors of the Volga, is its opening theme. Everything is gloomy or fierce in the first movement. Even a light and quaint countersubject introduced by the oboes almost instantly comes to a bad end in gloomy tremoli, and sudden, crashing dissonances. The deepest instruments are constantly evoked from the depths. The contra basses are for a long time made the leading partners in the musical firm, and at times have jerky and impatient phrases which surprise the most callous listener. It is easy to joke about some of these, yet even in the midst of the brusque effects came contrapuntal supports and instrumental colorings which dignify the strange proceedings. The second movement forcibly recalls the instrumental style of Bizet—in the Carillon of the Suite Arlesienne,—of Saint Saëns—in his Algerian music, and of Berlioz in the pastoral movement of the Sinfonie Fantastique. It is a Persian dance, rhythmic rather than melodic, strange rather than beautiful. The themes are far more harshly interwoven than similar effects in Rubinstein's Feramos.

He endeavors to leave the field of European music altogether, and import the Arabian flavor to the movement. Even in this movement, however, the contrabasses are called upon to give rapid solo passages. It must be said that, although there was scratchiness and blur in the first and last movement, this part was, on the whole, well sustained. In the andante movement the horn has a smooth and mournful theme which is finely wrought up with violin figures. This movement was not clearly played, and a few accidental dissonances were added to the already large number of intentional ones. The last movement—Allegro Vivace—was taken at a pace which caused many blurs and roughnesses. The themes were again to be found in the basement of the orchestra, but the development reached a height of fury which was more vehement than in the previous parts. The strings rasped, and the brasses roared, and the conductor gave violent tableaux vivants. Summing up the whole, we can say that the work is "characteristic," and bizarre from beginning to end; sometimes the composer seems to have been too fond of his themes and the second movement seems long for what it has to say; it is not a work which can be judged upon a single hearing, its vein being so far removed from the ordinary type; and it seems overambitious to give so trying a work at the very beginning of a season, with an orchestra whose players have not yet attained a perfect ensemble, since the step from the sublime to the ridiculous is easily taken in the execution of such gorgeous and unusual coloring. We hope that the work may be repeated later in the season, with more perfection of detail. Brahms' Hungarian Dances, three numbers, formed a dessert to this feast. Here there was more of "local color," and the audience went home seemingly happy in a concert which was so combined with geography. The next concert offers the following programme: Overture, Prayer (Rienzi), Wagner; Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21, Beethoven; Chaconne et Rigodon (Aline), Monsigny; Slumber Air, Overture (Masaniello), Auber. It will be preceded by the usual Friday afternoon public rehearsal, and Mr. Charles R. Adams will be the soloist.

...The speculators were the aggrieved ones on Saturday night at the symphony concert. The box office was all right despite the indications to the contrary presented in the unoccupied seats.

Herald

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FIRST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Like the first season of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, the second series was opened religiously in the Music Hall on Saturday evening with the strains of Beethoven's inspiring overture, "Dedication of the House." The concert began promptly on the minute of eight o'clock, at which time nearly the whole audience were in their seats, most of the late-comers adding their numbers to the assemblage after the completion of the overture. At that time the hall was just about as fully occupied as at the rehearsal on Friday, and the distribution of the audience was about the same. Mr. Henschel found his way to the conductor's stand without interruption, but as he was about to give the signal for beginning he was detained for a moment to acknowledge the compliment of a little round of applause. However varied may be the estimation placed on these concerts as artistic performances, few of their regular patrons could have avoided a feeling of peculiar satisfaction in contemplating the significance of this occasion—the strengthened promise of a permanent local orchestra devoted to the production of the highest class of works selected from the whole realm of standard music, for the edification of music-lovers of all classes, the poor as well as the rich. We would be loath to think that the pleasure of any one present was not enhanced rather than chastened by a sense of personal indebtedness to the generous patron of art who conceived and put into execution this beneficent scheme. It must be said, however, that the programme as a whole was not as happily adapted for such a cheerful occasion as might have been desired, nor, indeed, was it especially happy as considered independently of the occasion. Its prevailing cast was that of unrest, developing, in the symphony and the Hungarian dances, into positive dolefulness, and the only contrast of peace and hopefulness was afforded by the two brief Beethoven numbers. The performance of the overture was spirited even to the point of splendor, but lacked in places the proper balance of instruments and precision of time necessary to bring out the figured accompaniments of some of the themes with perfect definition. The masterpiece of Schumann's concertos (A minor, op. 54) received an interpretation which left almost nothing to be desired. It is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Carl Baermann's performance of the piano part was masterly, with all the word implies. To the utmost precision and finish of technique was joined the display of intelligence, energy and sensitiveness of feeling that makes this artist something more than an interpreter. As Wagner said of Liszt's playing, he seems to be producing rather than reproducing, so completely does the composer's personality seem to be embodied in the performer. His rendering of the cadenza of the opening movement and of the noble finale of the concerto, in particular, was a marvel of musi-clanly instinct put into concrete expression. The effect of his performance none could resist, and he was thrice called to acknowledge the unrestrained applause that his work evoked. The orchestral part of the concerto was admirably given. Orchestra and soloist seemed to play as one soul, with its various functions rarely out of equilibrium.

Rubinstein's "Russian" symphony in G minor (No. 5, op. 107), dedicated to the Grand Duchess Helene Pawlowna, was performed on this occasion for the first time here. It is one of the composer's most recent works, and its proper rank can be determined only after greater familiarity with it than the musical world as yet enjoys. On a first hearing it excites more curiosity than admiration, though there is much in it to be admired. It is based on themes taken apparently from Russian folk-songs and dances, but these are worked up with such gloomy and even forbidding effects of instrumentation that one might take it as a prophecy of direst woe to the composer's native land. Even the gayest of the dance themes, first pronounced by the merry wood wind, progress unrestrained but a few bars before they are lost in the wailing and groaning of the whole stringed band clashing in chromatic dissonances, only to reappear in fragments and distortions of their original character, and add to the gloom by their reminiscences of mirth. Parts of the first movement, indeed, vividly recall the realistic picture of the horrors of the nether world presented in the "Inferno" of Liszt's "Divine Comedy." But bizarre as many of these effects seem, they are based upon true principles of harmony and counterpoint, and the skill, learning and command of instrumental combination displayed by the composer are so constantly displayed that one's attention is held throughout almost as by a spell, though at the end he may remain still mystified as to what the upshot of the whole may be. The second movement, it should be said, has a sweetness and symmetry that forms a pleasant relief to the rest of the work, in spite of its prevailing sadness. It is founded on a soft, slumbrous song uttered by the horns, enriched by the wood wind, and worked out in true andante style, its accompaniment consisting largely of chromatic figures for the violins.

Mr. Baermann's solo selections were two "bagatelles" by Beethoven, and the rhapsody No. 8 of Liszt. Here again he displayed the highest qualities of a pianoforte player, and was again rewarded with a triple encore. Three Hungarian dances set to the orchestra by Brahms gave an entertaining close to the concert, in spite of their minor mood. One of them, indeed, was so intensely lugubrious as to produce an effect quite humorous.

For the next concert the following programme is announced:—

Overture and prayer ("Rienzi"), Wagner; symphony in C, No. 1, Beethoven; Chaconne et rigodon ("Aline"), Monsigny; slumber air and overture ("Masaniello"), Auber.—Soloist, Mr. Charles R. Adams.

Musical.

MR. APTHORP VERSUS MR. HENSCHEL.

The funniest reading of the week, all things considered, is to be found in the exception which Mr. Apthorp of the Transcript takes to Mr. Henschel's "new departure" in conducting. It seems doubly funny as emanating from Mr. Apthorp. It was our first impression that he was inconsistent. Our personal regard for him permitted us to hope that he was not an exception to the general rule that "great men change their minds; fools never do." The faith that we would have in the old saying actually wanes when we consider that Mr. Apthorp is invariably consistent. We are brought to a realization of its absurdity when it leads us to the suspicion that Mr. Henschel is after all a great man who can so superbly "change his mind," Mr. Apthorp's regrets to the contrary notwithstanding. October 24th, 1881, though to Mr. Henschel's misfortune, not prone to that man-worship of which Mr. H. L. Higginson is an invaluable exponent, Mr. Apthorp commended the popular conductor for his "drum-major flourish"; and now that Mr. Henschel has "changed his mind," has become one of the most quiet, conservative and reverent of conductors, thereby pleasing the Advertiser and Gazette, yet to offend the Transcript. Mr. Apthorp, to be sure, has the courage of his consistency. He expresses it in the most polite terms of rebuke, and verily our friend's reputation for politeness is so proverbial that it is a pleasure to treat him as if after the manner born.

It is not at all funny that an esteemed contemporary should be consistent; but it does seem queer that one of the most profound of critics should announce himself a votary of what he calls, though what we should hardly have dared to call, the "drum-major flourish." Mr. Apthorp says that "last year Mr. Henschel, so to speak, put the whole audience in his pocket with a far less praiseworthy performance" than he gave this year. Now it was the studious avoidance of the "drum-major flourish," as Mr. Apthorp substantially admits, that prevented Mr. Henschel from putting "the whole audience in his pocket with a far less praiseworthy performance," etc.; and yet, though the performance was unsatisfactory, Mr. Apthorp declares in the next few lines of his criticism that the very element which contributed to it, the "drum-major flourish," was "wholly admirable and effective to us; it really helped the music." For once redundancy is in order. Let us repeat that Mr. Apthorp advances as though it were remarkable logic, that an unworthy element in juxtaposition with the performance of classical music really helps such music. Of course he really means to say nothing of the kind. He has simply been led to an absurdity of statement in attempting to prove that splurge in conducting is creative of genuine musical feeling. Our only wonder is that in a defence having so shallow a basis Mr. Apthorp has not been even more absurd. As to principle, our own opinion humbly coincided with that of Mr. Henschel, this year, and not what he practically demonstrated six months ago, yet now repudiates. Mr. Henschel is progressive. The critic of the Transcript is simply consistent—see Transcript, Oct. 24, 1881—in advocating a standard which Mr. Henschel in his sincere devotion to music, not to mention the slightest deference to the criticisms of the Advertiser and Gazette has conspicuously renounced. The wisdom of Mr. Henschel is certainly that of a "great man." Whereas his genius in a certain line has always been acknowledged in these columns,—we have now reason to thank him with all our heart that he has practically, ay, generously, illustrated to our friend of the Transcript that he was wrong in commending and we were right in condemning his most objectionable though highly picturesque traits as chef d'orchestre.

The Gazette and Advertiser have treated Mr. Henschel very respectfully of late, and have said a number of very pleasant things about him, which it will be our pleasure to endorse; but according to the honest critic of the Transcript it is Mr. Henschel that has changed his mind; and it were indeed unkind of him, his critics not changing theirs, to place a too exact construction upon the old proverb and still call them "fools"; for it is the unchangeable elite of Boston who are the flesh and blood of wisdom, who even to a degree of man-worship are Mr. Henschel's warmest friends. On dit—and we must speak from the intelligent report in the Transcript of a concert that we did not hear—that Mr. Henschel has abandoned virtuosity in conducting. He has discovered, then, that self-abnegation to the will and intention of the composer is his prime duty at the head of an orchestra. Now it is the true artist who does this; it is the model conductor indeed who repudiates the "drum-major flourish." Mr. Henschel being a fine musician has at last discovered that it is the charlatan who uses art as a platform on which to stand in order to show his own eminence, in order to win the plaudits of the crowd. This "drum-major flourish," though it "captures the gods," is sure to spoil the artist; jugglery is respectable and ever artistic in comparison with it, for it makes no pretence to genuineness. The conducting or interpreting of classical music should be suggestive of naught but the real revelation, the personality of the interpreter being at a discount; and Mr. Henschel has undoubtedly found it quite impractical to present himself as a revelation to any audience. Thus may it be our pleasure at some future time to liken his interpretation of classical music to the highly polished mirror which reflects the very sunlight of genius itself where without its presence, alas, we should grope in total darkness. Mr. Apthorp should be the last to advocate different methods. Educational advantages and musicianship combined point to the abhorrence and not to the advocacy of the "drum-major flourish," as Mr. Apthorp is pleased to term it. Especially is this the case when the "flourish" would suggest an affinity between counterfeit and genuine elements, that from inhering causes will always be found in conflicting opposition to each other. We deny that Mr. Apthorp in discussing this "does not come within the pale of musical criticism." There is nothing more pertinent in connection with musical criticism that can be discussed now that the masses and the haute societe alike simply care to be amused by music, and are oftener rendered susceptible to the physical or external rather than the legitimate effects of an orchestral performance. We know not how it may have been that Apollo charmed the god of thunder; or that Arion coaxed the dolphin to carry him back to Cape Tenarus, or that David dissipated the frenzied illusions of Saul. We bend to the profound wisdom of our contemporary in all such matters, knowing that he would be the first to suggest an improvement upon the methods of fascinating by music that were known to the ancients.

44
On Saturday last, the 7th, the first concert of the second season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given, Georg Henschel being the conductor. The programme embraced Rubinstein's new symphony in G minor, performed at the last Philharmonic concerts here. During the season, Mr. Henschel will give symphonies by Brahms, Bruch, Dvorak and others, besides those of the old masters. Beethoven's nine symphonies are to be performed complete.

—Herr Baermann's performance of Schumann's A minor concerto at a Boston Symphony concert was notable for its refined, yet effective treatment. He was covered with applause at the close of his interpretation.

The series of Symphony concerts has begun. Saturday evening's program was listened to by a large, but not crowded, house. The selections were chiefly in the modern school, and the new Russian Symphony by Rubinstein was the piece de Resistance. The orchestra has not yet a perfect ensemble. It was rather audacious to commence the season with such an intricate work as this. Mr. Henschel seemed to fully understand its scope, but it was next to impossible for the orchestra to give the florid counter-point clearly. Strange instrumental coloring predominates in the work.

The deepest instruments are constantly employed in novel ways. The contrabassi, in the first and last movements have solo passages of great difficulty, the themes being at times brusque and jerky, becoming almost ludicrous in their character. But the work well exemplifies the French saying: "From the sublime to the ridiculous is but a step." Although some of its effects lie very near to the latter domain, the symphony is not the less sublime. Its contrasts are often very sharp and vivid; its counterpoint complex but masterly. Russian melodies furnish its subjects, but Russia is, in music, such a world in itself that many styles are possible. There is a vast difference between the melodies of St. Petersburg, of Moscow, of the Cossacks and of little Russia.

The second movement might be a Persian dance as far as its treatment of melody goes. It is purely rhythmic and has all the characteristics of the Eastern music as reduced to European notation by St. Saëns and others. It is natural, however, that gloom and harshness should be prevalent in a symphony founded upon semi-barbaric themes, and in the other three movements there is little that suggests joy or merry-making. With the exception of some rasping in the strings in the last movement, and a break of the horn and some blurs in the third, there were no glaring faults, although as before said, the ensemble was not generally good.

Prof. Baermann was the soloist of the concert. In Schumann's A minor concerto (Op. 54) he showed all the great qualities of which I have formerly spoken. The accompaniment of the orchestra was generally good, and the pianist, as ever, paid attention rather to a fine ensemble than to shining by virtuosity, and making his part too prominent. Two parts of the work, however, stood forth with amazing power and beauty—the Cadenza and the Finale. At the close, Prof. Baermann received the enthusiastic applause which has become customary whenever he appears.

His subsequent solos were excellently performed, and in two Bagatelles by Beethoven (seldom heard in the concert room), the delicacy of his touch was remarkable.

As if there had not been enough quaintness in the orchestral selections, the concert came to an end with more barbaric grief in the shape of Brahms's Hungarian Dances (three numbers), and these were played in a manner which gave to the whole proceedings the æsthetic sadness requisite to a well-conducted Boston musical occasion.

Musi & Drama

L. C. E.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

II. CONCERT.

1882

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 14TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. } (Rienzi.) WAGNER.
PRAYER. }

SYMPHONY in C. No. 1, op. 21. BEETHOVEN.

Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—Andante cantabile con moto.—

Menuetto. (Allegro molto e vivace).—Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.—

CHACONNE ET RIGODON. (Aline.) MONSIGNY.

SLUMBER AIR. } (Masaniello.) AUBER.
OVERTURE. }

SOLOIST:

MR. CHARLES R. ADAMS.

MUSICAL. Gazette

Boston Symphony Concert.

The second of this season's series of Boston Symphony concerts took place at Music Hall last night. The programme was curiously incongruous in its selections. Beethoven's lovely first symphony was sandwiched between Wagner's half-masterly, half-vulgar, and immensely noisy Rienzi overture, and Auber's thin, meretricious, hackneyed but brilliant overture to "Masaniello." The concert began and ended in noise. This, however, may have been intended in order to better display the more placid beauties of the symphony. The Wagner overture received an exceedingly broad, richly-colored and impressive interpretation, and at its end the applause was almost as noisy as the overture itself. It was followed by the prayer from the same opera, and the theme of which forms the second subject of the allegro of the overture. Mr. Adams, the soloist of the evening, who was in exceptionally good voice, sang it in a large and effective manner and with delightful smoothness and warmth of expression. The enthusiastic recall he received for it was as well deserved as it was fairly earned. The performance of the symphony was on the whole a great improvement upon the reading given by Mr. Henschel last season. The tempi were as a rule appropriate and in admirable taste and judgment. The first allegro was played and interpreted extremely well. The andante also obtained excellent treatment save for a trifle of coarseness in the strugs, a fault, by the way, into which this body stumbled frequently through the concert. The minuet had less justice done to it than fell to the lot of the other movements, and was not always clear. The finale opened charmingly, and was finely read until Mr. Henschel permitted his first violins to run away with him, and to increase their pace as the end approached. The responses between the wind instruments towards the climax were given out with uncommon clearness and precision, and in a clean cut and brilliant manner worthy the highest praise. A Chaconne and Rigodon by Monigny began the second part. They are in the style of Rameau, but are not of much value musically. They were spiritedly but noisily played. Mr. Adams followed with the "Slumber Song" from Masaniello. It was hardly suited to his voice or style, needing, as it does, a thin, light, French tenor to do it full justice; but Mr. Adams sang it with much tenderness, using the falsetto with great skill and judgment. Why the artist should have sung it in German, we cannot understand. His rendering of this selection won the greatest applause of the evening and three recalls for him. A brilliant performance of the Auber overture ended this light and not very interesting concert.

We must express our pleasure at the fact that Mr. Henschel has decidedly gained upon his conducting of last season, and our gratification to observe that he maintained the reserved and more artistic style of conducting which he inaugurated at the opening concert, and which has earned for him so much merited commendation. It is true that fault has been found with him in a certain quarter for this less demonstrative style of beating time, on the ground that it is not so exciting to the spectators, and that Mr. Henschel, by indulging in it, fails to put his audience in his pocket;—as if the baton were a billiard cue, whose only utility is to be found in pocketing the public. The necessity for exciting a musical audience by flourishing a baton, does not appear. If any excitement is derived at a musical performance, it should be through the music and its interpretation, and not through the conductor, who should remain as unobtrusive as possible, instead of making himself into a species of human cocktail to give stimulus to the appetite of his hearers. But some people enjoy witnessing a cock-fight, a rat-baiting, and other bolsterous amusements; and even find a certain pleasure in seeing a hapless dog flying down the street with an insulting tin-kettle tied to his terror-stricken tail, for the sake of the excitement such sights may afford. As we have no fancy for these things, we find it difficult to sympathize with the ecstasies of those who have.

It may, possibly, fill some keenly-musical souls with transports of sensuous gratification upon viewing a conductor swinging his baton as if he were timing a corps of street paviors in mending the roads; but those who go to listen to the music and who do not wish to be disturbed by callisthenics, no heed how gracefully or how excitingly they may be practised, will be amply contented with an artistic interpretation guided by a discreet and intelligent hand; and will be grateful if what they wish to hear is not marred by what they are obliged to see. For our own part, we find all the excitement we wish, and of the exact quality we desire, in listening to music pure and simple for its own sake; and can willingly spare a conductor the trouble of prodding us with a stick into excitement of another kind. But we have no desire to censure those who want their music with a stick in it. Tastes vary, and what is one man's meat is another man's poison. That one person likes this or that is cause enough for himself to indulge in it. When the little boy who was given to devouring slate pencils was asked why he did it, his answer was, "Because I like 'em." That was a good and sufficient reason for him, but it did not prove, despite his enjoyment of his gritty fare, that it was nourishing or healthy food.

We once heard of a music-lover who said he had an almost unappeasable craving to eat hot broiled bacon while listening to Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony. We never learned why he looked so longingly towards this extraordinary combination of delights; but no doubt it was upon some principle of requiring stimulants with his tone poems, analogous to that which has actuated the advocate of the "drum-major flourish" to complain of being obliged to take his Beethoven, Schumann and Rubinstein straight. But, we repeat, it is with genuine satisfaction that we commend and congratulate Mr. Henschel upon the judicious and artistic change he has made in his method of conducting. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Ossian," Gade; Concerto for Violin, G-minor, Bruch; Symphony C (7 Breitkopf), Haydn; Adagio for Violoncello, Bargiel; Overture, "Ruy Blas," Mendelssohn. The soloists are to be Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin, and Herr W. Mueller, violoncello.

MUSIC. Critic

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The concert of last evening somewhat resembled a tadpole, in that it had a solid head but a diminutive tail. From Wagner, through Beethoven, in his earliest stages, to Auber, was the route taken, and judging by the applause, the last stages of the journey pleased best. As regards the execution there was more equality noticeable, almost every part being of a high standard of excellence. The Rienzi overture, with its massive working up of two themes, the Prayer and March, was grandly given. Its opening portion was taken slower than usual, but this was rather a virtue than a fault. The sudden sporsando effects were given with precision, and, saving some faults in the brasses toward the very end, just before the chromatic passages, all was excellently interpreted. Following this, Mr. Charles R. Adams sang the Prayer from the same opera. Two more widely contrasted numbers than the Rienzi prayer, and the Slumber Song from Masaniello can scarcely be imagined, the one full of alternating pleading, agitation and grandeur, the other calm, soothing and tender; yet Mr. Adams gave both in such a manner that one is puzzled as to which deserved the highest praise. Never has the artist's voice been better displayed in Boston, not even in the memorable Be thou Faithful of two or three years ago. The dramatic force of the first number was superb, the upper register (often doubtful with Mr. Adams) secure, and the enunciation of the words far better than one usually hears on the American stage. In the Slumber Song, the semi-falsetto was appropriately and sweetly used, and in spite of the constantly recurring high notes, no break or huskiness was apparent. Only some brusque changes in the manner of emission of tone

PRAYER. (Rienzi.)

WAGNER.

Almighty Father, King of Kings,
Thou great Creator, Fount of love,
Whose heavenly bounty bliss e'er brings,
Oh hear my prayer from above!
In Thee, O Lord, I place my only hope,
Oh give me power with fate adverse to cope.

Thou, Lord, hast sent one here to save
From bonds and death the hapless slave!
Pray do not let Thy cause decline,
But make complete Thy work divine!
And may Thy grace our ills dispel,
Concord and happiness bestow!

Father who reignest with love o'er us all,
Thou Lord Eternal, Thou Great Supreme!
O God, Thy erring sons recall,
Oh hear me, this people now redeem!

SLUMBER AIR. (Masaniello.)

AUBER.

Soon balmy slumber thy moist eyelids closing,
I'll watch o'er thy sweet form gently reposing.
Sweet sleep, the sad heart healing,
With shadowy veil our cares concealing,
Sweet sleep, descend and shed thy blessings here,
Her sorrow soothe while there reposing,
Those eyelids gently closing,
Oh soothe her woes.
Oh, chase away the ling'ring, ling'ring tear.

occasionally showed that art was smoothing some spot which was naturally rough. The clearness and delicate shading of the scale at the words Glücklich sie schläft were artistic in the greatest degree, and the final diminuendo also was of the best. A double recall, and great enthusiasm greeted the singer's success. Beethoven's First Symphony needs no extended analysis. It is built in Haydn's formality, and one does not crave it often, spite of the beauty of its Andante and of the freshness of its minuet, a fether which Beethoven soon broke which advances beyond all the minuets with which Haydn had been adorning his numerous symphonies. The work was well played, notably in the last movement, where the violin figures were clear, and where even the odd scale progressions of the introduction were shaded so as to become interesting. Some of the old German conductors used to omit this passage as being "ridiculous." The minuet was the least perfect movement and was given with more force than clearness, the accelerando effects sometimes becoming a scramble. A Chaconne et Rigodon, by Monsigny, was a light trifle in the old French school of Rameau. It was well played, chiefly by the strings, although the usual musette dronings were well supplied by oboes. It was chiefly interesting from an historical aspect as representing a school of composition now past away. We should welcome some of the works of Gretry, Rameau, Lully, and the older French composers, while in this field, and believe that they would charm more than even the Watteau-like daintiness of Monsigny.

The next concert which will, of course, be preceded by the usual public rehearsal, Friday afternoon, offers a programme of much interest and beauty, with Messrs. Schmidt and Mueller in the violin and violoncello numbers. The list is as follows: Overture, (Ossian), Gade; Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; Symphony in C, Haydn; Adagio for violoncello, op. 38, Bargiel; Overture, (Ruy Blas), op. 95, Mendelssohn.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Interesting Fact About the Programme Produced.

A Large Audience to Enjoy the Fine Productions.

How the Pieces were Rendered and Received—The Coming Week.

The fact that the weather was a trifle damp last evening had no perceptible effect upon the size of the audience which assembled in Music Hall on the occasion of the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The hall was quite full. There were but few empty seats in the body of the house, and many people were forced to stand throughout.

The programme selected for last evening was as different in character and scope from that of the opening concert as it could well be. With the exception of the cheerful allegro of the Beethoven overture and a few scattered episodes of gaiety or humor in the other numbers throughout the evening of the former concert, the grave and the sombre were everywhere present. It was an occasion for seriousness and reflection, not one for merely superficial enjoyment. But it would be difficult to point to a number of last night's programme tinged with anything very dark or weighted with anything very deep. From the loud and stormy "Rienzi" overture, through the youthful and Haydnish symphony of Monsigny, to the bright and striking prelude to Auber's "Masaniello" is a journey, figuratively speaking, across a greatly variegated musical landscape, but one on which there is, nevertheless, nothing but sunshine. It was certainly not calculated to call up disagreeable reminiscences and sent the great audience away happy. The programme was not, however, void of interest historically, and inasmuch as no attempt is made to make that document a descriptive one for these occasions, it may not be out of place to bring together here some of the widely separated and somewhat neglected facts which serve to make it interesting to those who read between the lines. In the first place, the overture and prayer from which stood first upon the programme, as extracts from the first work in his chosen field of a man who has since, to say the least of him, forced himself upon the attention of the whole musical world by his bold innovations and his strong individuality, claims our consideration. It will not do to look in this work for those characteristics which we have come to consider peculiarly Wagnerian. Amid much that is commonplace, and not a little that is absolutely bad, we distinguish here and there a passage of great promise. Wagner himself has told us that his sole object in writing this opera was to astonish and please, to produce something which should surpass in brilliant effects all that had been written before it. With this confession in mind the working up of the overture is easily intelligible. The melodious "prayer" sung by Mr. Adams last evening is one of the oases, so to speak, of the opera. Of course, this work, as a whole, is now ignored by Wagner and his school, though the fact that the composer himself still looks with an affectionate eye upon the first fruit of his enthusiastic youth is to be inferred from the presence of selections from it upon the programmes of some of his later concerts. "Rienzi" was finished in November, 1840, when Wagner was 27 years old. The first performance took place in October two years later at the Dresden Theatre, and its great success was the cause of the composer's engagement as conductor of the Royal Opera in that city. When we consider how greatly the then unknown composer stood in need of some lucrative employment we may understand how much the success of this work meant to Wagner. The production has held the stage ever since, and is the only work of Wagner's which has met with any favor in Paris. The overture has been variously estimated. It may be said to lack coherence and unity and to be somewhat faulty in construction here and there; but the gloomy and troublous times of the Roman tragedy which is to follow are in it clearly foreshadowed. This overture was given here last year by the Philharmonic Orchestra.

Wagner's "Rienzi,"

Last Night's Performance

was most excellent. With a few trifling exceptions there was no fault to be found with the work of the orchestra, and Mr. Henschel's conducting was in good taste. An unusually hearty salvo of applause followed the performance. Mr. Adams' singing of the prayer was excellent. He was greeted with a reception of moderate warmth. It was at once discovered that he was in excellent voice, and his superb rendition of the trying Wagnerian passages was enthusiastically noted by the audience. He was recalled once.

The next number on the programme was Beethoven's first symphony. Of all his more ambitious works, Beethoven's first symphony is the most interesting and at the same time the least interesting. If we examine it as a work of art simply it might well be placed in the latter category. On the other hand, if we examine it to discover what place it occupies in the history of the symphony and in what relation it stands to the development of Beethoven's genius it surely belongs to the first. It was written during the last year of the eighteenth century, when Beethoven was in his thirtieth year. As early as the beginning of 1795, however, we can discover traces of this work, or of another in the same key, which is an evidence that the master bestowed much thought upon it, probably quite as much as he afterwards gave to the colossal third or the fifth symphonies. The difference between the first and third symphonies is the difference, incredible as it seems, of just five years in the composer's life. The first, in 1799, was an expression of no very striking thoughts in somebody else's language. The third in 1804 was a masterpiece. It is hardly necessary to say that the first work of the master in that branch of his art in which he was destined to surpass everybody is so modelled upon and so imbued with the spirit of the Haydn symphony that much of it would by a good critic who did not know who wrote it be attributed to nobody else. The finale is a notable incidence of this open spirit of imitation. Such of the symphony as does not remind us of Haydn recalls the style of Mozart. There is but one passage of any length in the whole work which Haydn or Mozart could hardly have equalled, certainly could not have surpassed, and that is the scherzo. This was Beethoven's first individual expression in the symphony. The occasion on which this symphony was produced in public is of considerable interest to us now. It was at the first concert which Beethoven got up for his own benefit, and occurred on the evening of October 2, 1800, at the Bury Theatre, Vienna. The programme was: 1, symphony, Mozart; 2, air from the "Creation"; 3, a grand pianoforte concerto, played and composed by Beethoven; 4, Beethoven's septet; 5, a duet from the "Creation"; 6, improvisations by Beethoven on Haydn's "Emperor's Hymn"; 7, symphony No. 1, Beethoven. As for the production last evening, too much praise can hardly be accorded to the manner in which the orchestra acquitted itself. Every detail was carefully attended to.

Scarcely a Shading,

however delicate, to be found in the score was neglected. To be sure the work does not present any very terrifying difficulties, but it is none the less a satisfaction to listen to a composition so finely rendered. There might, however, be some exceptions taken to Mr. Henschel's tempi. He certainly made the andante of the second movement mean something less than it is usually supposed to signify. The whole effect was much more than that of an allegretto; but the sweet and pretty air seemed only to gain an additional charm from this fact. The allegro matter of the minuetto was also taken quite as fast as allowable, but not so much so that some of the notes could not be played without blurring. Taken altogether, the performance was a most enjoyable one. Mr. Henschel conducted, as usual, with but an occasional reference to his score, a fact which certainly gives him a remarkable advantage in controlling his orchestra.

The slumber air from the fourth act of Auber's "Masaniello" and the overture to the same formed the closing number of the programme last night. "La Muette de Portici" was written in 1828, and made the composer's fame throughout Europe. In it Auber surpassed himself, and for once raised himself above the limitations of his pretty French airs and merely charming conceptions into something nobler and grander. For once and for once only. Before and after his measures flamed on, ever elegant, graceful and melodious, but never approaching grandeur. In fact "La Muette" appears to have been written under strong revolutionary excitement, and is historically connected with the troublous times which followed its composition. Notwithstanding this, at the production of this work, and at its subsequent performance, Auber himself was not present. Incredible as it seems, there is the best of authority for asserting that this odd genius never attended a performance of his own works. Even Wagner has borne testimony to the bold effects of the instrumentation and the grandeur of the choral effects of this opera. In fact it was a work strongly calculated to arouse the passionate and heroic feelings of the people. It is well known the riots in Brussels, which eventually drove the Dutch out of the country, began after a performance of "La Muette," August 25, 1830.

There could be but one opinion about the excellent manner in which Mr. Adams gave the beautiful "slumber air" last evening, and the great audience applauded him to the echo. He was recalled twice. Mr. Henschel, however, did not acquit himself with equal credit. He hurried the concluding allegro in an unnecessary degree—so much so that it was absolutely impossible for the orchestra to get in all the notes. The overture went off with a superficial zest, however, which was exceedingly stirring, and a round of applause followed. The programme for next week is as follows:

Overture (Ossian).....Gade
Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Prelude (Allegro moderato) adagio—Finale
(Allegro energico).....Haydn
Symphony in C.....Haydn
(No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition).
Adagio; vivace—Adagio ma non troppo.
Menuetto (Allegretto)—Finale (Presto assai).
Adagio for violoncello, op. 38.....Bargiel
Overture (Ruy Blas), op. 95.....Mendelssohn
Soloists—Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Herr Wilhelm Mueller, violoncello.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Second of the Programmes of the Season.

The second programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert at Music Hall was presented last evening, the several numbers being as follows:

Overture, Prayer, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....Beethoven
Chaconne et Rigodon, "Aline".....Monsigny
Slumber Air, overture, "Masaniello".....Auber

The arranging of such a programme was an artistic success, for, though brief, it included a charming variety of selections arranged with admirable taste. Its performance, with the assistance of Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor soloist, was in keeping with its attractive features, and the audience was enthusiastic and quickly appreciated all the excellent work done. The Wagner overture was played with splendid dash and vigor, and thoroughly aroused the audience to the ability of the band assembled for the season by Mr. Henschel. The reading given the symphony brought out its melodious beauties with pleasing effect, and showed a thorough comprehension of the work on the part of the conductor. The Monsigny selections, full of the quaint melodic themes of this class of compositions, afforded a striking contrast with the symphony of the evening, and proved a very enjoyable novelty. The old popular Auber overture, without which no theatrical orchestra's library is complete, was given a brilliant performance, and, though a somewhat excessive energy was displayed in the work of the percussion instruments, the general effect was such as to give a bright ending to the programme. Mr. Adams' voice was at its best, and the great triumph won by this artist in his "Lohengrin" selections in last season's programme was more than equalled on this occasion. The prayer from "Rienzi" was a masterly effort, the delivery showing the great ability of the singer in dramatic reading, as well as the beauty of his method and the correctness of his phrasing. There was, however, in his rendering of "Slumber Air" an exquisite tenderness, which quite surpassed the artist's earlier effort, and at its close the hall fairly rang with the enthusiastic applause of the delighted audience, which did not cease until Mr. Adams had twice returned to the stage to bow his recognition of the honors paid him.

occasionally showed that art was smoothing some spot which was naturally rough. The clearness and delicate shading of the scale at the words Glücklich sie schläft were artistic in the greatest degree, and the final diminuendo also was of the best. A double recall, and great enthusiasm greeted the singer's success. Beethoven's First Symphony needs no extended analysis. It is built in Haydn's formality, and one does not crave it often, spite of the beauty of its Andante and of the freshness of its minuet, a fetter which Beethoven soon broke which advances beyond all the minuets with which Haydn had been adorning his numerous symphonies. The work was well played, notably in the last movement, where the violin figures were clear, and where even the odd scale progressions of the introduction were shaded so as to become interesting. Some of the old German conductors used to omit this passage as being "ridiculous." The minuet was the least perfect movement and was given with more force than clearness, the accelerando effects sometimes becoming a scramble. A Chaconne et Rigodon, by Monsigny, was a light trifle in the old French school of Rameau. It was well played, chiefly by the strings, although the usual musette dronings were well supplied by oboes. It was chiefly interesting from an historical aspect as representing a school of composition now past away. We should welcome some of the works of Gretry, Rameau, Lully, and the older French composers, while in this field, and believe that they would charm more than even the Watteau-like daintiness of Monsigny.

The next concert which will, of course, be preceded by the usual public rehearsal, Friday afternoon, offers a programme of much interest and beauty, with Messrs. Schmidt and Mueller in the violin and violoncello numbers. The list is as follows: Overture, (Ossian), Gade; Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; Symphony in C, Haydn; Adagio for violoncello, op. 38, Bargiel; Overture, (Ruy Blas), op. 95, Mendelssohn.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

Stoke
Interesting Fact About the Programme Produced.

A Large Audience to Enjoy the Fine Productions.

How the Pieces were Rendered and Received—The Coming Week.

The fact that the weather was a trifle damp last evening had no perceptible effect upon the size of the audience which assembled in Music Hall on the occasion of the second concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The hall was quite full. There were but few empty seats in the body of the house, and many people were forced to stand throughout.

The programme selected for last evening was as different in character and scope from that of the opening concert as it could well be. With the exception of the cheerful allegro of the Beethoven overture and a few scattered episodes of gaiety or humor in the other numbers throughout the evening of the former concert, the grave and the sombre were everywhere present. It was an occasion for seriousness and reflection, not one for merely superficial enjoyment. But it would be difficult to point to a number of last night's programme tinged with anything very dark or weighted with anything very deep. From the loud and stormy "Rienzi" overture, through the youthful and Haydnish symphony of Beethoven and the pretty dance music of Monsigny, to the bright and striking prelude to Auber's "Masaniello" is a journey, figuratively speaking, across a greatly variegated musical landscape, but one on which there is, nevertheless, nothing but sunshine. It was certainly not calculated to call up disagreeable reminiscences and sent the great audience away happy. The programme was not, however, void of interest historically, and inasmuch as no attempt is made to make that document a descriptive one for these occasions, it may not be out of place to bring together here some of the widely separated and somewhat neglected facts which serve to make it interesting to those who read between the lines. In the first place, the overture and prayer from which stood first upon the programme, as extracts from the first work in his chosen field of a man who has since, to say the least of him, forced himself upon the attention of the whole musical world by his bold innovations and his strong individuality, claims our consideration. It will not do to look in this work for those characteristics which we have come to consider peculiarly Wagnerian. Amid much that is commonplace, and not a little that is absolutely bad, we distinguish here and there a passage of great promise. Wagner himself has told us that his sole object in writing this opera was to astonish and please, to produce something which should surpass in brilliant effects all that had been written before it. With this confession in mind the working up of the overture is easily intelligible. The melodious "prayer" sung by Mr. Adams last evening is one of the oases, so to speak, of the opera. Of course, this work, as a whole, is now ignored by Wagner and his school, though the fact that the composer himself still looks with an affectionate eye upon the first fruit of his enthusiastic youth is to be inferred from the presence of selections from it upon the programmes of some of his later concerts. "Rienzi" was finished in November, 1840, when Wagner was 27 years old. The first performance took place in October two years later at the Dresden Theatre, and its great success was the cause of the composer's engagement as conductor of the Royal Opera in that city. When we consider how greatly the then unknown composer stood in need of some lucrative employment we may understand how much the success of this work meant to Wagner. The production has held the stage ever since, and is the only work of Wagner's which has met with any favor in Paris. The overture has been variously estimated. It may be said to lack coherence and unity and to be somewhat faulty in construction here and there; but the gloomy and troublous times of the Roman tragedy which is to follow are in it clearly foreshadowed. This overture was given here last year by the Philharmonic Orchestra.

Wagner's "Rienzi,"

Last Night's Performance

was most excellent. With a few trifling exceptions there was no fault to be found with the work of the orchestra, and Mr. Henschel's conducting was in good taste. An unusually hearty salvo of applause followed the performance. Mr. Adams' singing of the prayer was excellent. He was greeted with a reception of moderate warmth. It was at once discovered that he was in excellent voice, and his superb rendition of the trying Wagnerian passages was enthusiastically noted by the audience. He was recalled once.

The next number on the programme was Beethoven's first symphony. Of all his more ambitious works, Beethoven's first symphony is the most interesting and at the same time the least interesting. If we examine it as a work of art simply it might well be placed in the latter category. On the other hand, if we examine it to discover what place it occupies in the history of the symphony and in what relation it stands to the development of Beethoven's genius it surely belongs to the first. It was written during the last year of the eighteenth century, when Beethoven was in his thirtieth year. As early as the beginning of 1795, however, we can discover traces of this work, or of another in the same key, which is an evidence that the master bestowed much thought upon it, probably quite as much as he afterwards gave to the colossal third or the fifth symphonies. The difference between the first and third symphonies is the difference, incredible as it seems, of just five years in the composer's life. The first, in 1799, was an expression of no very striking thoughts in somebody else's language. The third in 1804 was a masterpiece. It is hardly necessary to say that the first work of the master in that branch of his art in which he was destined to surpass everybody is so modelled upon and so imbued with the spirit of the Haydn symphony that much of it would by a good critic who did not know who wrote it be attributed to nobody else. The finale is a notable incidence of this open spirit of imitation. Such of the symphony as does not remind us of Haydn recalls the style of Mozart. There is but one passage of any length in the whole work which Haydn or Mozart could hardly have equalled, certainly could not have surpassed, and that is the scherzo. This was Beethoven's first individual expression in the symphony. The occasion on which this symphony was produced in public is of considerable interest to us now. It was at the first concert which Beethoven got up for his own benefit, and occurred on the evening of October 2, 1800, at the Bury Theatre, Vienna. The programme was: 1, symphony, Mozart; 2, air from the "Creation"; 3, a grand pianoforte concerto, played and composed by Beethoven; 4, Beethoven's septet; 5, a duet from the "Creation"; 6, improvisations by Beethoven on Haydn's "Emperor's Hymn"; 7, symphony No. 1, Beethoven.

As for the production last evening, too much praise can hardly be accorded to the manner in which the orchestra acquitted itself. Every detail was carefully attended to.

Scarcely a Shading.

however delicate, to be found in the score was neglected. To be sure the work does not present any very terrifying difficulties, but it is none the less a satisfaction to listen to a composition so finely rendered. There might, however, be some exceptions taken to Mr. Henschel's tempi. He certainly made the andante of the second movement mean something less than it is usually supposed to signify. The whole effect was much more than that of an allegretto; but the sweet and pretty air seemed only to gain an additional charm from this fact. The allegro matter of the menuetto was also taken quite as fast as allowable, but not so much so that some of the notes could not be played without blurring. Taken altogether, the performance was a most enjoyable one. Mr. Henschel conducted, as usual, with but an occasional reference to his score, a fact which certainly gives him a remarkable advantage in controlling his orchestra.

The slumber air from the fourth act of Auber's "Masaniello" and the overture to the same formed the closing number of the programme last night. "La Muette de Portici" was written in 1828, and made the composer's fame throughout Europe. In it Auber surpassed himself, and for once raised himself above the limitations of his pretty French airs and merely charming conceptions into something nobler and grander. For once and for once only. Before and after his measures flamed on, ever elegant, graceful and melodious, but never approaching grandeur. In fact "La Muette" appears to have been written under strong revolutionary excitement, and is historically connected with the troublous times which followed its composition. Notwithstanding this, at the production of this work, and at its subsequent performance, Auber himself was not present. Incredible as it seems, there is the best of authority for asserting that this odd genius never attended a performance of his own works. Even Wagner has borne testimony to the bold effects of the instrumentation and the grandeur of the choral effects of this opera. In fact it was a work strongly calculated to arouse the passionate and heroic feelings of the people. It is well known the riots in Brussels, which eventually drove the Dutch out of the country, began after a performance of "La Muette," August 25, 1830.

There could be but one opinion about the excellent manner in which Mr. Adams gave the beautiful "slumber air" last evening, and the great audience applauded him to the echo. He was recalled twice. Mr. Henschel, however, did not acquit himself with equal credit. He hurried the concluding allegro in an unnecessary degree—so much so that it was absolutely impossible for the orchestra to get in all the notes. The overture went off with a superficial zest, however, which was exceedingly stirring, and a round of applause followed. The programme for next week is as follows:

Overture (Ossian).....Gade
Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Prelude (Allegro moderato) adagio—Finale
(Allegro energico).

Symphony in C.....Haydn
(No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition).
Adagio; vivace—Adagio ma non troppo.
Menuetto (Allegretto)—Finale (Presto assai).
Adagio for violoncello, op. 38.....Bargiel
Overture (Ruy Blas), op. 95.....Mendelssohn
Soloists—Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., violin; Herr Wilhelm Mueller, violoncello.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Harold
The Second of the Programmes of the Season.

The second programme of the Boston Symphony orchestra's concert at Music Hall was presented last evening, the several numbers being as follows:

Overture, Prayer, "Rienzi".....Wagner
Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....Beethoven
Chaconne et Rigodon, "Aïné".....Monsigny
Slumber Air, overture, "Masaniello".....Auber

The arranging of such a programme was an artistic success, for, though brief, it included a charming variety of selections arranged with admirable taste. Its performance, with the assistance of Mr. Charles R. Adams, tenor soloist, was in keeping with its attractive features, and the audience was enthusiastic and quickly appreciated all the excellent work done. The Wagner overture was played with splendid dash and vigor, and thoroughly aroused the audience to the ability of the band assembled for the season by Mr. Henschel. The reading given the symphony brought out its melodious beauties with pleasing effect, and showed a thorough comprehension of the work on the part of the conductor. The Monsigny selections, full of the quaint melodic themes of this class of compositions, afforded a striking contrast with the symphony of the evening, and proved a very enjoyable novelty. The old popular Auber overture, without which no theatrical orchestra's library is complete, was given a brilliant performance, and, though a somewhat excessive energy was displayed in the work of the percussion instruments, the general effect was such as to give a bright ending to the programme. Mr. Adams' voice was at its best, and the great triumph won by this artist in his "Lohengrin" selections in last season's programme was more than equalled on this occasion. The prayer from "Rienzi" was a masterly effort, the delivery showing the great ability of the singer in dramatic reading, as well as the beauty of his method and the correctness of his phrasing. There was, however, in his rendering of "Slumber Air" an exquisite tenderness, which quite surpassed the artist's earlier effort, and at its close the hall fairly rang with the enthusiastic applause of the delighted audience, which did not cease until Mr. Adams had twice returned to the stage to bow his recognition of the honors paid him.

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

The second of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening before an audience that completely filled the galleries and the majority of the seats below. There were, however, many empty chairs, and, as at the first concert, most of these were among the most desirable in the house, from which fact it is not unreasonable to suppose that many of them are in the hands of speculators, who have been unable to unload them at a profit upon a music-loving and generally liberal public. There may be some persons malevolent enough to wish that those who have attempted to make money, by controlling a large portion of the seats at concerts which are in one sense a private enterprise, may find themselves possessed, at the end of the season, with all the tickets they had bought. Saturday night's performance was made up, in pretty equal measure, of the important and the trivial. Wagner's grand overture to Rienzi, which opened the concert, is never belittled by anything that may be played with it, and Beethoven's first symphony, although not so interesting as most of his others, and showing imitative rather than original power, is of much value in illustrating the history of symphonic writing, as well as possessing a refined and wholesome charm which is never absent from the compositions of the master. A Chaconne et Rigodon, by Monsigny, and Auber's overture to "Masaniello" completed the orchestral part of the programme, and, it is probable, sent many music-lovers away from the concert with a feeling as if they had been trifled with. The orchestral work of the evening was in general very good, although in the concluding overture the players upon the percussion instruments seemed to make a greater display of their undoubted muscular power than was absolutely necessary, and the brasses in the latter part of the overture to "Rienzi" were not always as clear in enunciation as they should have been. The work of the strings during the evening was exceedingly good, although the minuet in the symphony was not at times altogether clear, and some confusion was noticed in the selection of Monsigny. Mr. Charles R. Adams was the soloist and sang at his best, which, as all know, is very well indeed. The prayer from "Rienzi" and the "Slumber Song" from "Masaniello" were his selections, and represented nearly the two poles of vocal effort—the one being passionate and of heroic motion, the other calm, sweet and sensuous—but he sang them both beautifully, especially the former, showing not only skill and rich intonation, but also a feeling and sentiment that are rare upon the concert or operatic stage. The programme for next Saturday evening will be as follows: Overture (Ossian), Gade; Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; Symphony in C, Haydn; Adagio for violoncello, op. 38, Bargiel; Overture (Ruy Blas), op. 95, Mendelssohn. Mr. Louis Schmidt, violin, and Herr W. Mueller, violoncello, are to be the soloists.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the second concert last Saturday evening was—

Overture	("Rienzi").....	Wagner
Prayer	Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....	Beethoven
	Chaconne et Rigodon . ("Aline").....	Monsigny
Slumber Air	("Masaniello").....	Auber
Overture

Mr. Charles R. Adams was the singer.

Rather an ill-balanced programme, upon the whole. Indeed, it were hard to imagine a list of fine music to which one would like to have the "Rienzi" overture served up as an introduction. One may even doubt whether at any time it is well worth while to listen to the wholly grand, dramatic and impressive opening movement of this overture, when such indulgence entails the swift punishment of enduring the coarse triviality and tinsel glitter of the ensuing allegro. Yet we must say that the performance of this objectionable allegro on Saturday evening was the first one we have ever heard that showed the movement in question to have some redeeming features. Mr. Henschel did his best to save it from absolute vulgarity by a well chosen tempo; as it is usually played, one is always a little disappointed at not seeing a short-skirted damsel bound into the hall on tip-toe on a piebald horse after the last chord, the music being a more fitting heralding of such a performance than of any other that can be imagined. The really grand opening movement was extremely well played, the wind instruments making the due diminuendo at the close of each phrase of the prayer—the violins, however (strange to say), paying no attention to their "p-cresc" at such points, but playing their ascending accompanying figure in an even forte which was by no means effective. We believe that the great prayer from the fifth act of the opera has not been sung here before. In spite of its main theme being also that of the first part of the overture, and so standing as a musical bond of relationship between the two numbers, we cannot but think that the prayer itself suffers greatly by being heard directly after the overture. In the opera, standing, as it does, at the beginning of the fifth act, after the tragic and terrible incidents of the third and fourth acts, this prayer comes as a grateful ray of hope; but immediately after the noisy boisterousness of the overture it sounds dull and heavy. Mr. Adams sang it superbly, with dignity, fervor and impressiveness.

In the delightful Beethoven symphony the orchestra was neither at its worst nor at its best, playing with life and spirit, but with little delicacy or finish of style. The tempi struck us as excellent, albeit in the last movement the leading theme was taken a thought more deliberately at its first appearance than it was afterwards. The pair of dances by Monsigny were wholly charming.

Mr. Adams's singing of the thrice-beautiful Slumber Air from "Masaniello" was an event. Such singing should not be spoken of in prose; it should be sung in verse, and our pen is wholly prosaic. The overture made a bright and pleasant close to the concert. Although not a work so constantly bearing the stamp of genius as the overture to "Fra Diavolo" and one or two others of Auber's lighter things, it has many fine points and a pervading brilliancy of style which commend it to the music lover.

The solo players at the next concert will be Mr. Louis Schmidt, violin, and Mr. Wilhelm Müller, violoncello. The programme will be as follows: Overture ("Ossian"), Gade; concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; symphony in C (No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition), Haydn; adagio for violoncello, op. 38, Bargiel; overture ("Ruy Blas"), Mendelssohn.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall took place last Saturday evening in the presence of an audience which filled all the seats in every part of the house except several of the most desirable ones on the floor. It is believed that these latter seats are in the hands of ticket speculators, as they have all been sold by the management. If so it is probable that after a while they will be found again on sale at the box office, rather than be lost entirely to former purchasers. It will then be possible, perhaps, to obtain good seats for an evening concert at moderate prices, which cannot now be accomplished. The following programme was exceptionally well performed Saturday evening, both by the orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction, and the soloist, Mr. Charles R. Adams: Overture, Prayer, (Rienzi), Wagner, Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21, Beethoven; Chaconne et Rigodon, (Aline), Monsigny; Slumber Air, Overture, (Masaniello), Auber. Mr. Adams was in excellent voice and rendered the prayer from "Rienzi" with much fervor and the slumber song from Masaniello very tenderly. The programme for next Saturday night is as follows: Overture, (Ossian), Gade; Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; Symphony in C, Haydn; Adagio for violoncello, op. 38, Bargiel; Overture, (Ruy Blas), op. 95, Mendelssohn. Mr. Louis Schmidt, violin, and Herr W. Mueller, violoncello, are to be the soloists. Franklin

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

If the programme of the first concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was sombre almost to the point of heaviness, that of the second, performed on Saturday evening, while by no means pandering to a flippant taste, was bright and entertaining enough to suit any lover of the exhilarating in music. Certainly the element of heaviness was successfully avoided, and were this programme to be made a standard for the whole series, it would be open to the charge of being hardly as substantial as one has a right to expect for concerts of such pretensions as these. But, for variety's sake, such a programme is very acceptable now and then. The most intellectual selection was Beethoven's symphony in C, No. 1, whose classic measures stood forth in new dignity by contrast with the strong color effects of Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, the catching melodies and rhythm of the chaconne and rigodon from Monsigny's opera, "Aline," and the noisy brilliancy of Auber's "Masaniello" overture, which formed its instrumental setting. The character of the orchestral playing at this concert was such as to offer little temptation to criticism. The Wagner overture was grandly given. Taken and firmly held at a moderate tempo, well suited to the stately character of its themes and their treatment, its contrasts of light and shade were brought out with admirable precision of attack, nice gradations of force and balance of instruments, and it was played with splendid life and vigor. Nothing could be finer than the manner in which the sustained note from the cornet at the opening was managed, and again on its recurrence, the sound literally growing out of the silence and melting away into it as insensibly as a cloud dissolves into the azure of the sky; and the perfect unanimity with which the violins interrupted the call, at the appointed places, with a rapid tremolo, was equally praiseworthy. The performance was greeted with a burst of enthusiasm of undoubted genuineness and so protracted as to amount to an encore, in recognition of which Mr. Henschel bowed his acknowledgments.

Mr. Henschel's reading of the symphony was as judicious and as free from innovations as any save the most rigid stickler for the traditions could ask. The influence of the conductor's personality, indeed, was almost constantly felt, but it was the personality of an intelligent interpreter well charged with the composer's spirit. The delightful clearness which marked the performance of the work, as a whole, notably in the sensitive attention given to the expressive nuances, which are of such importance in all of Beethoven's writings, was a manifest result not only of the orchestra's efficiency, but also, in a very large sense, of the conductor's close leadings. The tempi were, as a rule, pretty strictly maintained, but occasionally, as for instance in the two crescendo movements, the conductor showed a trace of the tendency, so often noted last season, to undue acceleration of pace, apparently under influence of excitement, in consequence of which the effects were at times blurred. The dances by Monsigny are dainty little pieces, full of melody, very simply but effectively scored. They are interesting specimens of the now antique school of Lully and Rameau, and on their own merits are as well worthy of occasional introduction into the programme of a classical concert as much of the ballet and "Hungarian dance" music that so often finds a place there. Auber's overture, in spite of its theatrical haver and noise, is brilliant and tuneful enough to warrant occasional revival, for though hackneyed to the older concert-goers, has become by disuse practically a novelty to the rising generation. Both these last-mentioned numbers were played by Mr. Henschel's orchestra for all they were worth.

But to most present the most delightful feature of the concert was the vocal part, contributed by Mr. Charles R. Adams, who followed the "Rienzi" overture with the beautiful prayer-aria from that opera, and preceded the overture to "Masaniello" with the slumber air from that work. Mr. Adams has never appeared with greater advantage before a Boston audience. Both selections were given with faultless taste and with a depth of feeling and largeness of style that are beyond all praise. His voice is of somewhat too robust a mould to give the finest expression to the soft strains of the serenade, but it was modulated with fine skill to adapt it to this tender office, and came with great sweetness and tenderness of effect, even in the falsetto notes, which one would imagine a voice of this timbre would find it difficult to manage. After both of the selections Mr. Adams was very heartily recalled, and after the slumber song he was recalled twice.

The soloists of the next concert will be Mr. Louis Schmidt, violin, and Herr Wilhelm Mueller, violoncello. The programme will be as follows:—Overture ("Ossian"), Gade; concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; symphony in C (No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition), Haydn; adagio for violoncello, op. 38, Bargiel; overture ("Ruy Blas"), Mendelssohn.

Second Boston Symphony Concert.

The second of this season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening before an audience that completely filled the galleries and the majority of the seats below. There were, however, many empty chairs, and, as at the first concert, most of these were among the most desirable in the house, from which fact it is not unreasonable to suppose that many of them are in the hands of speculators, who have been unable to unload them at a profit upon a music-loving and generally liberal public. There may be some persons malevolent enough to wish that those who have attempted to make money, by controlling a large portion of the seats at concerts which are in one sense a private enterprise, may find themselves possessed, at the end of the season, with all the tickets they had bought. Saturday night's performance was made up, in pretty equal measure, of the important and the trivial. Wagner's grand overture to Rienzi, which opened the concert, is never belittled by anything that may be played with it, and Beethoven's first Symphony, although not so interesting as most of his others, and showing imitative rather than original power, is of much value in illustrating the history of symphonic writing, as well as possessing a refined and wholesome charm which is never absent from the compositions of the master. A Chaconne et Rigodon, by Monsigny, and Auber's overture to "Masaniello" completed the orchestral part of the programme, and, it is probable, sent many music-lovers away from the concert with a feeling as if they had been trifled with. The orchestral work of the evening was in general very good, although in the concluding overture the players upon the percussion instruments seemed to make a greater display of their undoubted muscular power than was absolutely necessary, and the brasses in the latter part of the overture to "Rienzi" were not always as clear in enunciation as they should have been. The work of the strings during the evening was exceedingly good, although the minuet in the symphony was not at times altogether clear, and some confusion was noticed in the selection of Monsigny. Mr. Charles R. Adams was the soloist and sang at his best, which, as all know, is very well indeed. The prayer from "Rienzi" and the "Slumber Song" from "Masaniello" were his selections, and represented nearly the two poles of vocal effort—the one being passionate and of heroic motion, the other calm, sweet and sensuous—but he sang them both beautifully, especially the former, showing not only skill and rich intonation, but also a feeling and sentiment that are rare upon the concert or operatic stage. The programme for next Saturday evening will be as follows: Overture (Ossian), Gade; Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; Symphony in C, Haydn; Adagio for violoncello, op. 38, Bargiel; Overture (Ruy Blas), op. 95, Mendelssohn. Mr. Louis Schmidt, violin, and Herr W. Mueller, violoncello, are to be the soloists.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the second concert last Saturday evening was—

Overture	{ " Rienzi " }.....Wagner
Prayer	{ " Rienzi " }.....Wagner
Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....Beethoven
Chaconne et Rigodon, ("Aline").....Monsigny
Slumber Air	{ " Masaniello " }.....Auber
Overture	{ " Masaniello " }.....Auber

Mr. Charles R. Adams was the singer.

Rather an ill-balanced programme, upon the whole. Indeed, it were hard to imagine a list of fine music to which one would like to have the "Rienzi" overture served up as an introduction. One may even doubt whether at any time it is well worth while to listen to the wholly grand, dramatic and impressive opening movement of this overture, when such indulgence entails the swift punishment of enduring the coarse triviality and tinsel glitter of the ensuing allegro. Yet we must say that the performance of this objectionable allegro on Saturday evening was the first one we have ever heard that showed the movement in question to have some redeeming features. Mr. Henschel did his best to save it from absolute vulgarity by a well chosen tempo; as it is usually played, one is always a little disappointed at not seeing a short-skirted damsel bound into the hall on tip-toe on a piebald horse after the last chord, the music being a more fitting heralding of such a performance than of any other that can be imagined. The really grand opening movement was extremely well played, the wind instruments making the due diminuendo at the close of each phrase of the prayer—the violins, however (strange to say), paying no attention to their "p—cresc" at such points, but playing their ascending accompanying figure in an even forte which was by no means effective. We believe that the great prayer from the fifth act of the opera has not been sung here before. In spite of its main theme being also that of the first part of the overture, and so standing as a musical bond of relationship between the two numbers, we cannot but think that the prayer itself suffers greatly by being heard directly after the overture. In the opera, standing, as it does, at the beginning of the fifth act, after the tragic and terrible incidents of the third and fourth acts, this prayer comes as a grateful ray of hope; but immediately after the noisy boisterousness of the overture it sounds dull and heavy. Mr. Adams sang it superbly, with dignity, fervor and impressiveness.

In the delightful Beethoven symphony the orchestra was neither at its worst nor at its best, playing with life and spirit, but with little delicacy or finish of style. The tempi struck us as excellent, albeit in the last movement the leading theme was taken a thought more deliberately at its first appearance than it was afterwards. The pair of dances by Monsigny were wholly charming.

Mr. Adams's singing of the thrice-beautiful Slumber Air from "Masaniello" was an event. Such singing should not be spoken of in prose; it should be sung in verse, and our pen is wholly prosaic. The overture made a bright and pleasant close to the concert. Although not a work so constantly bearing the stamp of genius as the overture to "Fra Diavolo" and one or two others of Auber's lighter things, it has many fine points and a pervading brilliancy of style which commend it to the music lover.

The solo players at the next concert will be Mr. Louis Schmidt, violin, and Mr. Wilhelm Müller, violoncello. The programme will be as follows: Overture ("Ossian"), Gade; concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; symphony in C (No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition), Haydn; adagio for violoncello, op. 38, Bargiel; overture ("Ruy Blas"), Mendelssohn.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.—The second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall took place last Saturday evening in the presence of an audience which filled all the seats in every part of the house except several of the most desirable ones on the floor. It is believed that these latter seats are in the hands of ticket speculators, as they have all been sold by the management. If so it is probable that after a while they will be found again on sale at the box office, rather than be lost entirely to former purchasers. It will then be possible, perhaps, to obtain good seats for an evening concert at moderate prices, which cannot now be accomplished. The following programme was exceptionally well performed Saturday evening, both by the orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction, and the soloist, Mr. Charles R. Adams: Overture, Prayer, (Rienzi), Wagner, Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21, Beethoven; Chaconne et Rigodon, (Aline), Monsigny; Slumber Air, Overture, (Masaniello), Auber. Mr. Adams was in excellent voice and rendered the prayer from "Rienzi" with much fervor and the slumber song from Masaniello very tenderly. The programme for next Saturday night is as follows: Overture, (Ossian), Gade; Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; Symphony in C, Haydn; Adagio for violoncello, op. 38, Bargiel; Overture, (Ruy Blas), op. 95, Mendelssohn. Mr. Louis Schmidt, violin, and Herr W. Mueller, violoncello, are to be the soloists. Franklin

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT.

If the programme of the first concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra was sombre almost to the point of heaviness, that of the second, performed on Saturday evening, while by no means pandering to a flippant taste, was bright and entertaining enough to suit any lover of the exhilarating in music. Certainly the element of heaviness was successfully avoided, and were this programme to be made a standard for the whole series, it would be open to the charge of being hardly as substantial as one has a right to expect for concerts of such pretensions as these. But, for variety's sake, such a programme is very acceptable now and then. The most intellectual selection was Beethoven's symphony in C, No. 1, whose classic measures stood forth in new dignity by contrast with the strong color effects of Wagner's "Rienzi" overture, the catching melodies and rhythm of the chaconne and rigodon from Monsigny's opera, "Aline," and the noisy brilliancy of Auber's "Masaniello" overture, which formed its instrumental setting. The character of the orchestral playing at this concert was such as to offer little temptation to criticism. The Wagner overture was grandly given. Taken and firmly held at a moderate tempo, well suited to the stately character of its themes and their treatment, its contrasts of light and shade were brought out with admirable precision of attack, nice gradations of force and balance of instruments, and it was played with splendid life and vigor. Nothing could be finer than the manner in which the sustained note from the cornet at the opening was managed, and again on its recurrence, the sound literally growing out of the silence and melting away into it as insensibly as a cloud dissolves into the azure of the sky; and the perfect unanimity with which the violins interrupted the call, at the appointed places, with a rapid tremolo, was equally praiseworthy. The performance was greeted with a burst of enthusiasm of undoubted genuineness and so protracted as to amount to an encore, in recognition of which Mr. Henschel bowed his acknowledgments.

Mr. Henschel's reading of the symphony was as judicious and as free from innovations as any save the most rigid stickler for the traditions could ask. The influence of the conductor's personality, indeed, was almost constantly felt, but it was the personality of an intelligent interpreter well charged with the composer's spirit. The delightful clearness which marked the performance of the work, as a whole, notably in the sensitive attention given to the expressive nuances, which are of such importance in all of Beethoven's writings, was a manifest result not only of the orchestra's efficiency, but also, in a very large sense, of the conductor's close leadings. The tempi were, as a rule, pretty strictly maintained, but occasionally, as for instance in the two allegro movements, the conductor showed a trace of the tendency, so often noted last season, to undue acceleration of pace, apparently under influence of excitement, in consequence of which the effects were at times blurred. The dances by Monsigny are dainty little pieces, full of melody, very simply but effectively scored. They are interesting specimens of the now antique school of Lully and Rameau, and on their own merits are as well worthy of occasional introduction into the programme of a classical concert as much of the ballet and "Hungarian dances" which find so often a place there. Auber's overture, in spite of its theatrical flavor and noise, is brilliant and tuneful enough to warrant occasional revival, for though hackneyed to the older concert-goers, has become by disuse practically a novelty to the rising generation. Both these last-mentioned numbers were played by Mr. Henschel's orchestra for all they were worth.

And to most present the most delightful feature of the concert was the vocal part, contributed by Mr. Charles R. Adams, who followed the "Rienzi" overture with the beautiful prayer-aria from that opera, and preceded the overture to "Masaniello" with the slumber air from that work. Mr. Adams has never appeared with greater advantage before a Boston audience. Both selections were given with faultless taste and with a depth of feeling and largeness of style that are beyond all praise. His voice is of somewhat too robust a mould to give the finest expression to the soft strains of the serenade, but it was modulated with fine skill to adapt it to this tender office, and came with great sweetness and tenderness of effect, even in the falsetto notes, which one would imagine a voice of this timbre would find it difficult to manage. After both of the selections Mr. Adams was very heartily recalled, and after the slumber song he was recalled twice.

The soloists of the next concert will be Mr. Louis Schmidt, violin, and Herr Wilhelm Mueller, violoncello. The programme will be as follows:—Overture ("Ossian"), Gade; concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; symphony in C (No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition), Haydn; adagio for violoncello, Op. 38, Bargiel; overture ("Ruy Blas"), Mendelssohn.

Musical.

THE SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT OF 1882-83.—The symphony was Beethoven's first; and here commences another of the many performances that have been given in Boston of the immortal series of nine to which it belongs. It is true that in his first symphony Beethoven does not more strongly present the eclectic in music than did Mozart in his "Jupiter" symphony. At the outstart, however, there is a slight flash of radicalism, to which the conservative critics of the age might have taken doleful exception. To have commenced a symphony or any other pretentious work with the chord of the dominant seventh in a sub-dominant scale, and then to have so unceremoniously migrated to the dominant key in four brief measures, without the least formality in treating the key in which the work is written, must have once been ridiculed as an idiocyncrasy in musical form. All this, so far from appearing anything strange, would to the latest "eccentric" school seem commonplace and even on this score vulgar from any but Beethoven. It was really, however, a fitting and royal opening for nine of the noblest creations in musical form of which history bears record. After the first few measures Beethoven in his first symphony is almost as loyal to tradition as though he were Mozart or Haydn. All in the Allegro con brio is so clear and rhythmic that it would even catch the ear of those who care naught but for the concord of sweet sounds; and yet the broad, majestic, and soulful manner in which the entire movement is developed is in every part of it marvellous. How Beethoven-like is its close. For twenty-four measures we hear naught but the chord of C major, at first accompanying a welcome repetition of the original theme, but soon forsaking even this. Even the conventional cadence form is ignored, and the first movement of the symphony ends with as grand and exciting use of a most primitive element in music as can possibly be imagined. It were a temptation to treat in full of other phases peculiar to the C major symphony, but we resist it for the sake of brevity. Nothing more impresses us than the andante cantabile con moto, and as taken by Mr. Henschel it was con moto indeed, yet without that exaggeration which made it such an obnoxious programme last year. In thinking how replete with the finest touches of poetic sentiment this andante really is, it strikes us as a quaint contrast that Beethoven should have treated it in the fugue-like form. At first it seems as though he were about to write a tonal-fugue, such are the natures of the answer and countersubject; but that he could write fugues yet would not, was a trait, which in connection with his genius, will ever be rated as a happy one, now that the science of music never seems so imposing as when it enters the domain of art to rob it of all its charm. Except the oldest and best, fugues are a nuisance whenever they appear, to ninety-nine out of a hundred music lovers. The minuet was performed by the orchestra in a more stately tempo than would seem to be suggested by its Allegro molto vivace designation; but after all the fault was naught but one of the most welcome signs of the "new departure" of which we have heard so much of late. For the main fault in the otherwise very respectable performance of the symphony we must hold the wood-wind instrumentalists more or less responsible. The violin department played superbly, concertmeister Listemann's lead doing its usual splendid service in making prompt the attack of phrases, where without it there might have been no slight confusion. This, too, was felt throughout the rendering of the entire work of the evening. But how badly the wood-wind played we need not tell to those to whom they seemed to say, "You shall hear a fearful battle rendered you in music"; and sure enough, in the first movement of the symphony there was something musically akin to a conflict upon more than one occasion. Out with that obnoxious player; he's no good. Take the venerable De Ribas back to the fold, no matter what he charges, Mr. Higginson; don't be so stingy in the prices you pay the orchestra. De Ribas is the best obnoxious player that Boston ever had, and in his place you have hired a man who can only play as second fiddle to him. This is not very elegant advice,—that we know; but we are sincere in it, and there is something to be said in favor of sincerity, no matter what the cause be—philanthropic or otherwise. As for the rest of the concert, the programme, elsewhere printed, was finely performed, and we regret that the rendering of the symphony should have so impressed us that we must neglect the event of the evening, the singing of Mr. Adams, in which there was all the fervor, refinement, intensity and finesse that have long since made him famous. At the concert this evening Louis Schmidt is to play the G minor concerto of Bruch—we trust with good success.

A FEW REMARKS.

For a musical criticism of a concert that now forsooth we would only talk about see above.

As conductor Mr. Henschel is flying away from a "higher development" in orchestral conducting at break-neck speed, 'twere fair to rise and cheer him on; 'twere rude to pick flaws with one so stalwart, manly, gifted, yet so modest. As he hastens to enhance the union with his critics, 'tis with delicacy that we would even hint to him of what Don Pedro said to Benedict, viz: "I pray thee, get some excellent music." Yet here's a programme that like many others now in fashion is hardly suitable:

Overture	{ ("Reinzi")	Wagner
Prayer	{
Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21.....	Beethoven
Chaconne et Rigodon, ("Alline").....	Monsigny
Slumber Air	{ ("Masaniello").....	Auber
Overture	{

Regenerated artist though he truly is, he yet showeth not the true reform in making up a concert programme; the reform that for him and for the public good his friends did promise. Let us look to former years.

Mr. John S. Dwight was wont to present some highly admirable though a few "old foggy" programmes. Such were for the Harvard concerts. Some were models; but precious little thanks did he receive. Some day we shall publish these programmes. Long time ago Mr. Dwight could pride himself upon a goodly coterie of worshippers. He was a trifle too polite to his friends; but then he made a reasonably just and able critic, "albeit" (Apthorp) Mr. Dwight always rated highly the Harvard concert repertoire. At last his worshippers became a trifle treacherous, and elated by an etherial atmosphere that by Boston alone is snuffed in, these worshippers began to cry aloud to Dwight to change his tactics. For to modern Athens the Harvard programmes were thought to be a trifle too utterly and too classically antiquated. Mr. Dwight was alive to the demand. Upon one occasion, in response to it, he astonished the Gazette and all its many readers by the strength, variety and nicety of what he offered. Yet "Athens" ignored the change; became ungrateful; one or two Athenians said "old Dwight"; others put a dash before "the Harvard concerts"; and few there were indeed who did not think a change S. Henschel,—this is an old pun, so pardon us for its use. Even Mr. Dwight's conscientiousness, his artistic perception, his self-sacrificing, ever yearning, gentle, polite and discriminating criticism quickly went for naught. Now of course it would not be Boston not to immortalize a reverend son in art, that it had once upon a time rejected; "albeit" (Apthorp) the programmes that Mr. Dwight made for the Harvard concerts were ridiculed. The ridicule culminated not only in a famous benefit, but later in the suppression of the Harvard concerts. In other words, Mr. Dwight was peculiarly boosted into a long wished-for retirement. At three score and ten, his goodly services no longer required, Mr. Dwight has as his successor in symphony concert programme making, a curiosity par excellence. Symphony concerts in Boston so far as programmes are concerned, from a sublime to the ridiculous have gone. Look at the programme we have cited. How Boston would have howled itself to frenzy had Mr. Dwight put forth the Masaniello overture at a Harvard concert. It is jolly, bright and sterling, but it's hackneyed. It has been played in Boston at least ten thousand times. We would now prefer by far a new Strauss waltz to it; but this is a statement that slightly savors of high treason, considering the locality in which we were born and brought up. We have heard melodies from the Beethoven symphonies whistled on Beacon street time and again, and also drummed out upon the famous Chickering pianos, two, four, and even by eight to sixteen hands, in one grand piano-bedlam. Yet, 'tis these noble symphonies that are now offered to us as something almost strictly new and fascinating. Truly Mr. Henschel might with profit study the musical history of Boston. He should remember and benefit by so sincere a suggestion if he would do a genuine service to a cause most holy, in modern Athens. It is true that he is a much better conductor than he was last year, but he does remind one occasionally of the "dear departed" in him,—that æsthetic "flourish" now forever gone. In regard to programmes, if he will only examine some of the files of Dwight's Journal, from 1855 to 1880, he will no less appreciate the kindly and intelligent demand now made of him. Thus far he is having none of his own compositions performed at the symphony concerts this year. But the most virulent of his critics would not that he should become too modest in this respect and go, to please them, so wide to another extreme that Boston audiences would miss some beautiful music. Had his overture ended the last symphony concert, instead of Auber's, it would have at least contributed something "good" by way of variety.

The second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was an improvement upon the first as far as execution went. As to the works given I did not find the program as interesting or exciting as the one of last week. It was as follows:

Overture and Prayer, "Rienzi" Wagner
Symphony in C, No. 1, op. 21 Beethoven
Adagio molto: Allegro con brio, Andante cantabile con moto.
Menuetto: Allegro molto e vivace, Adagio, Allegro molto e vivace.
"Chaconne et Rigodon," "Aline" Monsigny
"Slumber Air" and Overture, "Masaniello" Auber
Solist. Mr. Charles R. Adams.

A large head and a small tail. From the brasses of Wagner to the bass drums of Auber. But there is very little fault to find. The "Rienzi" overture was very clearly played. Mr. Henschel took the prayer theme a trifle slow, which I think is an advantage to the work, but by the time the march theme was reached there was brilliancy enough. There was some uncertainty in the brasses, just before the dissonant chromatic passages at the close, but this soon vanished.

Then came Mr. Adams in the beautiful prayer, and here the highest praise must be given. Dramatic expression, clear enunciation, sure attack in even the highest register—all were united. The artist never appeared to better advantage. Even against the heaviest orchestration his tones stood out clear and full, and seemingly without effort.

To go from such a number to the tenor legato phrases of Auber's "Slumber Song" proved great versatility. There was greater exhibition of taste in shading in this number than I have ever heard. The only possible fault was that occasionally the singer was obliged to make sudden and marked changes from the semifalsetto to a throaty emission of tone. But the semifalsetto was used as artistically as possible, and the final cadenza and diminuendo were superb. Mr. Adams won a double recall, and certainly his performance merited the enthusiasm it created.

Beethoven's Symphony was well played, but there is little in this early work that evokes great enthusiasm. The minuet is finer than any in the Haydn Symphonies, and the violin work of the andante is beautiful, but the work is so dwarfed beside all the rest of the nine that one continually longs for the true Beethoven rather than the pupil of Haydn.

The only fault of the performance was the indistinctness of the minuet, which seemed at times to become a mere scramble, while at others it was over-accented. Mr. Henschel seems to have drilled his orchestra to rendering sforzando effects excellently, and perhaps is led to make an over-use of their ability in this direction. The reading of the andante, and the phrasing of the scale progressions which lead into the last movement, were excellent.

As regards the Monsigny selection, it was entirely in the old French vein—simplicity and naïveté, à la Watteau. It was well rendered, and proved that the strings of the orchestra are likely to be as effective this year as they were last season. This can scarcely fail to be the case, for B. Listemann is still the chef d'attaque, and there are such players as Louis Schmidt, Wilhelm Mueller, etc., in this portion of the orchestra. At the next concert the two last-named performers are to sustain solo numbers.

Elson in Music Drama

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

III. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 21ST, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Ossian.) GADE.

CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN in G minor, op. 26. BRUCH.

Prelude. (Allegro moderato), Adagio.—Finale. (Allegro energico).—

SYMPHONY in C. HAYDN.

(No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition.)

Adagio; vivace.—Adagio ma non troppo.—

Menuetto. (Allegretto).—Finale. (Presto assai).—

ADAGIO FOR VIOLONCELLO. op. 38. BARGIEL.

OVERTURE. (Ruy Blas.) op. 95. MENDELSSOHN.

SOLOISTS:

MR. LOUIS SCHMIDT, Jr., Violin.

HERR WILHELM MUELLER, Violoncello.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

Third Symphony Concert at Music Hall Last Night.

Gilmore's Band in Concert at the Boston This Evening.

Lyceum Entertainments of the Week —Preludes and Echoes.

The third concert of the season by the Boston symphony orchestra at Music Hall last evening was a thoroughly pleasant occasion. The orchestra had no very trying difficulties to deal with, and acquitted themselves in the most praiseworthy manner throughout. Too much credit can hardly be accorded to Mr. Henschel for the excellent taste which he displayed in his reading of the various scores. No fault could be found with his tempi, which were most happily taken throughout, and his conducting was uniformly good. Indeed, it must be apparent to everybody that the trying experience of a year in a new field, the experiments which ended in disastrous failure or partial success, have not been without effect upon this gentleman's method and style. It was an exceedingly hard position in which Mr. Henschel was placed at the beginning of last season, when he found himself suddenly called upon to perform the almost untried task of leading a great orchestra through the difficult and thorny path of a successful series of symphony concerts. That he did not acquit himself with an astonishing degree of success was not to be wondered at. Nevertheless, the marked improvement which he has made this season gives ample evidence that his success as a thorough and competent leader would be only a question of time. But this fact will not explain to the public exactly why it was that Mr. Henschel was allowed to spend a year or more in learning his business at its expense.

It might be said about the programme of last evening with equal truth with which it was remarked of the second concert, that the selections were largely of a light and sunny nature. It is not necessary to have a programme all shadow or all brightness, as has been the custom thus far this season. A combination of the two would be more satisfactory to most people. At any rate there certainly ought to be one number upon the programme with more depth than any which were given yesterday. Gade's overture, "Ossian," was the first thing. This, the first of the composer's five overtures, was produced by him in 1841, at the age of 26. He was then in the royal orchestra at Copenhagen, and wrote the piece in competition for the prize offered by the Copenhagen Musical Union. Spohr and Schneider were the judges, and awarded Gade the triumph. This attracted the notice of the King, and Gade was immediately pensioned. He was thus enabled to travel, and to make the acquaintance of Mendelssohn and Schumann, whose styles have had a powerful influence over his works. The pleasing overture was given last night as it should have been, and received the approbation of the audience.

Max Bruch's fine concerto in G minor, which had the second place on the programme, brought Mr. Louis Schmidt upon the stage. He was well received when he entered.

but at the conclusion of his work this reception was re-enforced by prolonged and renewed applause. Comparisons are odious, and it will not, perhaps, be necessary to say that the Boston symphony orchestra has none—one man, certainly—who could have interpreted the work with quite as much feeling, smoothness and technical skill; but this fact does not detract from the honors due to Mr. Schmidt. It was truly a finely-done piece of work, and justifies the reputation which this young violinist has achieved.

Haydn's symphony in C (No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition) formed the nucleus of the evening's entertainment. And surely what could be more entertaining and pleasing to so large a number of people than one of the ever fresh and immortal works of the "father of the symphony." The unending invention, the classic purity of the instrumentation, the thousand pretty, harmonious, graceful effects continually reappearing combined to produce a charm which each succeeding generation is obliged to acknowledge, and which the deeper, bolder, more drastic effects of modern schools, and greater (greater because they were later, perhaps) masters cannot drive from our affections. This particular symphony deserves considerable interest from the fact that it was the first one which Haydn wrote and conducted for the Salomon concerts in London. Its exact date is uncertain, but is probably in the neighborhood of 1771.

Bargiel's lovely adagio for the violoncello, which was played so finely by Herr Wilhelm Meuller of the orchestra, was by no means the least pleasing feature of the evening. Herr Meuller's efforts were enthusiastically applauded.

The programme closed with Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture, one of the master's most brilliantly effective works. The most remarkable thing about this overture is the fact that Mendelssohn wrote it during the spare time of two very busy days—a feat which was decidedly against his inclinations and his custom. The overture received a broad and generous reading at the hands of Mr. Henschel. The programme for the next concert will be as follows:

Overture, "Freischuetz".....	Weber
Aria, "Rodelinda".....	Handel
Miss Henrietta Beebe.
Serenade in D. op. 11.....	Brahms
"Funeral March of a Marionette".....	Gounod
Songs with piano, a. "Italy;" b. "The Charmer,".....	Mendelssohn
Miss Beebe.
Overture, "Sakuntala".....	Goldmark

ETTE. GOUNOD.
MENDELSSOHN.
GOLDMARK.

OIST:

ETTA BEEBE.

sed is a Chickering.

MUSIC. Continued

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture (Ossian).....Gade
Concerto for Violin in G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Prelude (Allegro moderato), Adagio.—Finale. (Allegro energico).—
Symphony in C.....Haydn
(No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Adagio; vivace.—Adagio man non troppo.—
Menuetto, (Allegretto).—Finale. (Presto assai).—
Adagio for Violoncello, op. 38.....Bargiel
Overture (Ruy Blas) op. 95.....Mendelssohn

It would be difficult to discover anything very deep, or great in the above programme, although it began with romance and ended in excitement. The Ossian overture was on the whole well performed, especially in the noble, warlike theme which with its heavy accompanying strokes of the strings, seems to picture the heavy steps of the northern heroes. This was given with all possible grandeur and force. The mournful echoing cadence was also shaded with commendable refinement. The Bruch concerto has often been performed in our recent concerts, and is Adamowski's piece de resistance. Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., of the orchestra, was the soloist. His performance was that of a true musician, being free from all trickery, containing no inaudible pianissimi, or long drawn out diminuendi. There was, perhaps, a slight absence of the fervor with which Adamowski invests the beautiful chief theme of the adagio, but all was straightforward and manly. The intonation was always sure, even in the highest register. The tone was not very heavy, but this may have been the fault of the instrument, or of the nervousness incidental to a first performance, although we must say that the player seemed free from the latter weakness. The finale was brilliantly done; runs, double stopping, and other technical difficulties being overcome with apparent ease. Haydn's Symphony was dainty and pretty, rather than powerful. The themes are sometimes quite simple, the tonic arpeggio forming a chief motive for the first movement. But melody is the leading characteristic of the work. What an inventive genius the old composer must have been to lavish his tunes so freely. A modern symphonic composer takes half a dozen notes and makes his motif, and then allows all thought of time to disappear. Moderns may smile at the simple development, the lack of color, but they would find it terribly difficult to imitate the wealth of melody. The execution of the work was uneven. The time was taken rather rapidly in the allegro and some of the instruments, wood, wind and brass, lagged behind the conductor's beat. The scale of triplets which is at the end of the first part of the movement, was blurred. The adagio was taken too slow. The crystal clearness of its construction became monotonous because of its funereal pace, and because of the startlingly emphatic manner in which the violins gave forth their figures, depriving the movement of its charm of airy sweetness. The Minuet was not in complete unison, the deep instruments lagging again. The Presto was excellently done throughout. Mr. Mueller made a fine impression in the violoncello solo. He gives a very pure legato, free from every trace of scratchiness, and his shading is artistic. As far as this number went we could find no short-comings in his performance. Were it not for a lack of breadth in tone, we should rank him the equal of Fischer. As it is we wait for a more extended exhibition of his talents as a soloist before forming an opinion. He is a thorough musician, that is evident, and it was one of the best charms of this concert that it contained two truly musical soloists, rather than one pyrotechnical virtuoso. The exciting Ruy Blas overture was most brilliantly played, picturing Mr. Blas's chequered career with great force. Next week popular and classical will blend as follows: Overture (Freischuetz), Weber; aria (Rondellina), Handel; serenade in D. op. 11, allegro molto.—Scherzo (allegro non troppo)—adagio non troppo—menuetto I. II.—Scherzo (allegro)—rondo (allegro), Brahms. Funeral March of a Marionette, Gounod. Songs with piano—(a) Italy, (b) The Charmer, Mendelssohn. Overture; (Sakuntala), Goldmark. Soloist, Miss Henrietta Beebe. The concert will be preceded on Friday by the usual rehearsal. The Gounod number is the first attempt at introducing a semi-humorous light work into these concerts, and we predict that the experiment will be so successful that other sophs to the popular Cerberus will follow. Why not give Mozart's Musical Joke, or Tchaikowsky's Miniature March?

Third Symphony Concert.

The third concert in the series given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew the usual large audience to Music Hall on Saturday evening. As at the preceding concerts the balconies were crowded, while a large number of the best seats on the floor of the hall were left unoccupied. The evening's programme for the orchestra was composed of Gade's "Ossian" overture, Haydn's symphony in C and Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," and there was also Bruch's concerto for the violin in G minor, op. 26, played by Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., and Bargiel's adagio for violoncello, op. 38, played by Herr Wilhelm Mueller. The programme, as will be seen, was not particularly brilliant, but it had many points of interest. Gade's overture—a monotonous and long-spun-out composition, whose chief interest lies in that portion where the strong, prolonged notes of the strings accompany in marching form the warlike measure of the other instruments—was very finely played throughout, and the overture from Ruy Blas was given with spirit and success. The symphony was also well interpreted in the main, although the prevailing melodiousness and lack of strong purpose in the work itself make it seem weak before its conclusion is reached. The time throughout was well taken, except in the adagio, where it was somewhat too slow and resulted in giving the strings an opportunity to play harshly, instead of lightly and daintily, as they should have done. The solo work of the evening was very good. Mr. Schmidt did not succeed in producing a very strong or deep tone from his instrument, but his playing was earnest and thoughtful, his indication of skill marked and his simplicity and sincerity of style infinitely refreshing. He is evidently an artist with the violin and destined to take a leading place among Boston musicians. Herr Mueller, although presenting himself in a selection which gave him little opportunity to display his versatility, played most beautifully, with perfect expression and knowledge and with great purity and smoothness of tone. A hearing of his work in more important compositions is necessary, however, before a definite opinion of his powers can be given. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Der Freyschutz," Weber; Serenade in D. op. 11, Brahms; "Funeral March of a Marionette," Gounod; Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. Miss Henrietta Beebe is to be the soloist, and will sing an air from Handel's "Rondellina" and songs by Mendelssohn.

MUSICAL. Parade

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last evening. The programme was not particularly brilliant, but it had one or two points of interest. The performances opened with Gade's "Ossian" overture, a monotonous bit of diluted Mendelssohn, almost as tiresome as Ossian itself. It was, however, spiritedly and carefully interpreted, and with admirable strength and color. It was followed by Max Bruch's Concerto for violin, op. 26, the solo part performed by Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., who interpreted the work with great fire and vim. He has a fine full tone, plays in a broad, clear style and with great taste and expressiveness. His intonation is pure, his bowing excellent, and in all that he does there is firmness, precision and artistic feeling. He has evidently studied in a good school earnestly and conscientiously. He is a thoroughly interesting player, and the success he achieved was both positive and deserved. The symphony was Haydn's in C, No. 7 of the Breitkopf edition. The tempo, save in respect to the adagio, which was given too slowly, were judiciously taken by Mr. Henschel. The whole work was well played, with the exception of the slow movement, which was rasped with almost unmerciful coarseness by the strings. An adagio for Violoncello by Bargiel was beautifully interpreted by Herr Mueller, an artist of rare powers, refined in style, exquisite in delicacy and expressiveness of sentiment, and in all things a thorough master of his instrument. The concert ended with a dashing performance of Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Der Freyschutz," Serenade in D. op. 11, Brahms; "Funeral March of a Marionette," Gounod; Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. Miss Henrietta Beebe is to be the soloist, and will sing an air from Handel's "Rondellina," and songs by Mendelssohn.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT. — Mr. Henschel's programme for last Saturday evening was almost a popular one in its character, and the large company who were assembled in Music Hall appeared to enjoy it quite as much as though it had been the very most pronounced and unfathomable music of the future. It consisted of Gade's "Ossian" overture, Haydn's symphony in C, Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," Bruch's concerto for the violin in G minor, op. 26, played by Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., and Bargiel's adagio for violoncello, op. 38, played by Herr Wilhelm Mueller. A large part of the Gade overture partakes of the character of a military march of warlike sound, in which the strings are made to play a marching accompaniment to the wood, wind and brasses. This with the "Ruy Blas" overture received a splendid rendering at the hands of the orchestra. The Haydn symphony was also finely played, flowing along in a continuous stream of melody almost from the beginning to the close. In only one particular was the work of the orchestra faulty. This was in the harsh tones from the strings during the adagio movement, and which doubtless came from the over-slow tempo in which it was taken. The solo performers, Messrs. Schmidt, violin, and Mueller, 'cello, proved themselves artists worthy of the distinction claimed for them, and it is much to be desired that they may be heard again. The programme for the next concert will be as follows: Overture, "Der Freyschutz," Weber; Serenade in D. op. 11, Brahms; "Funeral March of a Marionette," Gounod; Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. Miss Henrietta Beebe is to be the soloist, and will sing an air from Handel's "Rondellina" and songs by Mendelssohn.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third concert of the second series by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening with the following programme: Handel

Overture (Ossian).....Gade
Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr.
Symphony in C.....Haydn
(No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Adagio for violoncello, op. 38.....Bargiel
Herr Wilhelm Mueller.
Overture ("Ruy Blas") op. 95.....Mendelssohn

The varied characteristics of the several works included in the evening's selections made the programme a pleasing one throughout, and the presentation of the numbers was mainly excellent. The beauties of the Gade overture, with its poetic sentiment, its hints of Scandinavian folk songs and its rich instrumentation, were all brought out with admirable effect and served as a fitting introduction to the enjoyable features of the Bruch concerto. The soloist in this latter number, Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., is a welcome addition to the resident musicians of Boston, and promises to quickly win a genuine recognition of his merits from the musical public. His playing lacks something of the artistic eloquence and finish which is demanded in a solo player, but this is more than compensated for by the intelligence and character shown in his work, and the keen musicians' instinct which manifests itself in every note that he plays. His tone is delightfully true and pure, his technique shows him to have been a thoroughly conscientious student, and his stage presence has the repose and grace which adds so much to the best artistic work. The first notes of the prelude arrested the attention of the listener, but the marked character of the player was more clearly shown in the adagio, which was given with fine expression and feeling. In the finale the work was done with admirable precision and brilliancy, and the audience rewarded the artist with repeated recalls in recognition of his successful effort. Mr. Schmidt is a native of New York, but has passed nearly 20 years, the larger part of his life, apparently, in California. He has studied with Missud and other leading teachers in Paris, and has, with other members of his family, been active in the musical circles of San Francisco for several years. Herr Mueller, the 'cello soloist, also a member of the orchestra, made his first public appearance here as a solo player on this occasion. His playing suffers by comparison with the 'celloists heard here during the last few years, and he hardly makes good the loss experienced in the retirement of Mr. Wulf Fries. His tone is dry and thin, and lacks the warmth and feeling called for in such work, and, although there is a certain delicacy and beauty in his playing, the absence of color and character is constantly apparent. The audience appeared much pleased with this artist, however, and applauded him generously upon the conclusion of his number. He comes from Germany, where he has been a member of Joachim's quartet. The beauties of the Haydn symphony were admirably presented by the rendering given the work, and the delightfully melodious themes were brought out with charming clearness and grace. The "Ruy Blas" overture gave a brilliant finish to the programme, its playing having all the strength and vigor called for by the composition.

MUSIC. Comics

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture (Ossian).....Gade
Concerto for Violin in G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Prelude (Allegro moderato), Adagio.—Finale. (Allegro energico).—
Symphony in C.....Haydn
(No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Adagio; vivace.—Adagio ma non troppo.—
Menuetto, (Allegretto).—Finale. (Presto assai).—
Adagio for Violoncello, op. 38.....Bargiel
Overture (Ruy Blas) op. 95.....Mendelssohn

It would be difficult to discover anything very deep, or great in the above programme, although it began with rapture and ended in excitement. The Ossian overture was on the whole well performed, especially in the noble, warlike theme which with its heavy accompanying strokes of the strings, seems to picture the heavy steps of the northern heroes. This was given with all possible grandeur and force. The mournful echoing cadence was also shaded with commendable refinement. The Bruch concerto has often been performed in our recent concerts, and is Adamowski's piece de resistance. Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., of the orchestra, was the soloist. His performance was that of a true musician, being free from all trickery, containing no inaudible pianissimi, or long drawn out diminuendi. There was, perhaps, a slight absence of the fervor with which Adamowski invests the beautiful chief theme of the adagio, but all was straightforward and manly. The intonation was always sure, even in the highest register. The tone was not very heavy, but this may have been the fault of the instrument, or of the nervousness incidental to a first performance, although we must say that the player seemed free from the latter weakness. The finale was brilliantly done; runs, double stopping, and other technical difficulties being overcome with apparent ease. Haydn's Symphony was dainty and pretty, rather than powerful. The themes are sometimes quite simple, the tonic arpeggio forming a chief motive for the first movement. But melody is the leading characteristic of the work. What an inventive genius the old composer must have been to lavish his tunes so freely. A modern symphonic composer takes half a dozen notes and makes his motif, and then allows all thought of time to disappear. Moderns may smile at the simple development, the lack of color, but they would find it terribly difficult to imitate the wealth of melody. The execution of the work was uneven. The time was taken rather rapidly in the allegro and some of the instruments, wood, wind and brass, lagged behind the conductor's beat. The scale of triplets which is at the end of the first part of the movement, was blurred. The adagio was taken too slow. The crystal clearness of its construction became monotonous because of its funeral pace, and because of the startlingly emphatic manner in which the violins gave forth their figures, depriving the movement of its charm of airy sweetness. The Minuet was not in complete unison, the deep instruments lagging again. The Presto was excellently done throughout. Mr. Mueller made a fine impression in the violoncello solo. He gives a very pure legato, free from every trace of scratchiness, and his shading is artistic. As far as this number went we could find no short-comings in his performance. Were it not for a lack of breadth in tone, we should rank him the equal of Fischer. As it is we wait for a more extended exhibition of his talents as a soloist before forming an opinion. He is a thorough musician, that is evident, and it was one of the best charms of this concert that it contained two truly musical soloists, rather than one pyrotechnical virtuoso. The exciting Ruy Blas overture was most brilliantly played, picturing Mr. Blas's chequered career with great force. Next week popular and classical will blend as follows: Overture (Freischuetz), Weber; aria (Rondelina), Handel; serenade in D. op. 11, allegro molto —Scherzo (allegro non troppo)—adagio non troppo—menuetto I. II.—Scherzo (allegro)—rondo (allegro), Brahms. Funeral March of a Marionette, Gounod. Songs with piano—(a) Italy, (b) The Charmer, Mendelssohn. Overture (Sakuntala), Goldmark. Soloist, Miss Henrietta Beebe. The concert will be preceded on Friday by the usual rehearsal. The Gounod number is the first attempt at introducing a semi-humorous light work into these concerts, and we predict that the experiment will be so successful that other sopas to the popular Cerberus will follow. Why not give Mozart's Musical Joke, or Tchaikowsky's Miniature March?

Third Symphony Concert.

The third concert in the series given this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew the usual large audience to Music Hall on Saturday evening. As at the preceding concerts the balconies were crowded, while a large number of the best seats on the floor of the hall were left unoccupied. The evening's programme for the orchestra was composed of Gade's "Ossian" overture, Haydn's symphony in C and Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," and there was also Bruch's concerto for the violin in G minor, op. 26, played by Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., and Bargiel's adagio for violoncello, op. 38, played by Herr Wilhelm Mueller. The programme, as will be seen, was not particularly brilliant, but it had many points of interest. Gade's overture—a monotonous and long-spun-out composition, whose chief interest lies in that portion where the strong, prolonged notes of the strings accompany in marching form the warlike measure of the other instruments—was very finely played throughout, and the overture from Ruy Blas was given with spirit and success. The symphony was also well interpreted in the main, although the prevailing melodiousness and lack of strong purpose in the work itself make it seem weak before its conclusion is reached. The time throughout was well taken, except in the adagio, where it was somewhat too slow and resulted in giving the strings an opportunity to play harshly, instead of lightly and daintily, as they should have done. The solo work of the evening was very good. Mr. Schmidt did not succeed in producing a very strong or deep tone from his instrument, but his playing was earnest and thoughtful, his indication of skill marked and his simplicity and sincerity of style infinitely refreshing. He is evidently an artist with the violin and destined to take a leading place among Boston musicians. Herr Mueller, although presenting himself in a selection which gave him little opportunity to display his versatility, played most beautifully, with perfect expression and knowledge and with great purity and smoothness of tone. A hearing of his work in more important compositions is necessary, however, before a definite opinion of his powers can be given. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Der Freyschutz," Weber; Serenade in D. op. 11, Brahms; "Funeral March of a Marionette," Gounod; Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. Miss Henrietta Beebe is to be the soloist, and will sing an air from Handel's "Rodelinda" and songs by Mendelssohn.

MUSICAL. Notes

Boston Symphony Concert.

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last evening. The programme was not particularly brilliant, but it had one or two points of interest. The performances opened with Gade's "Ossian" overture, a monotonous bit of diluted Mendelssohn, almost as tiresome as Ossian itself. It was, however, spiritedly and carefully interpreted, and with admirable strength and color. It was followed by Max Bruch's Concerto for violin, op. 26, the solo part performed by Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., who interpreted the work with great fire and vim. He has a fine full tone, plays in a broad, clear style and with great taste and expressiveness. His intonation is pure, his bowing excellent, and in all that he does there is firmness, precision and artistic feeling. He has evidently studied in a good school earnestly and conscientiously. He is a thoroughly interesting player, and the success he achieved was both positive and deserved. The symphony was Haydn's in C, No. 7 of the Breitkopf edition. The tempo, save in respect to the adagio, which was given too slowly, were judiciously taken by Mr. Henschel. The whole work was well played, with the exception of the slow movement, which was rasped with almost unmerciful coarseness by the strings. An adagio for Violoncello by Bargiel was beautifully interpreted by Herr Mueller, an artist of rare powers, refined in style, exquisite in delicacy and expressiveness of sentiment, and in all things a thorough master of his instrument. The concert ended with a dashing performance of Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" overture. The programme for the next concert is as follows: Overture, "Der Freyschutz," Serenade in D. op. 11, Brahms; "Funeral March of a Marionette," Gounod; Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. Miss Henrietta Beebe is to be the soloist, and will sing an air from Handel's "Rodelinda," and songs by Mendelssohn.

THE THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Mr. Henschel's programme for last Saturday evening was almost a popular one in its character, and the large company who were assembled in Music Hall appeared to enjoy it quite as much as though it had been the very most pronounced and unfathomable music of the future. It consisted of Gade's "Ossian" overture, Haydn's symphony in C, Mendelssohn's overture to "Ruy Blas," Bruch's concerto for the violin in G minor, op. 26, played by Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., and Bargiel's adagio for violoncello, op. 38, played by Herr Wilhelm Mueller. A large part of the Gade overture partakes of the character of a military march of warlike sound, in which the strings are made to play a marching accompaniment to the wood, wind and brasses. This with the "Ruy Blas" overture received a splendid rendering at the hands of the orchestra. The Haydn symphony was also finely played, flowing along in a continuous stream of melody almost from the beginning to the close. In only one particular was the work of the orchestra faulty. This was in the harsh tones from the strings during the adagio movement, and which doubtless came from the over-slow tempo in which it was taken. The solo performers, Messrs. Schmidt, violin, and Mueller, cello, proved themselves artists worthy of the distinction claimed for them, and it is much to be desired that they may be heard again. The programme for the next concert will be as follows: Overture, "Der Freyschutz," Weber; Serenade in D. op. 11, Brahms; "Funeral March of a Marionette," Gounod; Overture, "Sakuntala," Goldmark. Miss Henrietta Beebe is to be the soloist, and will sing an air from Handel's "Rodelinda" and songs by Mendelssohn.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The third concert of the second series by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening with the following programme: Henschel
Overture (Ossian).....Gade
Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26.....Bruch
Symphony in C.....Haydn
(No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Adagio for violoncello, op. 38.....Bargiel
Herr Wilhelm Mueller.
Overture ("Ruy Blas") op. 95.....Mendelssohn

The varied characteristics of the several works included in the evening's selections made the programme a pleasing one throughout, and the presentation of the numbers was mainly excellent. The beauties of the Gade overture, with its poetic sentiment, its hints of Scandinavian folk songs and its rich instrumentation, were all brought out with admirable effect and served as a fitting introduction to the enjoyable features of the Bruch concerto. The soloist in this latter number, Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., is a welcome addition to the resident musicians of Boston, and promises to quickly win a genuine recognition of his merits from the musical public. His playing lacks something of the artistic eloquence and finish which is demanded in a solo player, but this is more than compensated for by the intelligence and character shown in his work, and the keen musicians' instinct which manifests itself in every note that he plays. His tone is delightfully true and pure, his technique shows him to have been a thoroughly conscientious student, and his stage presence has the repose and grace which adds so much to the best artistic work. The first notes of the prelude arrested the attention of the listener, but the marked character of the player was more clearly shown in the adagio, which was given with fine expression and feeling. In the finale the work was done with admirable precision and brilliancy, and the audience rewarded the artist with repeated recalls in recognition of his successful effort. Mr. Schmidt is a native of New York, but has passed nearly 20 years, the larger part of his life, apparently, in California. He has studied with Missud and other leading teachers in Paris, and has, with other members of his family, been active in the musical circles of San Francisco for several years. Herr Mueller, the cello soloist, also a member of the orchestra, made his first public appearance here as a solo player on this occasion. His playing suffers by comparison with the cellists heard here during the last few years, and he hardly makes good the loss experienced in the retirement of Mr. Wulf Fries. His tone is dry and thin, and lacks the warmth and feeling called for in such work, and, although there is a certain delicacy and beauty in his playing, the absence of color and character is constantly apparent. The audience appeared much pleased with this artist, however, and applauded him generously upon the conclusion of his number. He comes from Germany, where he has been a member of Joachim's quartet. The beauties of the Haydn symphony were admirably presented by the rendering given the work, and the delightfully melodious themes were brought out with charming clearness and grace. The "Ruy Blas" overture gave a brilliant finish to the programme, its playing having all the strength and vigor called for by the composition.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the third concert last Saturday evening was far more homogeneous in character than that of the second. Overture (Ossian), Gade; Concerto for violin in G minor, op. 26, Bruch; Symphony in C, Haydn (No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition); Adagio for violoncello, op. 38, Bargiel; Overture (Ruy Blas), op. 95, Mendelssohn. Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr. was the violinist, and Mr. Wilhelm Müller, the 'cellist. Gade's lovely overture was exquisitely played. Although the work gives constant evidence of how much the composer owes to Mendelssohn, the prevailing high poetic tone of the music prevents a comparison between the two writers from being wholly to Gade's disadvantage, notwithstanding his manifest inferiority as a master of the technique of composition. It was a little unfortunate that the Bruch concerto followed immediately after the "Ossian" overture, as the first movement of the concerto is almost completely of the same general character as Gade's piece. Apart from this, however, and considering the Bruch concerto by itself, the more fully we become acquainted with the work, the more are we impressed with its many and great beauties. Mr. Schmidt, a young violinist hitherto unknown here, sprang into public favor at a single bound. His claims to admiration are indeed numerous; his tone is warm, brilliant and wholly free from harshness or thinness, his intonation admirable, his bowing and general technique masterly. He plays more-over with great expression, verve and contagious fire. If any criticism is to be made on his playing of the concerto, it is that, with all the means of musical effect he has at command, such as variety of timbre, well-timed modifications of tempo, the whole list of brilliant weapons, in fact, that are to be found in the musical armory of the most accomplished player, his rendering soon ceased to fix the attention and to be thoroughly interesting. In the enthusiasm of youth, he seems too prone to fire off all his guns at once, and his playing does not give the impression of reserved power. Be it said, however, that he was badly accompanied, on the whole, and the nervous irritation of feeling the orchestra often drawing away from him must have hampered him uncomfortably.

The Haydn symphony, one of the longest, and, in every way, largest of the composer's works in this form, was delightfully played. Indeed, the performance, interesting enough in itself, was doubly so to any one who remembered the playing of that other Haydn symphony at the opening concert last season. Our imagination may have led us to think we saw more than was really to be seen, but it certainly did seem to us last Saturday evening as if Mr. Henschel were, in a manner, trying to vindicate the artistic point of view from which he looked at Haydn last year, and which then conditioned a performance that called forth considerable adverse criticism. And let us say at once that, to our mind, this vindication was perfectly successful. Now, as last year, Mr. Henschel italicizes a trait in Haydn's symphonies, the prominence, even the existence of which many other conductors, both here and elsewhere, have apparently overlooked. This is the brilliant, fiery, strongly masculine character of much of the music of the great composer whom most of us have insensibly grown to look upon merely as the "cheerful and sunny old Papa Haydn." Mr. Henschel seems bent upon showing us that this idyllic composer par excellence could, on occasion, hurl a thunderbolt with the best of his fellows. What made last year's performance of the B-flat symphony such a failure by any sound standard was (as we conceive) not so much any fault in Mr. Henschel's conception, as a momentary giving way to personal excitement while conducting the work. He lost his head, so to speak. To quote from our notice of the first concert of last year's course, "he apparently had not considered the effect which the exceptional excitement of the moment might have upon himself. He allowed himself (insensibly, as we think) to be carried away by momentary enthusiasm, and we do not believe that he himself had any idea at the time of the inordinately rapid, and ever more rapid, tempo to which his nervous energy lashed the orchestra in every quick movement." During the past twelvemonth Mr. Henschel has grown in practical experience; that he now has more complete command over his orchestra may go without saying; but what is still more important is that he has obtained far surer control over himself. It seemed to us that, last Saturday evening, he really and effectively did with the C major symphony what he tried (and failed) to do last year with the symphony in B-flat.

Mr. Müller's playing of the Bargiel adagio was thoroughly fine, albeit we cannot easily conceive of any one's making so weak and trivial a movement enjoyable. The composition was by no means worthy the player's mettle. The "Ruy Blas" overture was spiritedly played, but too often noisily and roughly. Neither can we see the sense of Mr. Henschel's beating four beats to the measure in the slow wind-passages. It is not easy to hear an alla breve rhythm when one sees 4-4 time beaten out before one's eyes. The whole tempo, too, of the allegro struck us as a thought over-fast, smacking more of the band-master than of the refined orchestral conductor.

The programme for the next concert will be: Overture to "Der Freischütz," Weber; aria from "Rodelinda," Händel; Serenade in D, op. 11, Brahms; "Funeral March of a Marionette," Gounod; songs, Mendelssohn; overture to "Sakuntala," Goldmark. Miss Henrietta Beebe will be the singer.

Musical.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The third symphony concert must have been at least interesting enough to have satisfied the fastidious majority of the audience in attendance. The programme was wholly an attractive one to those who had not heard Gade's "Ossian" overture, its opening number; or the "Ruy Blas" of Mendelssohn, its closing number; or the time-honored Haydn symphony in C major; or an utterly sweet adagio by Bargiel, or the piece de resistance which has long since ceased to be a novelty in Boston, the concerto in G minor by Max Bruch. The precious list of elaborate "tunes" merits at least the passing compliment of not being so wholly unfamiliar as to interfere with an adequate appreciation of it.

Having entered the hall at the conclusion of the first overture, and left it before the "orchestra" began to play "Ruy Blas," we are happily excused from suggesting, perhaps the fortieth time, how strikingly Gade's music reminds us of Mendelssohn's, at least so far as the beautiful "Ossian" is concerned.

Some of the orchestral playing was excellent. It may be taken for granted that the overtures that we did not hear were interpreted with a great deal of expression. It were a poor orchestra, indeed, that could not impress the average listener that it played the music of Mendelssohn and Gade con amore. The Haydn symphony was treated in a very becoming manner; that is to say, there were no modern improvements inflicted upon ancient methods. If anything, Mr. Henschel could have rendered more satisfactory the performance of the andante movement if he had made it somewhat less of a largo. The suggestion is a pertinent one on account of the tedious length of the movement itself; and it were, therefore, unfair to discuss the legitimacy to tradition of the actual tempo taken. In the concerto, the orchestra was heard at its best. It was as smooth, spirited, yet sympathetic an accompaniment as the young solo violinist Herr Louis Schmidt "aus" San Francisco could have desired. In point of intensity, verve, clearness and finesse the performance would have seemed highly acceptable, even if it had come from a celebrated artist. Its faults were only such as all young virtuosi who are not hopeless prodigies are liable to, and were confined to a not wholly unwelcome excess of expression in the opening movements, and a too strongly accentuated phrasing. Otherwise there was a remarkable mastery shown; and having played the accompaniment to the concerto so often as to well-nigh know it by heart, we feel morally certain that in point of fidelity, unhampered, too, by the soulless conservatism which too often accompanies a strictly faithful effort, Herr Schmidt's was by far the ablest performance of the difficult Bruch concerto that has yet been heard in this city. There was not the slightest trifling with the tempo as if to lessen the exceeding difficulty that was encountered, the memorization was without flaw, and a perfect familiarity was shown in the playing ensemble, which together with the admirable points referred to could only have resulted from a splendid schooling united with rare talent. This may seem a high tribute, but its truth will only be denied by those who are pessimistically inclined. It were also just to add that an indispensable assistance in the line of an able lead of the orchestra was Herr Schmidt's good fortune. Hearty and sincere applause from a public wont to be unsympathetic in its treatment of virtuosi rewarded the young artist for his effort. Another soloist of the concert was Herr William Mueller, formerly of the Joachim quartette in Berlin. Herr Mueller played upon a Gumunde violoncello, an instrument which probably has sufficient power to "extinguish" or finish even so great an artist as he is reputed to be. He played an adagio by Bargiel, and owing to the "Gumunde" we could barely hear it; yet, owing to the superfluous sweetness of the piece itself, we trust we shall never hear it again. If he is beyond all cavil a fine artist, we regret that he was heard at such poor advantage that serious terms respecting his performance should be withheld. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is by no means lacking the artistic element in the string department. Just here, we doubt if even the Gumundhaus orchestra has so many brilliant solo players; but the statement only calls attention to a deficiency that might be remedied by the re-acquisition to the orchestra of such musicians as Wulf Fries and C. N. Allen. These gentlemen are not only soloists, but they have few rivals in their ability to serve in the orchestra. The ability is an invaluable one. The implied criticism is not of such musicians as Listemann, Danneureuther, Schmidt and Mueller, but of whosoever they may be who often prevent unanimity and precision in playing that is otherwise admirable to a very telling degree.

The orchestral work is, as yet, represented only by the Boston Symphony concerts. The third of these was given Saturday last, with the following program:

Overture, "Ossian".....Gade
Concerto for violin, in G minor. op. 26.....Bruch
Prelude (Allegro moderato), Adagio.—Finale. (Allegro energico).—
Symphony in C.....Haydn
(No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition.)

Adagio; vivace.—Adagio ma non troppo.—
Menuetto, (Allegretto).—Finale. (Presto assai).—
Adagio for violoncello, op. 38.....Bargiel
Overture, "Ruy Blas," op. 95.....Mendelssohn

The Ossian overture was broadly given. It is in the broadest themes, or the most romantic works that I like Mr. Henschel's conceptions best. He has learned to control himself better, and his musicians work the better for the increased steadiness of the leader. The Bruch Concerto was finely performed by Mr. Louis Schmidt, Jr., who is a member of the orchestra. Herr Mueller, who performed the Bargiel selection, is leading 'Cello in the same organization. It was, perhaps, the chief charm of the concert, that instead of having a star of world-wide reputation to do the solos, it presented two solid musicians, who did not astonish so much as they pleased and satisfied the audience. Mr. Schmidt was pure in intonation, always reliable in time, sure in cadenzas, clear in double-stopping, correct and quiet in his bowing.

Much the same can be said of Herr Mueller. He is a thorough Kammer-musiker, and a fine soloist; has a superb legato, but not a very powerful tone. A lack of breadth of tone was also noticeable in Mr. Schmidt's playing, but whether this was the fault of the instrument, the artist, or of a cold in the head, with which I was afflicted, I cannot tell. Haydn's Symphony is light, dainty and melodious. It is not a work to excite enthusiasm, but it cannot fail to please in every instance. The last movement was the best played and best conducted of the four. Mr. Henschel took the Presto just as the old-fashioned vesti ought to be taken—with a good swing, not quicker than a modern allegro. But if this slowing up was in place here, it was not so in the adagio movement, whose clear simplicity becomes very prolix when taken at the rate that the conductor took it. A fashionable hotel clerk could not have moved more slowly. Added to this was the exasperating circumstance that the violins gave their delicate half-staccato figures with great emphasis.

The "Ruy Blas" overture was given with all possible power and steadiness. It was exciting enough to make up for the placidity of the symphony. There seems to be some method followed in the make up of the program this year, for light works are appearing with more frequency than ever. I am glad of this. In the next concert, Gounod's odd "Funeral March of a Marionette" will be introduced. A few half humorous works like this, a waltz or two, a popular morceau like the pizzicati by Delibes, and the public will relish the entire feast.

Meanwhile, I see several empty seats at the concerts. This has been explained to me by saying that many of the wealthy patrons of the series are out of town. But the public rehearsals are not crowded, and that cannot be explained in such a manner. Can it be that the crisis in Boston's orchestral fever is past, and that the patient is recovering, or is the city going to forsake its symphonies and revel in the school of light operas?

Music & Drama

L. C. E.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

IV. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 28TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Freischuetz.) WEBER.

ARIA. (Rodelinda.) HÆNDEL.

SERENADE in D. op. 11. BRAHMS.

Allegro molto.—Scherzo. (Allegro non troppo).—

Adagio non troppo.—Menuetto I. II.—

Scherzo. (Allegro).—Rondo. (Allegro).—

FUNERAL MARCH OF A MARIONETTE. GOUNOD.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

(a) Italy . . . }
(b) The Charmer. } . . . MENDELSSOHN.

OVERTURE. (Sakuntala.) GOLDMARK.

SOLOIST:

MISS HENRIETTA BEEBE.

The Piano used is a Chickering.

ARIA. (Rodelinda.)

HÆNDEL.

Mio caro bene, mio caro bene
Non ho piu affanni e pene,
Non ho piu pene al core
Vedendoti contento, nel seno
Mio gia sento che sol mi
Alberga amor.
Mio Caro bene
Non ho piu affanni e pene
Al cor.

TWO SONGS.

MENDELSSOHN.

a. ITALY.

Lovely thou art o'er mountain and dale.
Green are thy fields and perfumed thy gale.

Far would I wander to call thee my home,
Ne'er from the land of song could I roam;
Wafted by zephyrs, soft music flies,
Gay as the sunbeams poured from thy skies.

See the rich maize trees gracefully spread,
Proudly the aloe, too, raises its head;
Cypress and olive in stately array,
Maiden-like dance to the zephyr's soft
lay.

'Mid the bright leaves like Emerald green,
Sparkling, the bright gold Orange is seen.

Art thou, Posiedon, 'neath the wave's
breast

Breathing soft music to lull it to rest?
Heavenly garden that mirrors the sky,
Where are thy tempests, where do they fly?

Watching thee ever, still would I be.
Where thou, Parthenope, stillest the sea;
E'en as thou calmest the billows to rest,
Banish the tumult that reigns in my breast.

b. THE CHARMER.

Now the dreary winter flies,
Smiling spring again advances;
Gliding down from azure skies,
Greeting all with cheerful glances.
See how every verdant spray,
Crowned with blossoms, thrills with
gladness,
Now the lovely bride of May
Comes to banish gloom and sadness.

Now the flower that rears its head,
Seems to feel itself protected;
Filled with dew, with odours fed,
Not the smallest blooms neglected.
Urged by secret heavenly power
They perform their vital duties;
Mountain, forest, vale and bower,
All expand their latent beauties.

Thus the joyous work of Spring,
Wrought in silence, still advances;
Bowers bloom, and woodlands ring,
Charmed by her inspiring glances.
As, when dreary Winter flies,
Spring dispels his gloom of sadness,
So, thy smiles and beaming eyes
Warm and charm the heart to
gladness.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Weber's Masterpiece and a Recent Criticism.

Selections from Handel, Brahm and Gounod.

A Thoroughly Enjoyable Evening-- The Next Performance.

The programme for the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall Saturday evening, opened with Weber's masterpiece, the overture to "Der Freischuetz." Weber began the composition of the opera in July, 1817, and finished the overture, which, written after all the rest of the work was completed, is an epitome of opera, May 13, 1820. It was a year later when the work was first heard in public. Sir Julius Benedict, in his recent contribution to the "Great Musicians" series, gives the following account of the production of the overture, June 18, 1821, at Berlin:

"The musicians gradually took their places; the din and noise of the immense audience subsided; every look was directed to the orchestra, and, with the clock striking seven, the composer limped to his seat. Though small of stature, lame and ungainly, he had a great deal of dignity, and in that irregular face there was a mixture of intelligence, enthusiasm and sensibility, which made you forget his shortcomings. The applause on his entering the orchestra was deafening and lasted several minutes. The students greeted their favorite song-poet with cheers, and there was on the part of the public in general a most genial disposition in favor of Weber.

Since Beethoven's "Fidelio," only feeble, unmeaning works had been produced in Germany, with the single exception of Spohr's "Faust" and "Zemires and Azor," which, though replete with beauties, never became really popular. The subject also of the new opera was well chosen and thoroughly German, and to hear a more perfect execution of the overture than on that memorable evening would be difficult.

Weber, though conducting with a very small baton, and seemingly only indicating the change of time of the lights and shades of his noble composition, had nevertheless the most perfect control over the band. The effect of his scoring, the contrasts between the calm of the introduction and the bloom and awe of the unearthly element which interrupts it, the fire of the allegro, the charm of that heavenly melody which once heard can never be forgotten, the irresistible climax at the end, found worthy interpreters in the Berlin orchestra, and to the breathless silence which prevailed during the performance there followed

A Storm of Applause.

such as I never heard before, nor shall hear again. In vain were the repeated bows of the hero of the evening and his endeavors to go on with the next piece. At last, though reluctantly, he yielded, and a second performance of the whole overture, if possible even better than the first, enhanced the impression. The only trouble with the performance of this work was the extremely rapid tempo taken for the second movement of the overture, which caused many of the passages to whirl along with a great lack of clearness."

An aria from Handel's opera "Rodelinda," which was written in 1725, stood second upon the programme, and brought before the audience Miss Henrietta Beebe as soloist. The quaint, but melodious old passages were given in a delightful manner by the soloist. Her rich and pure notes, as clear as a bell in the upper register, together with her pure enunciation and fine delivery, completely captivated her audience, and she was enthusiastically recalled, both at this time and when later in the evening she sang two songs by Mendelssohn. The last were accompanied on the piano by Georg Henschel, and were followed by a storm of applause.

The principal feature of the evening was Brahms' serenade in D, opus. 11. Although the serenade in D was written before the composer attained his present pre-eminent position among modern composers, it is nevertheless one of his most individual works. Brahms has carried the Schumann school to its deepest and highest development. His works are not always pleasing on first hearing, and are not calculated to be popular with the multitude; but when the musician takes the pains to examine and to analyze, the consistent beauty and wealth of thought, appealing to the understanding rather than to the ear, grows upon him with the study. Mr. Henschel's reading of the work was, upon the whole, good.

It may be considered by some

Quite Beneath the Dignity

of such an organization as the Boston Symphony orchestra to treat the public to such an effusion as Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette." The musician who looks through the orchestral works of this composer for any of real worth or value will set out on a fruitless search. But it is quite true that these works have always been favorably received by the undiscerning public. But there is much drollery of expression and exaggeration of effect in this particular work which may, perhaps, fairly entitle it to the rank of a musical bon mot, and if the audience last evening appeared to enjoy it hugely, it is no more than a hundred audiences in different parts of the world have done before them. But that is no reason why it should receive more applause than such a work as Brahms' serenade, for instance.

The closing feature of the programme, Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," is one of the works which have been instrumental in giving the composer such reputation as he enjoys. The themes of the overture are well worked out and produced a good impression. To sum up, the programme was of excellent character, and Mr. Henschel's conducting as a whole was as near perfection as that gentleman's present stage of development as an orchestral conductor will admit. With the exception of the hurried molto vivace movement in the opening overture, his tempi were well taken throughout. The programme for next week is as follows:

PROGRAMME.

Overture (L'hotellerie Portugaise).....Cherubini
Capriccio for pianoforte, in B minor.....Mendelssohn
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
Entreacte (Manfred).....Reinecke
Andante and Polonaise for pianoforte.....Chopin
Danse Macabre, poeme symphonique.....Saint-Saens
Solo, violin.....

Mr. B. Listemann.

Soloist, Miss Olga Von Radecki.

ARIA. (Rodelinda.)

HÄNDEL.

Mio caro bene, mio caro bene
Non ho piu affanni e pene,
Non ho piu pene al core
Vedendoti contento, nel seno
Mio gia sento che sol mi
Alberga amor.
Mio Caro bene
Non ho piu affanni e pene
Al cor.

TWO SONGS.

MENDELSSOHN.

a. ITALY.

Lovely thou art o'er mountain and dale.
Green are thy fields and perfumed thy
gale.

Far would I wander to call thee my home,
Ne'er from the land of song could I roam;
Wafted by zephyrs, soft music flies,
Gay as the sunbeams poured from thy
skies.

See the rich maize trees gracefully spread,
Proudly the aloe, too, raises its head;
Cypress and olive in stately array,
Maiden-like dance to the zephyr's soft
lay.

'Mid the bright leaves like Emerald green,
Sparkling, the bright gold Orange is seen.

Art thou, Posiedon, 'neath the wave's
breast

Breathing soft music to lull it to rest?
Heavenly garden that mirrors the sky,
Where are thy tempests, where do they
fly?

Watching thee ever, still would I be.
Where thou, Parthenope, stillest the sea;
E'en as thou calmest the billows to rest,
Banish the tumult that reigns in my breast.

b. THE CHARMER.

Now the dreary winter flies,
Smiling spring again advances;
Gliding down from azure skies,
Greeting all with cheerful glances.
See how every verdant spray,
Crowned with blossoms, thrills with
gladness,
Now the lovely bride of May
Comes to banish gloom and sadness.

Now the flower that rears its head,
Seems to feel itself protected;
Filled with dew, with odours fed,
Not the smallest blooms neglected.
Urged by secret heavenly power
They perform their vital duties;
Mountain, forest, vale and bower,
All expand their latent beauties.

Thus the joyous work of Spring,
Wrought in silence, still advances:
Bowers bloom, and woodlands ring,
Charmed by her inspiring glances.
As, when dreary Winter flies,
Spring dispels his gloom of sadness,
So, thy smiles and beaming eyes
Warm and charm the heart to gladness.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Weber's Masterpiece and a Recent Criticism.

Selections from Handel, Brahm and Gounod.

A Thoroughly Enjoyable Evening-- The Next Performance.

The programme for the fourth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, at Music Hall Saturday evening, opened with Weber's masterpiece, the overture to "Der Freischuetz." Weber began the composition of the opera in July, 1817, and finished the overture, which, written after all the rest of the work was completed, is an epitome of opera, May 13, 1820. It was a year later when the work was first heard in public. Sir Julius Benedict, in his recent contribution to the "Great Musicians" series, gives the following account of the production of the overture, June 18, 1821, at Berlin:

"The musicians gradually took their places; the din and noise of the immense audience subsided; every look was directed to the orchestra, and, with the clock striking seven, the composer limped to his seat. Though small of stature, lame and ungainly, he had a great deal of dignity, and in that irregular face there was a mixture of intelligence, enthusiasm and sensibility, which made you forget his shortcomings. The applause on his entering the orchestra was deafening and lasted several minutes. The students greeted their favorite song-poet with cheers, and there was on the part of the public in general a most genial disposition in favor of Weber.

Since Beethoven's "Fidelio," only feeble, unmeaning works had been produced in Germany, with the single exception of Spohr's "Faust" and "Zemires and Azor," which, though replete with beauties, never became really popular. The subject also of the new opera was well chosen and thoroughly German, and to hear a more perfect execution of the overture than on that memorable evening would be difficult.

Weber, though conducting with a very small baton, and seemingly only indicating the change of time of the lights and shades of his noble composition, had nevertheless the most perfect control over the band. The effect of his scoring, the contrasts between the calm of the introduction and the bloom and awe of the unearthly element which interrupts it, the fire of the allegro, the charm of that heavenly melody which once heard can never be forgotten, the irresistible climax at the end, found worthy interpreters in the Berlin orchestra, and to the breathless silence which prevailed during the performance there followed

A Storm of Applause.

such as I never heard before, nor shall hear again. In vain were the repeated bows of the hero of the evening and his endeavors to go on with the next piece. At last, though reluctantly, he yielded, and a second performance of the whole overture, if possible even better than the first, enhanced the impression. The only trouble with the performance of this work was the extremely rapid tempo taken for the second movement of the overture, which caused many of the passages to whirl along with a great lack of clearness."

An aria from Handel's opera "Rodelinda," which was written in 1725, stood second upon the programme, and brought before the audience Miss Henrietta Beebe as soloist. The quaint, but melodious old passages were given in a delightful manner by the soloist. Her rich and pure notes, as clear as a bell in the upper register, together with her pure enunciation and fine delivery, completely captivated her audience, and she was enthusiastically recalled, both at this time and when, later in the evening she sang two songs by Mendelssohn. The last were accompanied on the piano by Georg Henschel, and were followed by a storm of applause.

The principal feature of the evening was Brahms' serenade in D, opus. 11. Although the serenade in D was written before the composer attained his present pre-eminent position among modern composers, it is nevertheless one of his most individual works. Brahms has carried the Schumann school to its deepest and highest development. His works are not always pleasing on first hearing, and are not calculated to be popular with the multitude; but when the musician takes the pains to examine and to analyze, the consistent beauty and wealth of thought, appealing to the understanding rather than to the ear, grows upon him with the study. Mr. Henschel's reading of the work was, upon the whole, good.

It may be considered by some

Quite Beneath the Dignity

of such an organization as the Boston Symphony orchestra to treat the public to such an effusion as Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette." The musician who looks through the orchestral works of this composer for any of real worth or value will set out on a fruitless search. But it is quite true that these works have always been favorably received by the undiscerning public. But there is much drollery of expression and exaggeration of effect in this particular work which may, perhaps, fairly entitle it to the rank of a musical bon mot, and if the audience last evening appeared to enjoy it hugely, it is no more than a hundred audiences in different parts of the world have done before them. But that is no reason why it should receive more applause than such a work as Brahms' serenade, for instance.

The closing feature of the programme, Goldmark's overture, "Sakuntala," is one of the works which have been instrumental in giving the composer such reputation as he enjoys. The themes of the overture are well worked out and produced a good impression. To sum up, the programme was of excellent character, and Mr. Henschel's conducting as a whole was as near perfection as that gentleman's present stage of development as an orchestral conductor will admit. With the exception of the hurried molto vivace movement in the opening overture, his tempi were well taken throughout. The programme for next week is as follows:

PROGRAMME.

Overture (L'hotellerie Portugaise).....Cherubini
Capriccio for pianoforte, in B minor.....Mendelssohn
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
Entreacte (Manfred).....Reinecke
Andante and Polonaise for pianoforte.....Chopin
Danse Macabre, poeme symphonique.....Saint-Saens
Solo, violin.....

Mr. B. Listemann.

Soloist, Miss Olga Von Radecki.

Enough of the "to bees," let me turn to my "has been." This program was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday:

Overture, "Freischütz" Weber
Aria, "Rodelinda" Handel
Miss Henrietta Beebe.

Serenade in D, op. 11 Brahms
Allegro molto.—Scherzo. (Allegro non troppo.)—
Adagio non troppo.—Menuetto I. II.—
Scherzo. (Allegro.)—Rondo. (Allegro.)—
Funeral March of a Marionette Gounod
Songs with Piano.

(a) Italy. } Mendelssohn
(b) The Charmer. }
Miss Beebe.

Overture, "Sakuntala" Goldmark

Almost every part of the performance was well done. The Brahms work seemed to be especially a labor of love with Mr. Henschel, and, as regards its tempi his opinions are almost ex cathedra. The Freischütz overture was given with the most romantic coloring possible, and without a break. Miss Beebe's singing of the Handelian aria was excellent, her phrasing being very neat and artistic, and her voice sweet and penetrating in every part. Her highest register was used with telling effect. Her singing of Mendelssohn's Charmer was also very tasteful, but her enunciation was very unclear. This was especially the case with Mendelssohn's Italy, always one of the most trivial of Mendelssohn's songs. In this she was throaty in tone as well as indistinct in words, and also took considerable liberty with the tempo. Mr. Henschel accompanied excellently, but the climax of the song which alludes to the wild billows which are supposed to be raging in the breast of the singer, nevertheless seemed utterly inadequate. The "billows" aforesaid seemed to be not much larger than the ripples of a respectable duck pond. It is, however, my pleasant duty to record that Miss Beebe won a most enthusiastic recall.

The serenade was so free from faults that it seems almost hypocritical to say that the violins were once or twice (in the first movement and in the second minuet) over-impetuous in their attack, anticipating in instances the beat of the conductor, and the rapid violin figure which comes against the horn theme in the same minuet was also unclear.

I can joyfully exclaim, "I told you so" about the Gounod March. The audience actually tried to force an encore. "A little nonsense now and then, is pleasing to the best of men"—even to Boston symphony-goers.

But to me the gorgeous Sakuntala overture was the crown of all. It was given with that grandeur and nobility which is the conductor's best vein, and the orchestra worked together with splendid power.

The program was one of the best selected of the course, thus far—the great intellectual emotional thoughts of Brahms, and the pomp of Goldmark, alternating pleasantly with the romantic vein of Weber, the lyric simplicity and elegance of Mendelssohn, and the humor of Gounod. May it be ever thus.

L. C. E.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fourth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, on Saturday evening, may be considered as one of those exceptions which "prove the rule"—it was a symphony concert without a symphony. In place of this usual distinguishing feature of the programme there was substituted a suite of a half dozen movements by Brahms, his opus 11, to which he has given the title "serenade," a term which probably fits it better than any other, since the form and style of the work correspond very nearly with the instrumental serenata of the old classic composers. While, with respect to the development of its several movements and in the character of many of its themes, it may be called light music, its general treatment is after the composer's usual fashion—abstruse, intellectual, theoretical, rather than direct, emotional and practical, by which latter term we would distinguish all good music that appeals to the educated ear by means of a melodic and harmonic language universally understood. This is about equivalent to saying that the work, on a first hearing at least, is largely unintelligible and not enjoyable; and in truth, if the very critical audience which listened to it on Saturday night may be considered a competent judge, this is true, as is evident from the feeble, uncertain and perfunctory character of the applause which it was awarded. The medium of expression which the composer employs in this work may some time be as eloquent to the musical world as it doubtless is to himself, but at present the proportion of those who can be often moved by it to any feeling above puzzled curiosity and wonder is very small. Musical people, as a rule, have not as yet got "educated" by the "music of the future" up to that point where they may enjoy passage after passage bereft of all tonality by meandering through doors of modulation, around corners of accidentals and through mazes of chromatics that lead nowhere in particular, unless it be to the realm of giddiness. They long occasionally to come out into the sunlight or emerge upon some scene where recognizable objects may be viewed grouped or marshalled somewhat according to nature and the understood laws of unity and symmetry. There is so much of this ultra-modern kind of writing in the Brahms serenade that, with its inordinate length, its total effect is wearisome, in spite of the many beauties with which it is studded. These beauties even the most conservative hearer can hardly fail to appreciate; as, for instance, the charming bursts of melody adorned and accentuated by subtle effects of instrumental coloring, and the many original thematic conceits developed into forms of exquisite grace and fraught with poetic meaning. These portions of the work by themselves are sufficient to justify the composer's peculiar claims to genius, and make one the more ready to confess that the obscurity of much of his writing may be less the fault of the composer than the misfortune of his critics. The prevailing character of the music is of the gypsy type, and in places there are very evident imitations of the primitive instruments formerly used by strolling minstrel bands.

The other instrumental numbers of the programme were Weber's "Freischütz" overture, with which the concert opened, Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette," and the noble "Sakuntala" overture, by Goldmark, which was the closing piece. These all were played in a manner well-nigh faultless. Gounod's whimsical conceit, aside from its humorous character, was well worthy a place on the programme on its musical merits, for, so far from being nonsense, it is bright and tuneful, and, in a word, a charming bit of orchestral writing. It is to be regretted that the Goldmark overture is not oftener heard here. At this concert it was especially welcome as furnishing a strong contrast to the music of Brahms; so straightforward is it in its development, so full of fire and passion, and yet so heroic in its dignity, and presenting as it does such grand climaxes and such splendid effects of harmony.

Miss Henrietta Beebe, soprano, was the soloist of the evening. She sang an aria from Handel's "Rodelinda," with orchestral accompaniment, and Mendelssohn's songs, "Italy" and "The Charmer," Mr. Henschel accompanying with the piano. The lady made a very favorable impression, and was recalled after both her appearances. Of her singing we are inclined to say much the same as we said when she appeared two or three weeks ago in the Old Bay State course. Her voice is very sweet and pure, generally true in intonation, and of good carrying power, and it has considerable richness of timbre. In using it the singer shows a good deal of natural musical feeling and gives evidence of careful training and practice, but she does not sing with the facility, smoothness and command of varied resources that mark the artist of the first rank. Her efforts, however, are already thoroughly pleasing, and doubtless she is capable of profiting much with added experience in singing before the public.

For the next concert Miss Olga von Radecki, pianist, will be the soloist, and the following programme will be performed:—

Overture ("L'hotellerie Portugaise"), Cherubini; capriccio for pianoforte, in B minor, Mendelssohn; symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, Beethoven; entrance ("Mantred"), Reinecke; andante and polonaise for pianoforte, Chopin; "Danse Macarbes," poeme symphonique, Saint-Saens.

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture. (Freischuetz).....Weber.
Aria. (Rodelinda).....Handel.
Miss Henrietta Beebe.
Serenade in D, op. 11.....Brahms.
Allegro molto.—Scherzo. (Allegro non troppo).—
Adagio non troppo.—Menuetto I. II.—
Scherzo. (Allegro).—Rondo. (Allegro).—
Funeral March of a Marionette.....Gounod.
Songs with Piano.
(a) Italy
(b) The Charmer }.....Mendelssohn.
Miss Beebe.
Overture. (Sakuntala).....Goldmark.

The sermon which could be preached from the above text would be a moralizing upon the fact that even in a Symphony concert, the lightest music is the best beloved. Brahms is not liked by Boston Brahmins, and Gounod's airy burlesque distances Goldmark's sumptuous overture. The performance of last night was a notably fine one. The fidelity to some difficult scores cannot be too highly commended. If repeats are called for they are made; if harps or contra-bassoons are required, their place is not filled with piano or by a transposition to the ordinary fugotto.

The selection from Rodelinda was finely sung by Miss Beebe. Her sweet voice and excellent phrasing told finely in this number. The accompaniment, which boded trouble at the rehearsal, went well at the concert. The second of the Mendelssohn songs also was well given save in the unclear pronunciation. We regret that we cannot speak as highly of the singing of Italy. Not only was the time taken in a very capricious manner, but the tones were throaty and the words utterly unintelligible. The climax, too, where Parthenope is invited to calm the wild tempest, was weak. It is one of the lightest of Mendelssohn's Lieder. It is bad enough that Mendelssohn has made Neptune (or Poseidon) a rather frivolous and melodic character, but the vocalist should not reduce his sovereignty to a mere puddle by a sweet and powerless ending. The Brahms Serenade was played in an excellent manner, and was strong in contrast with the very light Haydn symphony of last week. Brahms is the true musician of the future, not that he attempts to bolster up his music with dogmatic theories, but he, more than almost any other, presents to the auditor a combination of the intellectual and the emotional—the highest enjoyment of music. The true outcome of Schumann is to be found in Brahms. The drone, and the characteristic effects of the first movements, were brought out with much taste, and in the heavy rhythm—octave skips—of the Scherzo the strings played as one man. The horns and wood-wind were very smooth in the adagio, but in the second minuet the rapid violin figure against the theme of the horns was somewhat blurred, and the attack was a trifle ahead of the conductor's beat, which also was the case with one or two impetuous violinists in the first movement. The bassoons were excellent in marking the swinging rhythm of the first minuet. The last movement seems to us the least powerful of the great work. It was played with the necessary brusque energy. As we expected, the quaint March created the greatest enthusiasm. It is well to brighten the programmes with such works. The breaking of the marionette, the jerky funeral procession, the halt at the inn, the consolation which came in liquid form, and the resumption of the march were all well drawn in the varied tempi, and odd instrumental coloring. The gorgeous Sakuntala Overture was perhaps the finest performance of the evening, the shading and gradual working up to the grandiose climax being thoroughly artistic.

The programme for next week is a particularly well-chosen one, many schools of composition being given in pleasing alternation. Miss Olga von Radecki is to be the soloist, and the concert will be preceded by the usual Friday afternoon public rehearsal. The following is the list of pieces:

Overture (L'hôtelier portugaise).....Cherubini
Capriccio for Pianoforte, in B minor.....Mendelssohn
Andante; Allegro con fuoco.
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—Larghetto.
Scherzo. (Allegro).—Allegro molto.
Entr'acte. (Manfred).....Reinecke
Andante and Polonaise for Pianoforte.....Chopin
Danse Macabre, poème symphonique.....Saint-Saëns
Solo Violin: Mr. B. Listemann.

The Fourth Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, the programme being one of strong contrasts, and of especial interest on account of the first performance here of the Serenade in D (op. 11) by Brahms. The work includes the following movements, namely: Allegro molto; scherzo (allegro non troppo); adagio non troppo; menuetto I, II; scherzo (allegro); rondo (allegro). As a whole, the work is a trifle wearying, and the listener is apt to feel that it is an effort to give to it that degree of attention necessary to comprehend it fully. This is especially the case in the opening movement, and it is not until the menuetto is reached that the music appears to give genuine satisfaction. This movement is a very quaint one and was finely given, the piece in its entirety being rendered well. Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette" was played admirably, its fine humor being interpreted with excellent effect. The other orchestral numbers were Weber's overture to "Freischuetz" and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. Mr. Georg Henschel conducted the performances in his usual manner and also rendered the pianoforte accompaniments for Mendelssohn's songs, "Italy" and "The Charmer," which were sung by Miss Henrietta Beebe. In addition to these songs Miss Beebe sang an aria from Handel's "Rodelinda." She was in good voice and her selections were given very artistically and to the manifest satisfaction of the audience. The programme for the fifth concert, on Saturday evening next, will be as follows: Overture (L'hôtelier portugaise), Cherubini; Capriccio for pianoforte in B minor, andante, allegro con fuoco, Mendelssohn; Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, adagio molto, allegro con brio, larghetto, scherzo, (allegro)—allegro molto, Beethoven; Entr'acte (Manfred), Reinecke; Andante and polonaise for pianoforte, Chopin; Danse Macabre, poème symphonique, Saint-Saëns; solo violin, Mr. B. Listemann. Soloist, Miss Olga Von Radecki.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fourth concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was—
Overture to "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Aria from "Rodelinda".....Handel
Serenade in D, Op. 11.....Brahms
Funeral March of a Marionette.....Gounod
Songs: {a. Italy }.....Mendelssohn
{b. The Charmer }
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Miss Henrietta Beebe was the singer.

We cannot remember to have heard the beautiful and poetic opening to the "Freischütz" overture more admirably played by the horns. The sforzando toward the end, which is too often coarsely overdone, was played with all due delicacy. The strings might have been hushed to a more gentle pianissimo, but, as it was, they did not obscure the horns unpleasantly. The allegro was given with great fire. One point, which was probably noticed by musicians only, is interesting to record; our orchestra is probably the first in this country to play the famous "E-flat-D" on the trombones exactly as the passage stands in Weber's score. Weber wrote the passage for a bass trombone, an instrument which has for some time been obsolete in all orchestras outside of Germany, and these two notes do not exist in the scale of the ordinary tenor slide-trombone, nor in that of the tenor trombone with three pistons; hence it happens that, in orchestras where the tenor trombone is used instead of the bass, this passage has to be played an octave higher. The accomplished third trombone player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra (who uses the tenor trombone with pistons) conceived the happy idea of having a fourth piston added to his instrument, thus filling up the gap between low B-flat and E-natural which occurs in the scale of the ordinary tenor trombone, and giving the instrument the full scale of the bass trombone in its lower register. This sort of intelligent enterprise should always be applauded. Apropos of the allegro of the "Freischütz" overture, would it not be interesting for once to make the experiment of following Wagner's suggestion about the final peroration? Wagner takes the accent mark in the score, over the last great C-major chord before the final jubilant appearance of Agathe's melody, to be really a diminuendo mark; he consequently begins the melody in question piano, instead of fortissimo, as is usually done, and arrives at the closing fortissimo by a gradual crescendo. We are by no means persuaded that Wagner's opinion on this passage is a sound one, but it would be interesting to have the experiment tried.

Miss Beebe sang the thrice-beautiful Handel aria in exquisite style; in face of such singing criticism seems almost impertinent, and yet there is a certain titanic vastness in some of Handel's melodies, notably in those in which warmth of sentiment predominates, that makes almost any singer seem small and puny in comparison with her task. One feels, that such music can be adequately sung only by a woman of the classic, heroic stamp—by an Antigone or a Consuelo.

Brahms's Serenade, a long composition in six elaborate movements, was heard here for the first time. Probably no new composition that has been played here for a long time has given rise to such widely divergent comment. We greatly fear that the majority of the audience found it terribly heavy and indigestible—indeed, we have heard some very hard epithets applied to it. To us it seemed wholly admirable and enjoyable, even at a single hearing. The composer is in quite as grim earnest as is his wont, and shrinks back before no difficulty. But we can recall no modern orchestral work of serious import in which such earnest genius and profound thought have clothed themselves in so entirely musical a shape. It is profound, if you will, but not obscure; involved at times, but never ugly; serious, and with a very grim seriousness, too, but neither doleful nor morbid—"the miner's lamp does not go out" in it, as Schumann would have said. [May we have an early opportunity of hearing this remarkable work again! It was admirably played. Gounod's quaint little conceit, "Funeral march of a Marionette," was charmingly given, and greatly enjoyed. Miss Beebe's singing of the Mendelssohn songs was well-nigh perfect. A superb performance of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" closed the concert. We noticed that Mr. Henschel used the revised edition of this overture, in which the composer has slightly altered and much improved the closing measures. The work, as a whole, still fails to make the impression of greatness upon us, in spite of the undeniable melodiousness of its leading themes, and the prevailing gorgeousness of the orchestration. Its poetic essence has rather a theatrical (Frenchy) flavor, and many passages are not quite free from vulgarity. Yet it is undoubtedly a strongly effective composition, the orchestration in itself being worthy very serious study.

The programme for the fifth concert will be: Overture to "L'hôtelier Portugaise," Cherubini; Capriccio in B minor for pianoforte, Mendelssohn; Symphony in D, No. 2, Beethoven; Entr'acte from "Manfred," Reinecke; Andante and Polonaise, Chopin; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saëns. Miss Olga von Radecki will be the pianist.

Musical.

FOURTH SYMPHONY (SIC) CONCERT.

Overture (Freischuetz).....Weber
Aria ("Rodelinda").....Handel
Serenade in D, op. 11.....Brahms divided into the following movements: Allegro molto.—Scherzo. (Allegro non troppo.) Adagio non troppo.—Menuetto I. II. Scherzo. (Allegro).—Rondo. (Allegro.)
Funeral March of a Marionette.....Gounod
Songs with piano { (a) "Italy" }.....Mendelssohn
{ (b) "The Charmer" }
Overture (Sakuntala).....Goldmark

It will be seen from the above programme that this was a symphony concert without a symphony,—a church without its steeple, as it were. Even so jolly a paradox may have been characteristically lauded by Mr. Henschel's fashionable audience, when the prosy strains of Brahms' serenade rendered the entire concert a lamentably symphonic affair. To attempt a critical analysis of such a complicated piece of musical architecture upon a single hearing, is

MUSIC.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture. (Freischuetz).....Weber.
Aria. (Rodelinda).....Handel.
Miss Henrietta Beebe.
Serenade in D, op. 11.....Brahms.
Allegro molto.—Scherzo. (Allegro non troppo.)—
Adagio non troppo.—Menuetto I. II.—
Scherzo. (Allegro.)—Rondo. (Allegro.)—
Funeral March of a Marionette.....Gounod.
Songs with Piano.
(a) Italy {Mendelssohn.
(b) The Charmer {
Miss Beebe.
Overture. (Sakuntala).....Goldmark.

The sermon which could be preached from the above text would be a moralizing upon the fact that even in a Symphony concert, the lightest music is the best beloved. Brahms is not liked by Boston Brahmins, and Gounod's airy burlesque distances Goldmark's sumptuous overture. The performance of last night was a notably fine one. The fidelity to some difficult scores cannot be too highly commended. If repeats are called for they are made; if harps or contra-bassoons are required, their place is not filled with piano or by a transposition to the ordinary fagotto.

The selection from Rodelinda was finely sung by Miss Beebe. Her sweet voice and excellent phrasing told finely in this number. The accompaniment, which boded trouble at the rehearsal, went well at the concert. The second of the Mendelssohn songs also was well given save in the unclear pronunciation. We regret that we cannot speak as highly of the singing of Italy. Not only was the time taken in a very capricious manner, but the tones were throaty and the words utterly unintelligible. The climax, too, where Parthenope is invited to calm the wild tempest, was weak. It is one of the lightest of Mendelssohn's Lieder. It is bad enough that Mendelssohn has made Neptune (or Poseidon) a rather frivolous and melodic character, but the vocalist should not reduce his sovereignty to a mere puddle by a sweet and powerless ending. The Brahms Serenade was played in an excellent manner, and was strong in contrast with the very light Haydn symphony of last week. Brahms is the true musician of the future, not that he attempts to bolster up his music with dogmatic theories, but he, more than almost any other, presents to the auditor a combination of the intellectual and the emotional—the highest enjoyment of music. The true outcome of Schumann is to be found in Brahms. The drone, and the characteristic effects of the first movements, were brought out with much taste, and in the heavy rhythm—octave skips—of the Scherzo the strings played as one man. The horns and wood-wind were very smooth in the adagio, but in the second minuet the rapid violin figure against the theme of the horns was somewhat blurred, and the attack was a trifle ahead of the conductor's beat, which also was the case with one or two impetuous violinists in the first movement. The bassoons were excellent in marking the swinging rhythm of the first minuet. The last movement seems to us the least powerful of the great work. It was played with the necessary brusque energy. As we expected, the quaint March created the greatest enthusiasm. It is well to brighten the programmes with such works. The breaking of the marionette, the jerky funeral procession, the halt at the inn, the consolation which came in liquid form, and the resumption of the march were all well drawn in the varied tempi, and odd instrumental coloring. The gorgeous Sakuntala Overture was perhaps the finest performance of the evening, the shading and gradual working up to the grandiose climax being thoroughly artistic.

The programme for next week is a particularly well-chosen one, many schools of composition being given in pleasing alternation. Miss Olga von Radecki is to be the soloist, and the concert will be preceded by the usual Friday afternoon public rehearsal. The following is the list of pieces:

Overture (L'hôtellerie portugaise).....Cherubini
Capriccio for Pianoforte, in B minor.....Mendelssohn
Andante; Allegro con fuoco.
Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—Larghetto.
Scherzo. (Allegro.)—Allegro molto.
Entr'acte. (Manfred).....Reinecke
Andante and Polonaise for Pianoforte.....Chopin
Danse Macabre, poème symphonique.....Saint-Saëns
Solo Violin: Mr. B. Listemann.

The Fourth Symphony Concert.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall Saturday evening, the programme being one of strong contrasts, and of especial interest on account of the first performance here of the Serenade in D (op. 11) by Brahms. The work includes the following movements, namely: Allegro molto; Scherzo (allegro non troppo); adagio non troppo; menuetto I, II; Scherzo (allegro non troppo); rondo (allegro). As a whole, the work is a trifle wearying, and the listener is apt to feel that it is an effort to give to it that degree of attention necessary to comprehend it fully. This is especially the case in the opening movement, and it is not until the menuetto is reached that the music appears to give genuine satisfaction. This movement is a very quaint one and was finely given, the piece in its entirety being rendered well. Gounod's "Funeral March of a Marionette" was played admirably, its fine humor being interpreted with excellent effect. The other orchestral numbers were Weber's overture to "Freischuetz" and Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture. Mr. Georg Henschel conducted the performances in his usual manner and also rendered the pianoforte accompaniments for Mendelssohn's songs, "Italy" and "The Charmer," which were sung by Miss Henrietta Beebe. In addition to these songs Miss Beebe sang an aria from Handel's "Rodelinda." She was in good voice and her selections were given very artistically and to the manifest satisfaction of the audience. The programme for the fifth concert, on Saturday evening next, will be as follows: Overture (L'hôtellerie portugaise), Cherubini; Capriccio for pianoforte in B minor, andante, allegro con fuoco, Mendelssohn; Symphony in D, No. 2, op. 36, adagio molto, allegro con brio, larghetto, scherzo, (allegro)—allegro molto, Beethoven; Entr'acte (Manfred), Reinecke; Andante and polonaise for pianoforte, Chopin; Danse Macabre, poème symphonique, Saint-Saëns; solo violin, Mr. B. Listemann. Soloist, Miss Olga Von Radecki.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The programme of the fourth concert, given last Saturday evening in the Music Hall, was—
Overture to "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Aria from "Rodelinda".....Handel
Serenade in D, Op. 11.....Brahms
Funeral March of a Marionette.....Gounod
Songs: {a. Italy {Mendelssohn
{b. The Charmer {
Overture to "Sakuntala".....Goldmark
Miss Henrietta Beebe was the singer.

We cannot remember to have heard the beautiful and poetic opening to the "Freischütz" overture more admirably played by the horns. The sforzando toward the end, which is too often coarsely overdone, was played with all due delicacy. The strings might have been hushed to a more gentle pianissimo, but, as it was, they did not obscure the horns unpleasantly. The allegro was given with great fire. One point, which was probably noticed by musicians only, is interesting to record; our orchestra is probably the first in this country to play the famous "E-flat—D" on the trombones exactly as the passage stands in Weber's score. Weber wrote the passage for a bass trombone, an instrument which has for some time been obsolete in all orchestras outside of Germany, and these two notes do not exist in the scale of the ordinary tenor slide-trombone, nor in that of the tenor trombone with three pistons; hence it happens that, in orchestras where the tenor trombone is used instead of the bass, this passage has to be played an octave higher. The accomplished third trombone player in the Boston Symphony Orchestra (who uses the tenor trombone with pistons) conceived the happy idea of having a fourth piston added to his instrument, thus filling up the gap between low B-flat and E-natural which occurs in the scale of the ordinary tenor trombone, and giving the instrument the full scale of the bass trombone in its lower register. This sort of intelligent enterprise should always be applauded. Apropos of the allegro of the "Freischütz" overture, would it not be interesting for once to make the experiment of following Wagner's suggestion about the final peroration? Wagner takes the accent mark in the score, over the last great C-major chord before the final jubilant appearance of Agathe's melody, to be really a diminuendo mark; he consequently begins the melody in question piano, instead of fortissimo, as is usually done, and arrives at the closing fortissimo by a gradual crescendo. We are by no means persuaded that Wagner's opinion on this passage is a sound one, but it would be interesting to have the experiment tried.

Miss Beebe sang the thrice-beautiful Handel aria in exquisite style; in face of such singing criticism seems almost impertinent, and yet there is a certain titanic vastness in some of Handel's melodies, notably in those in which warmth of sentiment predominates, that makes almost any singer seem small and puny in comparison with her task. One feels that such music can be adequately sung only by a woman of the classic, heroic stamp—by an Antigone or a Consuelo.

Brahms's Serenade, a long composition in six elaborate movements, was heard here for the first time. Probably no new composition that has been played here for a long time has given rise to such widely divergent comment. We greatly fear that the majority of the audience found it terribly heavy and indigestible—indeed, we have heard some very hard epithets applied to it. To us it seemed wholly admirable and enjoyable, even at a single hearing. The composer is in quite as grim earnest as is his wont, and shrinks back before no difficulty. But we can recall no modern orchestral work of serious import in which such earnest genius and profound thought have clothed themselves in so entirely musical a shape. It is profound, if you will, but not obscure; involved at times, but never ugly; serious, and with a very grim seriousness, too, but neither doleful nor morbid—"the miner's lamp does not go out" in it, as Schumann would have said. [May we have an early opportunity of hearing this remarkable work again! It was admirably played. Gounod's quaint little conceit, "Funeral march of a Marionette," was charmingly given, and greatly enjoyed. Miss Beebe's singing of the Mendelssohn songs was well-nigh perfect. A superb performance of Goldmark's "Sakuntala" closed the concert. We noticed that Mr. Henschel used the revised edition of this overture, in which the composer has slightly altered and much improved the closing measures. The work, as a whole, still fails to make the impression of greatness upon us, in spite of the undeniable melodiousness of its leading themes, and the prevailing gorgeousness of the orchestration. Its poetic essence has rather a theatrical (Frenchy) flavor, and many passages are not quite free from vulgarity. Yet it is undoubtedly a strongly effective composition, the orchestration in itself being worthy very serious study.

The programme for the fifth concert will be: Overture to "L'hôtellerie Portugaise," Cherubini; Capriccio in B minor for pianoforte, Mendelssohn; Symphony in D, No. 2, Beethoven; Entr'acte from "Manfred," Reinecke; Andante and Polonaise, Chopin; "Danse Macabre," Saint-Saëns. Miss Olga von Radecki will be the pianist.

Musical.

FOURTH SYMPHONY (SIC) CONCERT.

Overture (Freischuetz).....Weber
Aria ("Rodelinda").....Handel
Serenade in D, op. 11.....Brahms
divided into the following movements: Allegro molto.—Scherzo, (Allegro non troppo.) Adagio non troppo.—Menuetto I. II. Scherzo. (Allegro.)—Rondo. (Allegro.)
Funeral March of a Marionette.....Gounod
Songs with piano { (a) "Italy" {Mendelssohn
{ (b) "The Charmer" {
Overture (Sakuntala).....Goldmark

It will be seen from the above programme that this was a symphony concert without a symphony,—a church without its steeple, as it were. Even so jolly a paradox may have been characteristically lauded by Mr. Henschel's fashionable audience, when the prosy strains of Brahms' serenade rendered the entire concert a lamentably symphonic affair. To attempt a critical analysis of such a complicated piece of musical architecture upon a single hearing, is not our present purpose. Suffice it to acknowledge that if a few more such orthodox selections are performed at this series of concerts, the benediction upon Mr. Higginson's munificent enterprise will be more speedily pronounced than is even now confidently anticipated. In its popular effect, we musicians to the contrary notwithstanding, it may be classed as one of the most stupid conceptions of a great mind ever presented at a symphony concert in this city. It was not even rendered the less tedious by the admirable reading which Mr. Henschel gave it. To the sincere, the unmusical person unembarrassed by the fashionable dictates and propensities of the audience even the beautiful adagio movement may have seemed something like the sapient musings of some brilliant idiot. Yet it is only the musical ignoramus who is supposed to think of Brahms as a Lancelot Gobbo in his profession. It is at least au fait to regard him as a mighty musician in all that the term implies; and we cheerfully admit the intrinsic beauty of the minuetti of the serenade as well high unsurpassed in any similar musical form. However as a tone poem more melancholy than Bunthorne's dreariest, or better as a piece of music—skeletal to ghastliness—scientifically orchestrated, yet with a profound fondness for the minor key such as we have never known equalled by any other composer, this Brahms serenade can be pronounced as excruciatingly a colossal production. There is a superfluous wealth of episode in the work. The intellectual qualities predominate in its treatment. The orchestration is masterly, and there is nothing lacking in a logical, often contrapuntal treatment of themes. It being a youthful opus, there is little of the plagiarism associated with it that sometimes accidentally emanates from Brahms, with all his intense individuality; yet the dark and cold and dreary day of Longfellow were of more sunshiny suggestiveness than is this serenade; as even Brahms' more conspicuous friend and admirer, Mr. Henschel, were just enough to concede. We were told by an eminent musician of the orchestra that thirty years will make a wondrous change in our views regarding Brahms' idiosyncrasies. Let us not run so unwelcome a risk. Let us die in peace, with none of the abortive transition to plague our life away, that might be effected by some of the so-called future school of music. If Brahms is, as he professes to be, a sincere and intelligent opponent of Wagner and his school, he might at least do his more renowned adversary the justice, not to imitate his least praiseworthy characteristics.

The idea of opening this concert with the hackneyed overture to "Freischuetz" was a characteristic one. To have placed at the wrong end of the programme that most soul-stirring and intellectual of modern overtures—Sakuntala—was not only characteristic, but it was worse and more of it. It is not to be taken for granted, however, that Mr. Henschel will always continue to make his fine qualities as a conductor all the more conspicuous by his short comings.

Proposing to discuss and form a sincere and friendly standpoint the latest and most welcome phase of Mr. Henschel's capability as a conductor, we nevertheless must first refer to the material that he has at his command. Some of it will rank with the most admirable in the world. In this connection especial credit is due the Listemans; also to that marvellous double bass virtuoso of the orchestra; to the quartette of horns, the first clarinetist, and probably ten or a dozen others to whom we have not listened with the critical attention that the more prominent members have elicited. Neither of the oboe performers fills the bill for an adequate orchestral service. We must repeat that the loss to the orchestra of such artists as De Ribas, Allen and Fries, who cannot afford to play at Mr. Higginson's prices, is an unfortunate one. Listen attentively to the first oboe player. He plays nervously; he shows a lack of experience; and his phrasing from a musical standpoint is ridiculous. The second oboe player produces a weak and squeaky tone. Probably both are as good musicians as any manager could obtain for the price that is paid. The wood-wind and the brass instruments play abominably out of tune. The gift of positive pitch would painfully suggest the deficiency; and it is a deficiency that can be remedied. The fault is partly with Mr. Henschel. He should see to it that the wood-wind instruments are adjusted to a uniform grade of pitch. Theodore Thomas was wont to do this, and Thomas was never half so gifted nor so able musically as Mr. Henschel. He was an exacting, over-bearing, ugly, obstinate and uncompromising drill-master, which Mr. Henschel is not. This was the secret of a success in Mr. Thomas to which actual musical merit as a conductor contributed comparatively but an insignificant share.

Speaking of intonation, we know from experience that that of the wood-wind in the Gewandhaus orchestra in Leipzig is uniformly accurate; so is that of the Thomas orchestra. Now if Mr. Henschel will investigate and exercise his authority, he will discover that, though the wind instruments in his orchestra are made in different countries and upon scales that vary in pitch from one-sixteenth to one-twelfth of a tone, the adjustment of the same to a uniform pitch is entirely practical.

He might also insist that there shall be no tuning of the instruments, except in the ante-rooms, during the concert. Thomas did this, and it has been the habit of nearly all great conductors to thus entertain a due regard for the musical susceptibility prevalent in the auditorium. It is a downright nuisance and nothing short of it to hear this scratching of fiddles and catawalling of oboes, clarinets and bas-oons upon the immediate conclusion of a beautiful symphonic movement or other work. We submit that the point is well and politely taken, and without the slightest lack of appreciation of Mr. Henschel's natural ability as a conductor, much less of his standing as a gentleman. He has rare advantages at his command aside from natural gifts. In regard to the advantages, Mr. Higginson's liberality has been unbounded; though the members of the orchestra have not by any means been the gainers by it.

To return to the concert; it was, generally speaking, a good one. The piccolo and flute were at discordant variance towards the close of the Gounod number; so were the wood-wind instruments at the opening of the first minuet, but otherwise the playing was exceptionally good. Miss Beebe sang very intelligently (nothing better), and the accompaniment contributed to her second song was so artistic as to rob her praiseworthy effort of most of its meagre charm. She was warmly applauded. The concert closed with a fine performance of the Sakuntala overture.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORGE HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

V. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (L'hôtellerie portugaise.)	CHERUBINI.
CAPRICCIO FOR PIANO-FORTE, in B minor. Andante; Allegro con fuoco.—	MENDELSSOHN.
SYMPHONY in D. No. 2, op. 36. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.—Larghetto.— Scherzo. (Allegro.)—Allegro molto.—	BEETHOVEN.
ENTR' ACTE. (Manfred.)	REINECKE.
ANDANTE AND POLONAISE FOR PIANO-FORTE.	CHOPIN.
DANSE MACABRE, POÈME SYMPHONIQUE.*	SAINT-SAËNS.

* See next page.

SOLOIST:

MISS OLGA VON RADECKI.

Miss Radecki will use a Chickering Piano.

DANSE MACABRE, POÈME SYMPHONIQUE. SAINT SAËNS.

Zig et Zig, la Mort en cadence,
Frappant une tombe avec son talon,
La Mort à minuit joue un air de danse,
Zig et Zig et Zag, sur son violon.

Le vent d'hiver souffle, et la nuit est sombre:
Des gémissements sortent des tilleuls;
Les squelettes blancs vont à travers l'ombre,
Courant et santant sous leur grands lincauls.

Zig et Zig et Zag, chacun se trémousse,
On entend claquer les os des danseurs.

* * * * *

Mais psit! tout à coup on quitte la ronde,
On se pousse, on fuit, le coq a chanté.

* * * * *

Henri Cazalis.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme performed at the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, on Saturday evening, was strong in the elements of what is best in music, without ever reaching that degree of profundity that to all save the student is equivalent to obscurity. On the other hand, while it was bright and entertaining to the best taste, it never descended to the trivial. In thus characterizing the programme we do not mean to make an exception of the ghostly "Danse Macabre" of Saint Saëns, which was its closing number. Realistic and grotesque as this work is, its striking beauties, aside from the ingenuity it reflects, are always apparent when it is given by a first-class orchestra and in accordance with the composer's directions; and as to the emotions it arouses, we are confident that no one was ever really depressed by it. On the contrary, its most usual effect is to draw from the hearer a little smile of amusement at its very grotesqueness. The only music that ever positively depresses is such as is either too weak to satisfy or too abstruse for comprehension. At the other end of the programme—the opening—stood Cherubini's overture, "L'Hôtellerie Portugaise," which has not been heard here before, at least in recent years. As a characteristic sample of the composer's style of orchestral writing, as well as from its intrinsic beauty, it well deserves an occasional place on our classical programmes. Very clear and in a sense simple in form, and not aspiring to any great height of eloquence, it has much of the statuesque dignity and symmetry that so distinguish the works of the old masters from the more florid and sensuous writings of modern composers. The overture, indeed, has a marked Beethovenish flavor, resulting from the subordination of continuous melody to the development and variation of themes and the expressive "conversations" between different classes of instruments. The symphony of the evening was Beethoven's No. 2, and the only other purely orchestral number not already mentioned was an entr'acte from the "Manfred" music of Reinecke. It is essentially a sweet, dreamy and exquisitely tender melody, with simple accompaniment, and played mostly piu mosso, the violins having their strings united. Its beauty is of the most refined type, the melody having a spiritual character that might be imagined as belonging to the warbling of an angel "from out the highest sphere." The piece was played with exquisite delicacy well befitting it. The other orchestral works were with very little exception played admirably well, particularly the overture and the Saint Saëns poème symphonique. The Beethoven symphony was given in a much more satisfactory manner than last year; indeed, remembering our adverse comments at that time, we should in fairness make our statement more unqualified and say in positive terms that the interpretation this year was in the main wholly satisfactory. It was amenable to criticism, if at all, only in minor details.

Miss Olga von Radecki, a young Russian pianist, a pupil of Mme. Clara Schumann and Joachim Raff, was the soloist of the evening. Her selections were Mendelssohn's piano-forte capriccio in B minor and Chopin's andante and polonaise for piano and orchestra, neither of them excessively difficult, but sufficiently so to give a pretty good test of a young pianist's mettle. The young lady evidently has not developed a definite style of her own, but it is equally evident that she has well laid her foundations for artistic success. In matters of technique she became so proficient that, with her careful and intelligent methods, her playing is interesting to all who admire accuracy and fluency in execution. The larger arts of expression,—the fire and commanding strength, as well as the subtler graces of style which reflect the individuality of the performer,—these are acquirements that come, if they come at all, in the majority of cases, only from much greater experience than Miss von Radecki has yet enjoyed. The young lady is very simple and modest in her carriage before her audience, and she made a very favorable impression, if that may be inferred from the fact that she was recalled after each of her performances.

The next concert will be a very notable occasion in our musical annals, as the prelude of Wagner's "Parsifal" will then be heard here for the first time. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist. The programme in full is as follows:—

Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; aria, Stradella; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann; aria, Mozart; prelude, "Parsifal," and "Huldigung's march," Wagner.

MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. Cherubini's overture, "L'hôtellerie Portugaise," opened the programme, and received a remarkably good interpretation. It was followed by Mendelssohn's capriccio for piano and orchestra in B minor, the solo part of which was performed by a new comer, Miss Olga von Radecki, a young lady who has evidently studied in a good school, who plays in a neat and delicate way, with great surety of touch, excellent phrasing and refined taste. She has no force, and is rather colorless in style, but possesses a fluent and graceful technique. Later in the evening she played Chopin's Spiato and Polonaise very prettily, but, as in the case of capriccio, without breadth, impressiveness or power. There is, however, something very attractive and interesting in the conscience she throws into her work; but considerably more of fire is needed in her methods before she can hope to take any position or to achieve any enviable rank in her art. She was very cordially applauded, and recalled after the polonaise. The symphony was Beethoven's, No. 2, in D. It was very well interpreted in the main, though with some rasping on the part of the strings and some untunefulness among the wood wind, two faults that have been unpleasantly prominent in all of these concerts thus far. An entr'acte to "Manfred," by Reinecke, was very expressively played, and was a redeeming point in the night's work of the strings. The whole ended with a spirited and a well-colored performance of Saint Saëns's "Danse Macabre." At the next concert the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal" will have its first hearing here. The symphony is to be Schumann's, in D-minor, No. 4. Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist.

LIST:

Y WINANT.

THE "PARSIFAL" PRELUDE.

The first hearing of the music of "Parsifal" in this city will be at the concert of the Boston symphony orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction, next Saturday evening, when the "Prelude" will be performed. The enterprise shown in the early presentation of this music is to be commended. The New York orchestral organization have given two other selections from "Parsifal" within the last week, but, save at Milwaukee, the "Prelude" will not be heard in this country previous to its presentation by Mr. Henschel's orchestra. As in former works, Wagner retains the plan of founding his compositions upon leading themes, or motifs, and in the prelude to "Parsifal" are found in strong relief the three leading motifs of the last work of the "master." The "love feast motif," the first of these, symbolizes the characteristic celebration by the knights of the Grail, and is given out by the strings and wood wind instruments in unison and octaves with a grand crescendo. Violin arpeggios break in upon the last note, and then the trumpets intone the original theme. The passage is then heard again a third higher, and the arpeggio accompaniment ends in a pianissimo. The character of this motif, as well as the remarkable union attempted between the keys of C minor and E minor, will be seen by the following:

No. 1. A.

No. 1. B.

The next, and last, leading motif of the work recalls the familiar "Lohengrin" theme, though it differs slightly from that so often heard in the most popular of the Wagner operas. It is delivered in harmony, the trumpets and trombones first giving it softly, and then in the crescendo the reed instruments are introduced.

No. 2.

The third, the Faith, motif is an exhibition of Wagner's ability in harmony and instrumental elaboration, the chant-like melody being treated in an imposing way by the orchestral combinations which present it. It is first uttered by the wood-wind instruments, and subsequently taken up by the strings and brass in turn.

No. 3.

The prelude concludes with a repetition and interchange of these three motives, the faith motif always being closely after the ascending chords representing the Holy Grail.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction, and assisted by Miss Olga Von Radecki, a young Russian pianist, and a pupil of Mme. Clara Schumann, as the soloist, gave the fifth concert of the series, in Music Hall, on Saturday evening. Cherubini's overture, "The Portuguese Inn," was the opening piece, which received an excellent rendering at the hands of the orchestra. Next was given Mendelssohn's Capriccio for piano and orchestra in B minor, which was played in excellent style by Miss Von Radecki. Later in the evening this lady gave other selections from Chopin, and continued the favorable impression made by her in the first number. The Symphony was Beethoven's No. 2 in D, and which was performed as usual with effect by the orchestra. At the next concert Miss Emily Winant will be the soloist, and the following programme will be heard: Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; aria, Stradella; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann; aria, Mozart; prelude, "Parsifal," and "Huldigung's marsch," Wagner.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Prelude (Parsifal), first time.....Wagner.
Aria.....Stradella.
Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann.
Introduction; Allegro; Romance; Scherzo and Finale.
Aria.....Mozart.
Prelude (Parsifal).....Wagner.
Huldigungs Marsch.....Wagner.

The features in the above programme especially awakened the interest of calloused symphonic auditors. The performance of a selection from the new Wagnerian work, and its repetition in the style of the Von Bülow concerts abroad. Whether the audience were much wiser after the repetition of the work may be questioned. It was admirably performed, with that nicety of shading and that firmness of attack which has become a characteristic of the orchestra. It has much of the high pressure ecstasy which has become associated with Wagnerian work. Strings are frequently used in highest position, long sustained chords abound, trumpets and brasses generally give out heroic motifs. At the very beginning a characteristic theme is given on the strings; at the close a motif is given in the horn, and woodwind, against tremoli in the violins. Without a consultation of the score, the meaning and even the coherency of the work are lost even upon the most musical auditor. There is much that is heroic, and there is counterpoint which at the best seems vague. The chief theme is more effective than any of those used in the Trilogy. Miss Winant sang with her usual rich, full style, but her selections were scarcely such as to awaken great enthusiasm. Voi che Sapete loses greatly when transplanted from its operatic surroundings, although it served to display the mastery of the legato singing, and brought out Miss Winant's deepest register finely. The Stradella aria proved to be the well-known Pity, ah Saviour, which is said once to have saved the life of the composer by melting the hearts of two bravos who were hired to assassinate him. It is quite in the old Italian vein, with plenty of figured bass, mostly for 'cello accompaniment. It was heard at its best in Miss Winant's rendering, but its rather formal repetitions and prolixity made its effect less than that which a more modern song would have attained. The Huldigungs Marsch was given with most stirring force and pomp. In such grandeur few can approach the effects of the master of Bayreuth. The sudden change from the majestic introduction to the smooth melody of the central theme, and the gradual working up of this to a majestic climax were wonderfully rendered.

The Symphony was also well performed, save that in the first allegro, the strings blurred somewhat. It is not the finest of Schumann's symphonies, yet its continuity keeps up a sustained interest. One movement leads into another, and the four movements are links of a single chain, welded yet more close by the reappearance of the theme, from the first part in the introduction to the finale. The Romanza has all the characteristics of a serenade, and is the most popular part of the work, although the grandeur of the first and last movements cannot be over-estimated spite of the uncouth and rough effects which are constantly and intentionally introduced. The rush of the strings at the final stretto was thoroughly exciting and excellently done. The B flat symphony would be heartily welcome as the more polished work of the two, and we hope that it may soon be performed. Mr. B. Listemann is to be the soloist at the next concert, which offers the following programme:

Overture (Academic Festival).....Brahms.
Concert Pathétique pour Violon.....Ernst.
(In one movement.) Allegro moderato.
Symphony in C.....Mozart.
(No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Adagio; Allegro spiritoso.—Poco Adagio.
Menuetto.—Presto.
Allegro Vivace and Finale (Prometheus).....Beethoven.
Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for Violin.....Vieuxtemps.
Overture (Lac des Fées).....Auber.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Fifth Programme of the Present Season's Series. Herald

The fifth of the present season's series of programmes by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given, with the assistance of Miss Olga von Radecki, pianist, at Music Hall last evening, the selections being as follows:

Overture "L'hotelier portugaise".....Cherubini
Capriccio for pianoforte, in B minor.....Mendelssohn
Symphony in D. No. 2, op. 36.....Beethoven
Entracte, "Maufréd".....Reinecke
Andante and Polonaise for pianoforte.....Chopin
Danse Macabre.....Saint-Saëns

The soloist of the evening, Miss Radecki, is of Austrian descent, but was born at Riga, in Russia, where her parents still live, and where she began her musical studies. She subsequently continued her preparation for the concert stage at Stuttgart, remaining two years, and then at Frankfurt, where she was under the instruction of Mme. Clara Schumann and Joachim Raff. She came directly to Boston upon the conclusion of her studies, and soon found a friendly recognition of her abilities. Her merits were instantly recognized by the audience and she was listened to with marked attention as soon as she touched the keys. Her playing indicates a true artist's instinct, and shows that her studies have been intelligently directed and industriously pursued. Her fingering shows her to be a mistress of the technique of piano playing, and the finish and elegance of her phrasing gives genuine pleasure. Her performance of the andante of the Mendelssohn number was full of sentiment, and allegro confuoca was given with a dash and brilliancy showing an admirable conception and good reserve force. In the Chopin selection the performer was equally successful, and she was so generally pleasing in this effort that she was recalled with enthusiastic applause to bow her thanks. Lack of space precludes any extended comment upon the presentation of the orchestral selections, and, indeed, little but general commendation is called for. The cherubini overture gave the strings fine opportunities, which were well improved, and the delightful "Maufréd" entracte music was played, with a fine appreciation of its beauties. The larghetto of the symphony was one of the most enjoyable portions of the entire programme, and the symphony, as a whole, has rarely had a better rendering than on this occasion. Whole legions of goblins and spirits filled the air as the unearthly measures of the "Danse Macabre" were given out by the players, and their revelries were made almost a reality by the brilliant fashion in which Saint-Saëns' odd conceit was presented. Miss Emily Winant, contralto, will be the soloist of the coming week, and will sing an aria of Stradella, and one of Mozart. The "Parsifal" prelude will be played twice at the opening and repeated after the symphony, which will be the Schumann in D minor, No. 4, op. 120. The Wagner "Huldigungs Marsch" will also be played.

76
LETTER FROM MR. TRACY.

THE HIGGINSON-HENSCHEL CONCERTS; AMERICAN COMPOSERS; CHRISTINE NILSSON; AND SO FORTH. Idio Dec 1882

The concert season was formally inaugurated at Music Hall, Saturday evening, October 7, by the Boston Orchestra, or what is known here as the Higginson-Henschel Orchestral Combination, the same organization which caused so much excitement in musical circles last season. The ill feeling engendered then, not against the members of the orchestra, but against its projector and conductor, still exists in a more extended, virulent form. However, this feeling would not have cropped out quite so strongly if the sale of tickets had been conducted on a square, honorable basis of equality. The great crowd of interested people who stood in line for many hours waiting to attend the advertised sale of season tickets, showed conclusively the people were interested and eager to secure good seats for this year's course of concerts.

To look at that vast crowd, many of whom stood in line all night, would naturally lead you to the conclusion that Music Hall was not half large enough to accommodate the lovers of orchestral music in Boston. But such was not the fact; for at the first concert, at least half the seats on the floor of the hall were unoccupied. Why was this? It was not for the lack of lovers of good music or musical appreciation, as some are inclined to believe, but mainly was brought about by disgust at the unfair treatment received in the distribution of season tickets. If Mr. Higginson's enterprise should prove a partial failure this season, he has only himself to blame, and not the people, because they came forward to buy tickets, and would have done so with a fair show of getting such tickets as they wanted.

It is, perhaps, unfair to criticise closely a first performance of any new organization, although the boasted ability and great self-assurance of the conductor warrants and invites such criticism. While some things were well done, for which we are always willing to give due credit, there were others not so well done, and which one is not inclined to spend much taffy on. The programme was well arranged, commencing with the overture "Dedication of the House," receiving most excellent treatment by conductor and orchestra, showing to good advantage the strength and capacity of the new company, — for there are many new members in the organization. Schumann's A minor concerto for pianoforte and orchestra was the second number, bringing Carl Baermann forward as the soloist of the evening.

Now Mr. Baermann is a remarkably fine pianist, but that does not prevent my taking exception to the hurried manner in which he took up the last movement.

Every great artist has an undoubted right to take such tempo as in his judgment he feels himself equal to carrying out, provided such tempo is not incompatible with the composer's ideas and designs, which are usually known by certain marks and signs he prefixes to his works. Now each movement of Schumann's concerto has the exact metronomic time marked upon it, and I wonder Mr. Baermann should take to himself quite another. The effect was like a running fire to see which should go the fastest and come to the end first. However, both kept very well together, but the true musical idea and effect as designed by Schumann was entirely lost. In the playing of Liszt's Eighth Rhapsody Mr. Baermann showed his immense technique again; but had the author been present he would have stalked out of the hall in high dudgeon at the liberties taken with his music by the pianist. Because Mr. Baermann is a great artist, furnishes no good reason why we should swallow him whole, as some are inclined to do, ignoring all the other great artists who have come and gone before him!

Fashion often has much to do with making or unmaking an artist, regardless of real merit, and we are sorry to say our people are greatly inclined to run after new and fashionable foreign gods. The new Fifth Symphony of Rubinstein's strikes me as a very odd work, and I should want to hear it again before making up my mind whether it was well played, or whether I liked it or not. From a first hearing I should say the music is extremely difficult, and judge the author was striving more after great contrasts in quaint, eccentric effects, than in any well-wrought-out musical ideas. If some unknown composer had written this symphony, and it had been played at this concert unheralded, the author, in my opinion, would be called a veritable lunatic; but, as it emanates from Rubinstein, it is all right, and I quietly await a second hearing.

Mr. Henschel has materially calmed down since last season in his manner of conducting, but there is yet more room for improvement in this respect. If a conductor is to emotionize with his baton according to the salary he receives, then Mr. Henschel has an undoubted right to keep on with the gymnastic exercises of his baton, for we are assured he has the largest salary of any conductor in the world. Such musicians as Mendelssohn, Gade, Reitz, Reinnecke, Lachner, Hiller, Lassing, and others, were willing and content with receiving fifteen hundred dollars a year, while here in Boston, it is reserved for a liberal man to throw away ten thousand dollars on an inexperienced conductor. Well, every man is worth all he can get, and is not to be blamed for getting all he can, though I think Mr. Higginson could have found a dozen just as good conductors in Boston, for much less money.

77

The second concert was much pleasanter than the first, and contained, among other things, Beethoven's First Symphony, which was very nicely played.

At the third concert there was a still greater variety of melodious music, including a symphony of Haydn's, whose compositions it is always a pleasure to hear, for he had not only harmony engraven on his work, but it was also accompanied with melody, for that was stamped on his soul. Why not represent Haydn oftener on the programme, and leave off some of the trash that now finds a place there?

The orchestra begins to show improvement, and the more they play together, the more perfectly they will play. Perhaps they will yet rival Thomas's celebrated band.

At the fourth concert, the programme was made up of a queer combination of novelty, of nothing. It seems there should be good music enough in the market to furnish material for a better concert than this proved to be. What is the matter? Don't the patrons of these concerts like symphonies any more? Sorry indeed am I in being obliged to chronicle such a falling-off in the make-up of the programmes. The whole concert was uninteresting; musically speaking, a lamentable failure.

The people like novelty, if it be good, — and there is enough that is good to be had, — but novelty for the sake of novelty alone, bad or indifferent, they don't want at any price. Symphony concerts without symphonies is rather a misnomer, but there are many strange things in this world, and we are sometimes obliged to put up with whatever we can get.

The fifth concert was quite interesting, inasmuch as a Beethoven symphony was finely given the second, and a young lady played the Caprice in B minor of Mendelssohn's for piano with orchestra, and Chopin's E flat Polonaise, both in a musical and acceptable manner. The orchestra play well, is constantly improving, and there is no fault to find with it so long as it gives standard or meritorious compositions.

Home Journal Musical. Nov. 11. 82

FIFTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.—All things considered it was one of the most acceptable symphony concerts that has been given in this series. To the surprise of the professional fault-finders, if not to an easily pleased public, the programme was a model. Here it is: Overture (L'hotellerie portugaise), Churubini; Capriccio for piano-forte in B Minor, Mendelssohn; Symphony in D, op. 36, Beethoven; Entracte (Manfred) Reinecke; Andante and Polonaise for piano-forte, Chopin; Danse Macabre, Saint-Saëns, solo violin by B. Listemann.

Miss Olga von Radecki was the soloist. She has been a pupil of Mme. Clara Schumann, and looks enough like her to be her own daughter. This perhaps was her chief recommendation as a candidate for concert honors. In her performance of the B minor capriccio she maintained a standard of praiseworthy pupilage with a conspicuous degree of success. Having the same capability that she now possesses, had she been a pupil of any local teacher her application to play in the Boston symphony series would undoubtedly have been rejected. She is only an artiste in promise; but her playing at least conveyed a pleasing impression. She could not execute with artistic clearness several of the most difficult passages of the polonaise; but her interpretation had the charm of piquancy and at times was very musical in effect. Most of her playing was very clear, even and carefully prepared, though by no means fluent or broad enough to do the music justice. Just like a child-pupil she rendered the easy introduction to the capriccio; that is to say, with an unbecoming nonchalance, and altogether too rapidly; yet when she came to the difficult part she was obliged to play too slowly. Mme. Schumann would not have taken it in such a childish tempo; that any one knows who has heard her perform it. In short, while her musical perception is exquisite, her ability to interpret is so undeveloped as to appear mediocre. The reading of the symphony was able and based upon traditions to which our popular conductor did not accustom us last season. The performance only fell short of the ideal in varied intonation imparted to it by the wood-wind. The performance of the Danse Macabre was lacking in vitality, and the tempo taken by Mr. Henschel was very much slower than that which the composer of the work itself would have permitted.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fifth concert, given last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Overture to "L'hotellerie Portugaise".....Cherubini
Capriccio in B minor, for pianoforte and orchestra.....Mendelssohn
Second Symphony, in D.....Beethoven
Entracte from "Manfred".....Reinecke
Andante spianato and Polonaise in E-flat.....Chopin
"Danse Macabre".....Saint-Saëns

Miss Olga von Radecki was the pianist.

The Cherubini overture, a work not often given here, is thoroughly interesting and charming, with its happy union of contrapuntal skill, mastery of form, and genial freshness of inspiration. The instrumentation, too, is admirable; clear and brilliant, after the Mozart fashion. It was capitally played by the orchestra, and put one in tune for the good things to come, as an overture should. The Beethoven D major symphony, which, like one or two other works (the "Waldstein" sonata, for instance, or the Mozart G minor symphony), always makes the impression, when one hears it, of being the most absolutely perfect composition in existence, was played with splendid vigor, and a correct appreciation of its manifold beauties. The "Manfred" entracte gave the muted strings a good chance to display all their delicacy; the audience evidently enjoyed it hugely. It is pretty enough, but did not strike us as lying far above the commonplace. The Saint-Saëns "Danse Macabre" was given with superb vim, Mr. Listemann playing the violin solo with demoniac fire. One could wish, however, that Mr. Henschel would carry his well-known aversion to details one step farther, and forbid the big drum or cymbals being played by a single player. One can easily understand (and forgive) a musician of Mr. Henschel's associations for not feeling the reverence of a Berlioz for instruments of percussion. Even we do not go down upon our knees to speak of a pair of cymbals. But we do feel that, although these obstreperous instruments are not worthy the tenderest solicitude for their own sweet sake, they need to be extremely well played for the sake of the audience. A pair of cymbals that simply go smash-bang (as they always do when one of them is lashed to a drum) are an intolerable nuisance.

Miss von Radecki, the young pianist, who made her first appearance here at this concert made a most pleasing impression. Her technique, if not grand in extent, is excellent in quality; she plays with the most admirable clearness, and albeit that her style is as yet somewhat unformed, and lacks both breadth and vigor, she knows how to let her pure and musical nature shimmer through her playing in a way that makes it exceedingly pleasant to listen to. If she is not as yet up to the great strokes of pianoforte playing (being at times forced to take passages too slow, in order to play the notes clearly), she evinces a purity of taste far above the average. She never falls into the youthful falling of sham sentimentalism; she has no bad tricks, nor tricks of any sort, but plays with straightforward earnestness and concentration upon her music.

The next concert will be a notable occasion, as the prelude of Wagner's "Parsifal" will then be heard here for the first time. Miss Emily Winant will be the singer. The programme in full is as follows: Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; aria, Stradella; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann; aria, Mozart; prelude, "Parsifal," and "Huldigung's Marsch," Wagner.

The first concert in the series of six at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given on Thursday evening. The following is the programme: Overture, "Ostian," Gade; air, Stradella; symphony in C, Haydn; entracte, "Manfred," Reinecke; aria, Mozart; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner. Miss Emily Winant will be the singer. A part of the programme will be publicly rehearsed at Music Hall in the afternoon, for the benefit of the widow and children of a German musician. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, the orchestra and attaches of the hall, have volunteered their services, and a free use of the hall has been given.

The Symphony Concert Last Evening.

The programme for the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, was a varied and pleasing one. It began with a Cherubini overture, depended for its principal interest on a Beethoven symphony, included piano works of Mendelssohn and Chopin, as well as Reinecke's Manfred entracte, and concluded with Saint-Saëns' "Danse Macabre." As a whole the conducting was happy and judicious, though Mr. Henschel's nervousness at times still leads him into occasional indiscretions. The Beethoven symphony was his second in D. The work is a decided advance upon the master's first and is separated from it by an interval of three years. It was completed in 1802 and was first performed April 5, 1803, at a concert given by Beethoven in Vienna. Miss Olga von Radecki was the soloist. Her playing was marked with feeling, delicacy and precision, but lacked strength and force. There will be a public rehearsal of the first Cambridge concert in Music Hall next Thursday afternoon for the benefit of "the widow and four children of a German musician and composer of merit, who, on September 30, succumbed to the fever at Pleasant Hill, Washington county, Texas, in the 35th year of his age." Mr. and Mrs. Georg Henschel will sing. The programme for next week is as follows:

Prelude. (Parsifal.) First time.....Wagner
Aria.....Stradella
Miss Emily Winant.
Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann
Aria.....Mozart
Miss Emily Winant.
Prelude. (Parsifal.) }
Huldigungs Marsch. } Wagner.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Gives a Concert in Music Hall for the Benefit of a Deceased Musician's Family.

A concert for the benefit of the widow and four children of a German musician and composer of merit who died of a fever in Texas, last September, in the 35th year of his age, as the programme informs us, was given in Music Hall at 2.30 yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra. The orchestral selections were made up from the programmes which have been already given this season, but the vocal portion of the exercises were an entirely fresh treat, enlisting as they did the services of that unaffected and charming vocalist, Mrs. Georg Henschel. The lady sang two solos, accompanied upon the piano by her husband, in her usual simple and graceful way, and quite captivated the large audience, which gave her an enthusiastic recall. Subsequently she sang with Mr. Henschel the duet of his own composition, "Oh, that we two were Maying." Bernhard Listemann led the full orchestra, which accompanied them. The instrumental number consisted of Gade's Ossian overture, Reinecke's Manfred entr'acte and Haydn's symphony in C (the first written for the Salomon concerts). The works were of course well given, and the whole made a very pleasant concert. The hall was nearly filled, and the benefit will therefore prove a substantial one.

The Boston Symphony orchestra will give an additional public rehearsal this week, on Thursday afternoon, to benefit the wife and children of the late E. A. Weissenborn, who are left utterly destitute in a strange land by the death of the husband and father in Texas. Mr. Weissenborn was a talented musician of Vienna, who recently came to this country full of pleasant anticipations, and his death has removed a man who did credit to his profession. The tickets for this rehearsal will be sold at the usual rates and the programme rehearsed will be that of the first concert in the course at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. Mrs. Georg Henschel has kindly consented to sing some songs, and, with Mr. Henschel, the duet, "Oh, That We Two Were Maying." The entire proceeds will go to aid the wife and four children of the deceased.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The fifth concert, given last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Overture to "L'Hôtellerie Portugaise".....Cherubini
Capriccio in B minor, for pianoforte and orchestra.....Mendelssohn
Second Symphony, in D.....Beethoven
Entr'acte from "Manfred".....Reinecke
Andante spianato and Polonaise in E-flat.....Chopin
"Danse Macabre".....Saint-Saëns

Miss Olga von Radecki was the pianist.

The Cherubini overture, a work not often given here, is thoroughly interesting and charming, with its happy union of contrapuntal skill, mastery of form, and genial freshness of inspiration. The instrumentation, too, is admirable; clear and brilliant, after the Mozart fashion. It was capitally played by the orchestra, and put one in tune for the good things to come, as an overture should. The Beethoven D major symphony, which, like one or two other works (the "Waldstein" sonata, for instance, or the Mozart G minor symphony), always makes the impression, when one hears it, of being the most absolutely perfect composition in existence, was played with splendid vigor, and a correct appreciation of its manifold beauties. The "Manfred" entr'acte gave the muted strings a good chance to display all their delicacy; the audience evidently enjoyed it hugely. It is pretty enough, but did not strike us as lying far above the commonplace. The Saint-Saëns "Danse Macabre" was given with superb vim, Mr. Listemann playing the violin solo with demoniac fire. One could wish, however, that Mr. Henschel would carry his well-known attention to details one step farther, and forbid the big drum or cymbals being played by a single player. One can easily understand (and forgive) a musician of Mr. Henschel's associations for not feeling the reverence of a Berlioz for instruments of percussion. Even we do not go down upon our knees to speak of a pair of cymbals. But we do feel that, although these obstreperous instruments are not worthy the tenderest solicitude for their own sweet sake, they need to be extremely well played for the sake of the audience. A pair of cymbals that simply go smash-bang (as they always do when one of them is lashed to a drum) are an intolerable nuisance.

Miss von Radecki, the young pianist, who made her first appearance here at this concert made a most pleasing impression. Her technique, if not grand in extent, is excellent in quality; she plays with the most admirable clearness, and albeit that her style is as yet somewhat unformed, and lacks both breadth and vigor, she knows how to let her pure and musical nature shimmer through her playing in a way that makes it exceedingly pleasant to listen to. If she is not as yet up to the great strokes of pianoforte playing (being at times forced to take passages too slow, in order to play the notes clearly), she evinces a purity of taste far above the average. She never falls into the youthful failing of sham sentimentalism; she has no bad tricks, nor tricks of any sort, but plays with straightforward earnestness and concentration upon her music.

The next concert will be a notable occasion, as the prelude of Wagner's "Parsifal" will then be heard here for the first time. Miss Emily Winant will be the singer. The programme in full is as follows: Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner; aria, Stradella; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann; aria, Mozart; prelude, "Parsifal," and "Huldigung's Marsch," Wagner.

The first concert in the series of six at the Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, will be given on Thursday evening. The following is the programme: Overture, "Ossian," Gade; air, Stradella; symphony in C, Haydn; entr'acte, "Manfred," Reinecke; aria, Mozart; overture, "Rienzi," Wagner. Miss Emily Winant will be the singer. A part of the programme will be publicly rehearsed at Music Hall in the afternoon, for the benefit of the widow and children of a German musician. Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, the orchestra and attachés of the hall, have volunteered their services, and a free use of the hall has been given.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9th, AT 2.30, P.M.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF

THE WIDOW AND FOUR CHILDREN OF A GERMAN MUSICIAN AND COMPOSER OF MERIT, WHO,
ON SEPTEMBER 30TH, SUCCUMBED TO THE FEVER AT PLEASANT HILL, WASHINGTON COUNTY, TEXAS, IN THE 35TH YEAR OF HIS AGE.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Ossian.) GADE.

SONGS WITH PIANO.

(a.) Lia è morta. WIDOR.

(b.) Rhenish Folkssong. MENDELSSOHN.

MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

ENTR' ACTE. (Manfred.) REINECKE.

DUET. "Oh that we two were Maying." HENSCHEL.

MR. & MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

SYMPHONY in C. HAYDN.

(No. 7 of Breitkopf's edition.)

Adagio; vivace.—Adagio ma non troppo.—

Menuetto. (Allegretto).—Finale. (Presto assai).—

The Piano used is a Chickering.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

A PART OF THE PROGRAMME FOR THE FIRST CAMBRIDGE CONCERT

WILL BE

PUBLICLY REHEARSED

AT

BOSTON MUSIC HALL,

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9th, AT 2.30, P.M.

FOR THE BENEFIT OF

THE WIDOW AND FOUR CHILDREN OF A GERMAN MUSICIAN AND COMPOSER OF MERIT, WHO,
ON SEPTEMBER 30TH, SUCCUMBED TO THE FEVER AT PLEASANT HILL, WASHINGTON
COUNTY, TEXAS, IN THE 35TH YEAR OF HIS AGE.

MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL has kindly consented to sing some songs, and, with MR. HENSCHEL, the duet, "Oh that we two were Maying."

Admission, - Twenty-five Cents.

The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of last Saturday, was not as thrilling as some of the series have been, but it was pleasing and free from errors. It began with Cherubini's overture to 'The Portuguese Inn.' This inn seems not to be a temperance inn, as it contains several hundred "bars." I came too late to hear the whole of it, and was obliged to listen to the work from the entry, as Mr. Henschel's laws are as fixed as those of the Medes and Persians, and allow no one to enter the hall during the performance—a good rule, and one to which all will willingly bow.

After this work a Miss Olga von Radecki appeared as pianiste in Mendelssohn's Capriccio in B minor. It is an easy selection, and not one by which one can judge of a pianist's powers. She played it with much delicacy and clearness. In the Chopin E flat Polonaise, the same qualities were present. Every part was cleanly executed there were no blurs and no mistakes, but on the other hand there was no fire or brio. It was the work of a very thorough student, who is not yet a great artist, but may become one in time.

The second Beethoven symphony, with its first* symphony, Scherzo, was very well played. The crescendo effects of the Scherzo, were splendidly shaded; so was the diminuendo at the vanishing of the skeletons in the subsequent Danse Macabre. In these effects of crescendo and diminuendo Mr. Henschel has brought his orchestra to a high state of perfection. Apropos of this pioneer Scherzo, is it not strange that Haydn, after using the Scherzo in some of his quartets, should never have thought of bringing it into symphonies? The germ of the Scherzo idea is in Haydn, its practical use came only years after, in Beethoven.

In the König Manfred entr'acte the strings did splendidly. It is a sore subject with me, since the omission of a paragraph, and the attempted rectification, led me, in the Boston Courier, to allude to Schumann as the composer. Of course, any one who possessed the program (as I did) would see the error. My desire was to compare the two dissimilar subjects in the coincidence of their entr'actes. The sorrows of the noble and unfortunate King Manfred are pictured by Reinecke much as the woes of the other Manfred are pictured by Schumann in the entr'acte, where 'celli, horns, violins and pizzicato unite to picture the longing of Manfred and the love of the last Astarte. It is about the only point of the two works where a similarity steps in.

L. C. E.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

VI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 11TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PRELUDE. (Parsifal.) [FIRST TIME.] WAGNER.

ARIA. STRADELLA.

SYMPHONY in D Minor, No. 4, op. 120. SCHUMANN.

Introduction; Allegro; Romance; Scherzo and Finale.—

ARIA. MOZART.

PRELUDE. (Parsifal.) }
HULDIGUNGS MARSCH. } WAGNER.

SOLOIST:

MISS EMILY WINANT.

ARIA.

STRADELLA.

"ARIA DE CHIESA."

Pietà Signore di me dolente
Signor pietá, se a te giunge il mio pregar,
Non mi punisca il tuo rigor,
Meno severi clementi ognora,
Volgi i tuoi sguardi sopradi me,
No non fiamai che nell'inferno,
Io sia dannato nel fuoco eterno Dal tuo rigor,

Gran Dio, giammai io sia dannato
Nel fuoco eterno dal tuo rigor.

Pietà Signore, di me dolente,
Signor pietá, se ate giunge il mio pregar,
Meno severi clementi ognora,
Volgi i sguardi deh volgi i sguardi sime
signor,
Pietà Signor, etc.

ARIA. (Nozze d' Figaro.)

MOZART.

"VOI CHE SAPETE."

Voi che sapete che cosa è amor,
Donne, vedete sio l' ho nel cor,
Quello ch'io provo vi ridiro,
E per me nuovo, capir nol sò,
Sento un affetto pien di desir,
Ch'ora è diletto ch'ora è martir,
Gelo, è poi sento l'alma avvampar,
E in un momento torna a gelar.
Ricerco un bene fuori di me,
Non so ch'il tiené, non sò cos' è,
Sospiro e gemo, senza voler,
Palpito e tremo senza saper;
Non trovo pace, nolte, nè di,
Ma pur mi piace l'anguir così.
Voi che sapete, etc.

A WAGNER NIGHT.

The Parsifal Music Interpreted by Henschel's Orchestra.

A Brilliant Performance of a Most Noteworthy Work.

The Schumann Symphony—Miss
Winant's Singing.

It is hardly necessary to say that Music Hall was crowded from floor to gallery last evening by a brilliant and interested audience. One feature of the programme alone was sufficient to have drawn so large an audience together. That was the prelude to Wagner's latest masterpiece, Parsifal. Mr. Henschel deserves credit for bringing it out here thus early. With the exception of its performance last month by the New York Philharmonic Society, this is, we believe, its first hearing in this country. It is a noble work, quite solemn in its effect, and deals with the principal themes of the music-drama. It is a distinct creation. It recalls some of Wagner's other works of this nature, and is in marked contrast to all of them. In character and method of treatment it resembles the introduction to Lohengrin more than anything else, but the resemblance is only superficial and partial. It bears all the marks of the composer's individuality and genius, and represents him, too, at his best. It is mostly performed by the strings, though the basses are used judiciously in some harmonious passages. But to those who have come to associate Wagner's name with noise and tumult this Parsifal music will be a surprise. It is hard to understand, after a composer has produced such a work as Lohengrin, why this charge of loudness and ear-splitting harmonies should still be made almost universally among that altogether too large number who will not bear with patience anything that is said in behalf of the "music of the future." Music of the future it may be, if we mean by that to imply that its popularity and general acceptance is not of this day and generation; but if it is meant to imply sarcastically that the Wagnerian productions are above and beyond the comprehension of the musician of the present, it is high time such an obsolete distinction was dropped. Wagner's music is "music of the future" in just the same sense that Beethoven's music was in his day, or any other man's work, very different from that of his fellows in any department of art was in his. It is safe to say, however, that if the temporary standard which little men set up in matters of art by which they measure and upon which they model themselves and each other were adopted by the great men, we should never make any progress.

Beethoven Was Hailed as a Presumptuous Innovator

by the grandfathers of many who worship him. In just the same spirit Wagner has been assailed from the first and is still so dealt with by a portion of the critical world at least, though this opposition has in a great measure died away. The very work under consideration, the prelude to Parsifal, has been determined foolish and wearisome by some who have undertaken to enlighten and instruct the public about the matter. But we do not see how any lover of the beautiful and the profound in music—who measures music by the degree in which it communicates the thoughts and feelings of the composer to the mind of the intelligent auditor—can, after hearing such a work for instance as the Parsifal prelude, scout the claims of its author to greatness as unfounded and pretentious. And this may be said without denying that Wagner has his faults and without claiming infallibility for the details of his theories. Not much fault could be found last night with Mr. Henschel's reading of the music, nor with the work of the orchestra, though in the latter matter there were some defects here and there. It cannot be said that the Parsifal music last night was welcomed with any great degree of enthusiasm. In fact it did not call forth so much applause as the efforts of the soloist of the evening. Let us hope that this was not because it was not appreciated. The repetition of the work was an excellent idea, for it needs at least a second hearing for its comprehension. The composition was given at the opening of the programme and again at the close. In the latter case it was immediately followed by the "Huldigung's March," and if the desired effect was to show by contrast what different class of music the composer was capable of producing the result was certainly successful. In the prelude

Stringed Instruments and Pianissimo Predominate.

In the march there is banging and noise enough to supply a small army of boys with the material for a Fourth of July celebration. One advantage of such a number at the close of a programme is that it is sure to wake up those non-musical people, who may, perhaps, have fallen asleep during the softer strains that preceded it, and warn them that it is time to go home.

By the way, speaking of Wagner's works, our orchestras have been repeating many of his preludes in the past year or so, but they have omitted the best of them all—"Lohengrin," "Tannhauser" and "Tristan and Isolde." They will be welcomed by a large part of our audiences when they are given.

Schumann's Fourth Symphony was the work which, but for the Parsifal music, would have been the great feature of the concert. Schumann's symphonies are meeting here with their richly deserved favor, if we are to judge by the frequency of their place upon the programmes at our orchestral concerts. This one was given twice last year, once by the Philharmonics, again by the Harvards and is now finally presented by the Symphony orchestra. And it is only fair to say that it received quite as effective a reading the last time as on either of its previous presentations. It made a marked impression upon the audience, too, and was heartily applauded.

Miss Emily Winant was the soloist of the evening. Her rich contralto voice was heard to fine advantage, both in an aria from Stradella and a passage from "Figaro." The lady received a recall at each appearance. The programme for the next concert is as follows:

Overture ("Academic Festival").....Brahms
Concert Pathétique pour Violon.....Ernst
Symphony in C.....Mozart
(No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Allegro Vivace and Finale ("Prometheus.")
Beethoven
Fantasy on Slavonic melodies, for violin..Vieuxtemps
Overture ("Le des Pees").....Auber
Soloist—Mr. Bernhard Listemann.

Sixth Boston Symphony Concert.
The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before the largest audience of the season. The following programme was performed: Prelude (Parsifal), first time, Wagner; Aria, "Pieta, Signore," Stradella; Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann; Aria, "Voi che Sapete," "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Prelude (Parsifal), Huldigungs Marsch, Wagner. The chief interest of the evening centred upon the performance of the prelude to Wagner's latest opera, "Parsifal," which has not before been heard in Boston. It was a happy thought on the part of the conductor to have it played twice during the evening, for it is of such peculiar character that a single hearing fails to give a full idea of its beauty. As to its purpose or meaning even a second performance does not offer much of a revelation, and it seemed tamer and less original or interesting than much of Wagner's music that has been given heretofore. It is full of exquisite tones and graceful modulations, in general is quiet and pastoral in effect, and suggests quite strongly the leading motive which appears in the opera of "Lohengrin." The chief work is given to the strings, and there are a few spasmodic and powerful introductions of the brasses, with a closing motive of horns and wooden wind instruments against a tremulous movement of the violins. The work is agreeable and soothing and abounds in melodious combinations of instruments, but has nothing in it strikingly new or impressive. The march which closed the concert was of a different character and well illustrated not only Wagner's power, but also his ability to describe most graphically the rapid movement of a mighty host of men. It was splendidly played by the orchestra, the grand introduction, especially, being given with extraordinary power. The symphony was also well performed, barring a slight haste in time in nearly every number—a fault particularly noticeable in the allegro and parts of the finale, where some roughness of the strings and blurring of runs were to be distinguished. Miss Emily Winant was the soloist of the evening and sang her numbers with rare beauty and expression. She was never in better voice, and although her selections were formal and not particularly interesting, they gained a new value and charm from the pure, rich way in which she interpreted them.
The programme for next Saturday's concert is as follows: Overture (Academic Festival), Brahms; Concert Pathétique Pour Violon, Ernst; Symphony in C, Mozart; Allegro Vivace and Finale (Prometheus), Beethoven; Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for violin, Vieuxtemps; Overture (Lac des Fées), Auber.

THE SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The largest audience of the season thus far filled Music Hall on the occasion of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday evening. It was doubtless the announcement that the prelude to Wagner's latest work, "The Parsifal," which brought so large a gathering to the place, and Mr. Henschel is deserving of thanks and much credit for his enterprise in presenting the music at so early a date in this city. The Wagner prelude proved very interesting, and in course of the evening Mr. Henschel gave a repetition in response to several requests. Following was the programme performed Saturday evening in full: Prelude (Parsifal), first time, Wagner; aria, "Pieta, Signore," Stradella; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann; aria, "Voi che Sapete," "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; prelude (Parsifal), Huldigungs Marsch, Wagner. The programme for the next Saturday's concert is as follows: Overture (Academic Festival), Brahms; Concert Pathétique Pour Violon, Ernst; symphony in C, Mozart; Allegro Vivace and Finale (Prometheus), Beethoven; Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for violin, Vieuxtemps; overture (Lac des Fées), Auber.

ment at Koster and Bial's
the thanks of the public ady.
tions on the occasion of
ing Men's Christian As-Monday evening. The poetic way with great light of the large audi-ill be lighted by elec-on Hafenauer, who at-ricity at Munich, pro-he saw there a decided ked by theatre archigreater safety to both crowded houses at Hav-ndless processions, exacrobatics and picturesque nday's Evening Telegram, s success, "The Romany

at Booth's after the 25th ent arrangements. Under performances during next y patronized.
l says: "It is Mr. Mila's eformation, though he is thean fire which kindled t Col. Burleigh at times and become wildly de-

New York.
in Berlin some numbers
Haase's "Ungeschminkte
What a Manager Is," and a man who cannot do any-people who can do somes not stand with his hands till the welkin rings."
to Haase believes in new-

a novelty in fact that it
Boston, but as not much on various appropriate auditor. It these are alis a strict and en applied to come to ma-formed. The of tone. She as Stradella's life of its com-the hearts of after hearing array-nant prothe rich inor.
ence light was ative.
ed as s are s the Philralry lasiany ge to the ot be
E.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.
The Sixth Programme of the Season's Series.

The sixth programme of the season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Emily Winant, contralto, as soloist, and the following programme:

- Prelude, "Parsifal,".....Wagner.
- Aria, "De Chlesea,".....Stradella.
- Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann.
- Aria, "Voi che sapete,".....Mozart.
- Prelude, "Parsifal,".....Wagner.
- Huldigungs Marsch.....Wagner.

The novelty of this programme was the "Parsifal" verspell, or prelude, and the playing of it a second time, after the symphony, gave an excellent opportunity to fully appreciate the merits of the composition. Its beauty, as a piece of orchestral work, the wealth of its instrumentation and the genius shown in the use of all the resources of the modern orchestra cannot be denied. It is suggestive of the work to which it is the introduction, and gives a very good idea of the character of the religious music drama which has caused so great an interest by its recent performances at Bayreuth. Its characteristics have been duly presented in these columns, and it need only be said that it gives the three leading motifs of the work, that of the "Love Feast," the "Holy Grail," and "Faith." There are few new musical ideas shown in either of the three leading themes—they are little more than echoes of former works by the "Master;" and, great as the beauty of their treatment is, they lack the vigor and freshness of the original efforts of the composer upon which they are founded. The "Grail" motif, while bearing a striking similarity to the "Lohengrin" theme, has its chief beauty in the more elaborate instrumental treatment of the idea, rather than in being a more fresh or original presentation of it; and so in the entire prelude, the feeling is that the lack of original thought has been made good by the ripened skill of the "Master" in reclothing his old ideas with a richer dress. The presentation of the prelude was all that could be desired, and the audience was quick in its recognition of the merits of the composition. The "Huldigungs Marsch," written by Wagner upon the occasion of the coronation of King Lewis of Bavaria, 15 years or more ago, was in striking contrast with the "Parsifal" number, and showed the vigor of the musician in his earlier writings in a most delightful fashion. Its stirring martial measures, its strikingly original melodies and brilliant instrumentation, show Wagner's genius quite as plainly as do his later and more studied efforts, and the selection gave a pleasing ending to the programme. The wealth of melody in the Schumann symphony, the best of the composer's works of this class, made it the most enjoyable of the orchestral numbers in the programme, the reading given it by Mr. Henschel presenting all its beauties with clearness and grace. Mr. Listemann's playing of the violin solo in the "Romance" was such an artistic bit of work as is always to be counted upon from this talented musician. Miss Winant's voice has gained materially in richness and beauty since last season, and the vocal numbers assigned her were sung with an exquisite appreciation of their beauties. The delivery of the Mozart aria created such an impression that the singer was twice recalled to acknowledge the plaudits of the audience.

MUSICAL.
Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last night. The programme presented a novelty in the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," which was heard for the first time in Boston on this occasion. It was played twice, once at the beginning of the concert, and again at the end. It is, of course, a remarkably fine bit of orchestration, but beyond this it did not impress us as especially interesting. What it aimed at we failed to discover, even upon the second hearing. Judged as music pure and simple, it has the effect of a series of exercises in modulation, strung together without any discoverable intention to produce the impression of continuity in idea. There is a stretch of pianissimo, then a fortissimo blast from the brass, then a bit of weak imitation through which the horn plaintively wails, then another spasm of brass and so on after the familiar Wagner formula. It says nothing and to all appearances means nothing. Doubtless, if a complete description of the composer's intentions were given on the programme, we should find that he had done what he wanted to do; but without such an aid to the understanding the music is vague in design, and gropes through mazes of extreme harmonies and endless suspensions for something that is not achieved. The orchestration is rich and masterly—it always is in Wagner, and is beautiful in color; but it is the old richness and the old color which have become the conventionalities of the composer and his school. The work was finely interpreted by the orchestra in a broad and warm style and with fine precision. It appeared to please for it was warmly applauded; but to us it was both dull and tiresome. The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in D-minor, which was played with great spirit. The opening allegro was taken somewhat faster than the traditional time,—in fact all of the movements were somewhat hurried; but it was not at the expense of clearness or precision, though as far as the scherzo—particularly the trio—is concerned, the proper effect was marred by the too rapid pace. The concert ended with a brilliant rendering of Wagner's "Huldigungs" march. The soloist was Miss Emily Winant, who sang Stradella's aria "Pieta Signore" and Mozart's "Voi che Sapete." The former she gave in a very large and impressive manner, and with remarkable beauty and fervor of expression. The noble composition could scarcely have had a finer or more musicianly interpretation. The Mozart aria was likewise charmingly sung, and with a feeling of the deepest refinement. Had it been taken in a tempo a shade slower the effect would have been still better. At the next concert the purely orchestral selections will be: Overture, "Academic Festival," Brahms, and Symphony C, Mozart, No. 6, Bruckner; Allegro Vivace and Finale, "Prometheus," Beethoven; Overture, "La Lac des Fées" Auber. The soloist is to be Mr. Bernhard Listemann, who will perform Ernst's "Concert Pathétique" and Vieuxtemps's Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies.

Sixth Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before the largest audience of the season. The following programme was performed: Prelude (Parsifal), first time, Wagner; Aria, "Pieta, Signore," Stradella; Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann; Aria, "Voi che Sapete," "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Prelude (Parsifal), Huldigungs Marsch, Wagner. The chief interest of the evening centred upon the performance of the prelude to Wagner's latest opera, "Parsifal," which has not before been heard in Boston. It was a happy thought on the part of the conductor to have it played twice during the evening, for it is of such peculiar character that a single hearing fails to give a full idea of its beauty. As to its purpose or meaning even a second performance does not offer much of a revelation, and it seemed tamer and less original or interesting than much of Wagner's music that has been given heretofore. It is full of exquisite tones and graceful modulations, in general is quiet and pastoral in effect, and suggests quite strongly the leading motive which appears in the opera of "Lohengrin." The chief work is given to the strings, and there are a few spasmodic and powerful introductions of the brasses, with a closing motive of horns and wooden wind instruments against a tremulous movement of the violins. The work is agreeable and soothing and abounds in melodious combinations of instruments, but has nothing in it strikingly new or impressive. The march which closed the concert was of a different character and well illustrated not only Wagner's power, but also his ability to describe most graphically the rapid movement of a mighty host of men. It was splendidly played by the orchestra, the grand introduction, especially, being given with extraordinary power. The symphony was also well performed, barring a slight haste in time in nearly every number—a fault particularly noticeable in the allegro and parts of the finale, where some roughness of the strings and blurring of runs were to be distinguished. Miss Emily Winant was the soloist of the evening and sang her numbers with rare beauty and expression. She was never in better voice, and although her selections were formal and not particularly interesting, they gained a new value and charm from the pure, rich way in which she interpreted them.

The programme for next Saturday's concert is as follows: Overture (Academic Festival), Brahms; Concert Pathétique Pour Violon, Ernst; Symphony in C, Mozart; Allegro Vivace and Finale (Prometheus), Beethoven; Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for violin, Vieuxtemps; Overture (Lac des Fées), Auber.

Journal

THE SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The largest audience of the season thus far filled Music Hall on the occasion of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday evening. It was doubtless the announcement that the prelude to Wagner's latest work, "The Parsifal," which brought so large a gathering to the place, and Mr. Henschel is deserving of thanks and much credit for his enterprise in presenting the music at so early a date in this city. The Wagner prelude proved very interesting, and in course of the evening Mr. Henschel gave a repetition in response to several requests. Following was the programme performed Saturday evening in full: Prelude (Parsifal), first time, Wagner; aria, "Pieta, Signore," Stradella; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann; aria, "Voi che Sapete," "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; prelude (Parsifal), Huldigungs Marsch, Wagner. The programme for the next Saturday's concert is as follows: Overture (Academic Festival), Brahms; Concert Pathétique Pour Violon, Ernst; symphony in C, Mozart; Allegro Vivace and Finale (Prometheus), Beethoven; Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for violin, Vieuxtemps; overture (Lac des Fées), Auber.

Journal

ment at Koster and Bial's the thanks of the public ations on the occasion of g Men's Christian As- Monday evening. The poetic way with great light of the large audi-ill be lighted by elec- on Hafenauer, who at- ricity at Munich, pro- he saw there a decided ked by theatre archi- greater safety to both crowded houses at Hay- endless processions, ex- acrobatics and picturesque nday's Evening Telegram, s success, "The Romany it Booth's after the 25th ent arrangements. Under performances during next v patronized.

l says: "It is Mr. Miln's eformation, though he is thean fire which kindled t Col. Burleigh at times and become wildly de-

New York.

in Berlin some numbers Haase's "Ungeschminkte /hat a Manager Is," and a man who cannot do any- people who can do some- s not stand with his hands npet till the welkin rings."

to Haase believes in some a novelty in e fact that it Boston, but as not much e on var ous appropriate auditor. It these are al. is a strict and en applied to come to ma-

formed. The of tone. She as Stradella's life of its com- the hearts of after hearing arry- nant pro-

l the rich

inor.

ence

light

was ative.

ed as

s are

s the

Phil-

calry

lassi-

any ge to the ot be

E.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Sixth Programme of the Season's Series.

The sixth programme of the season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Emily Winant, contralto, as soloist, and the following programme:

Prelude, "Parsifal,".....Wagner.
Aria, "De Chiesà,".....Stradella.
Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, op. 120.....Schumann.
Aria, "Voi che sapete,".....Mozart.
Prelude, "Parsifal,".....Wagner.
Huldigungs Marsch. }.....Wagner.

The novelty of this programme was the "Parsifal" verspell, or prelude, and the playing of it a second time, after the symphony, gave an excellent opportunity to fully appreciate the merits of the composition. Its beauty, as a piece of orchestral work, the wealth of its instrumentation and the genius shown in the use of all the resources of the modern orchestra cannot be denied. It is suggestive of the work to which it is the introduction, and gives a very good idea of the character of the religious music drama which has caused so great an interest by its recent performances at Bayreuth. Its characteristics have been duly presented in these columns, and it need only be said that it gives the three leading motifs of the work, that of the "Love Feast," the "Holy Grail," and "Faith." There are few new musical ideas shown in either of the three leading themes—they are little more than echoes of former works by the "Master," and, great as the beauty of their treatment is, they lack the vigor and freshness of the original efforts of the composer upon which they are founded. The "Grail" motif, while bearing a striking similarity to the "Lohengrin" theme, has its chief beauty in the more elaborate instrumental treatment of the idea, rather than in being a more fresh or original presentation of it; and so in the entire prelude, the feeling is that the lack of original thought has been made good by the ripened skill of the "Master" in reclothing his old ideas with a richer dress. The presentation of the prelude was all that could be desired, and the audience was quick in its recognition of the merits of the composition. The "Huldigungs Marsch," written by Wagner upon the occasion of the coronation of King Lewis of Bavaria, 15 years or more ago, was in striking contrast with the "Parsifal" number, and showed the vigor of the musician in his earlier writings in a most delightful fashion. Its stirring martial measures, its strikingly original melodies and brilliant instrumentation, show Wagner's genius quite as plainly as do his later and more studied efforts, and the selection gave a pleasing ending to the programme. The wealth of melody in the Schumann symphony, the best of the composer's works of this class, made it the most enjoyable of the orchestral numbers in the programme, the reading given it by Mr. Henschel presenting all its beauties with clearness and grace. Mr. Listemann's playing of the violin solo in the "Romance" was such an artistic bit of work as is always to be counted upon from this talented musician. Miss Winant's voice has gained materially in richness and beauty since last season, and the vocal numbers assigned her were sung with an exquisite appreciation of their beauties. The delivery of the Mozart aria created such an impression that the singer was twice recalled to acknowledge the plaudits of the audience.

Gazette MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last night. The programme presented a novelty in the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," which was heard for the first time in Boston on this occasion. It was played twice, once at the beginning of the concert, and again at the end. It is, of course, a remarkably fine bit of orchestration, but beyond this it did not impress us as especially interesting. What it aimed at we failed to discover, even upon the second hearing. Judged as music pure and simple, it has the effect of a series of exercises in modulation, strung together without any discoverable intention to produce the impression of continuity in idea. There is a stretch of pianissimo, then a fortissimo blast from the brass, then a bit of weak imitation through which the horn plaintively wails, then another spasm of brass and so on after the familiar Wagner formula. It says nothing and to all appearances means nothing. Doubtless, if a complete description of the composer's intentions were given on the programme, we should find that he had done what he wanted to do; but without such an aid to the understanding the music is vague in design, and gropes through mazes of extreme harmonies and endless suspensions for something that is not achieved. The orchestration is rich and masterly—it always is in Wagner, and is beautiful in color; but it is the old richness and the old color which have become the conventionalities of the composer and his school. The work was finely interpreted by the orchestra in a broad and warm style and with fine precision. It appeared to please for it was warmly applauded; but to us it was both dull and tiresome. The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in D-minor, which was played with great spirit. The opening allegro was taken somewhat faster than the traditional time,—in fact all of the movements were somewhat hurried; but it was not at the expense of clearness or precision, though as far as the scherzo—particularly the trio—is concerned, the proper effect was marred by the too rapid pace. The concert ended with a brilliant rendering of Wagner's "Huldigungs" march. The soloist was Miss Emily Winant, who sang Stradella's aria "Pieta Signore" and Mozart's "Voi che Sapete." The former she gave in a very large and impressive manner, and with remarkable beauty and fervor of expression. The noble composition could scarcely have had a finer or more musicianly interpretation. The Mozart aria was likewise charmingly sung, and with a feeling of the deepest refinement. Had it been taken in a tempo a shade slower the effect would have been still better. At the next concert the purely orchestral selections will be: Overture, "Academic Festival," Brahms, and Symphony C, Mozart, No. 6, Beethoven; Allegro Vivace and Finale, "Prometheus," Beethoven; Overture, "La Lac des Fées" Auber. The soloist is to be Mr. Bernhard Listemann, who will perform Ernst's "Concert Pathétique" and Vieuxtemps's Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies.

Sixth Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening before the largest audience of the season. The following programme was performed: Prelude (Parsifal), first time, Wagner; Aria, "Pieta, Signore," Stradella; Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann; Aria, "Voi che Sapete," "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; Prelude (Parsifal), Huldigungs Marsch, Wagner. The chief interest of the evening centred upon the performance of the prelude to Wagner's latest opera, "Parsifal," which has not before been heard in Boston. It was a happy thought on the part of the conductor to have it played twice during the evening, for it is of such peculiar character that a single hearing fails to give a full idea of its beauty. As to its purpose or meaning even a second performance does not offer much of a revelation, and it seemed tamer and less original or interesting than much of Wagner's music that has been given heretofore. It is full of exquisite tones and graceful modulations, in general is quiet and pastoral in effect, and suggests quite strongly the leading motive which appears in the opera of "Lohengrin." The chief work is given to the strings, and there are a few spasmodic and powerful introductions of the brasses, with a closing motive of horns and wooden wind instruments against a tremulous movement of the violins. The work is agreeable and soothing and abounds in melodious combinations of instruments, but has nothing in it strikingly new or impressive. The march which closed the concert was of a different character and well illustrated not only Wagner's but also his ability to describe most graphically the rapid movement of a mighty host of men. It was splendidly played, the orchestra, the grand introduction, especially being given with extraordinary power. The symphony was also well performed, but with slight haste in time in nearly every part, particularly noticeable in the allegra parts of the finale, where some roughness of strings and blurring of runs were to be forgiven. Miss Emily Winant was the soloist in the evening and sang her numbers with beauty and expression. She was never out of voice, and although her selection was formal and not particularly interesting, she gained a new value and charm from the rich way in which she interpreted them.

The programme for next Saturday's concert is as follows: Overture (Academic Festival), Brahms; Concert Pathétique Pour Violon, Symphony in C, Mozart; Allegro Vivace, Finale (Prometheus), Beethoven; Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for violin, Vieuxtemps; Overture (Lac des Fées), Auber.

THE SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The largest audience of the season thus far filled Music Hall on the occasion of the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on Saturday evening. It was doubtless the announcement that the prelude to Wagner's latest work, "The Parsifal," which brought so large a gathering to the place, and Mr. Henschel is deserving of thanks and much credit for his enterprise in presenting the music at so early a date in this city. The Wagner prelude proved very interesting, and in course of the evening Mr. Henschel gave a repetition in response to several requests. Following was the programme performed Saturday evening in full: Prelude (Parsifal), first time, Wagner; aria, "Pieta, Signore," Stradella; symphony in D minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann; aria, "Voi che Sapete," "Marriage of Figaro," Mozart; prelude (Parsifal), Huldigungs Marsch, Wagner. The programme for the next Saturday's concert is as follows: Overture (Academic Festival), Brahms; Concert Pathétique Pour Violon, Ernst; symphony in C, Mozart; Allegro Vivace and Finale (Prometheus), Beethoven; Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for violin, Vieuxtemps; overture (Lac des Fées), Auber.

The Boston Symphony Concert, last Saturday, gave us a novelty in the shape of the "Parsifal" Prelude, and another in the fact that it was repeated twice on the same program, a fashion new to Boston, but one that has been used abroad with the best results. I was not much wiser after the repetition. I could recognize the insistence on various themes, but these themes meant nothing without their appropriate labels, and conveyed no definite impression to the scoreless auditor. It would be easy to point to resemblance and repetitions, but these are all most to be expected in the dogmatic composer who upholds a strict and arbitrary musical creed. Has the old definition ever been applied to the Wagnerian dogma, that "dogmatism is puppyism come to maturity?"

The gorgeous "Huldigungs Marsch" was also finely performed. The true Wagner speaks in its festive and grandiose effects.

Miss Winant sang with her usual breadth and richness of tone. She is one of the very best of contraltos. Her first selection was Stradella's famous "Pieta Signore," which is said to have saved the life of its composer on the occasion of its first performance, by melting the hearts of two bravos who had been hired to murder him, but who, after hearing him sing the song, gave him money to leave the city, instead of carrying out the plans of the brothers of Stradella's mistress. Miss Winant sang the song with fervent artistic feeling, although her Italian pronunciation seemed faulty at times.

In Mozart's "Voi che Sapete" she sang very sweetly, giving all the tender legato effects which the aria requires, and displaying the rich tones of her deepest register to superb advantage.

The Symphony of the Concert was Schumann's fourth, in D minor. It is rougher and more uncouth than the one in B flat, but its vehemence at times rises into absolute grandeur. The shading, with a slight exception in the first Allegro, was of the finest. The Scherzo was especially well done, and the serenade-like Romanza was very effective. There were no pauses, so that the unity of the work was presented as Schumann had desired it, "as one piece."

Not only do the movements lead into each other, but the themes are interwoven so as to give the whole a more united character. Thus the strange first theme of the Allegro reappears at the Finale. The Philharmonics are getting ready for their season, and soon a healthy rivalry will spring up. The work of Messrs. Lang and Zerrahn, in the classical concerts of this season, will prove that Boston has not, by any means, put all of her eggs in one basket; and that in the homage to the powerful musical work of the new organization, that due to the older workers who have made Boston what it is, musically, will not be forgotten.

L. C. E.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Sixth Programme of the Season's Series.

The sixth programme of the season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, with Miss Emily Winant, contralto, as soloist, and the following programme:

Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner.
Aria, "De Chessa," Stradella.
Symphony in D Minor, No. 4, op. 120, Schumann.
Aria, "Voi che Sapete," Mozart.
Prelude, "Parsifal," Wagner.
Huldigungs Marsch.

The novelty of this programme was the "Parsifal" verspell, or prelude, and the playing of it a second time, after the symphony, gave an excellent opportunity to fully appreciate the merits of the composition. Its beauty, as a piece of orchestral work, the wealth of its instrumentation and the genius shown in the use of all the resources of the modern orchestra cannot be denied. It is suggestive of the work to which it is the introduction, and gives a very good idea of the character of the religious music drama which has caused so great an interest by its recent performances at Bayreuth. Its characteristics have been duly presented in these columns, and it need only be said that it gives the three leading motifs of the work, that of the "Love Feast," the "Holy Grail," and "Faith." There are few new musical ideas shown in either of the three leading themes—they are little more than echoes of former works by the "Master;" and, great as the beauty of their treatment is, they lack the vigor and freshness of the original efforts of the composer upon which they are founded. The "Grail" motif, while bearing a striking similarity to the "Lohengrin" theme, has its chief beauty in the more elaborate instrumental treatment of the idea, rather than in being a more fresh or original presentation of it; and so in the entire prelude, the feeling is that the lack of original thought has been made good by the ripened skill of the "Master" in reclothing his old ideas with a richer dress. The presentation of the prelude was all that could be desired, and the audience was quick in its recognition of the merits of the composition. The "Huldigungs Marsch," written by Wagner upon the occasion of the coronation of King Lewis of Bavaria, 15 years or more ago, was in striking contrast with the "Parsifal" number, and showed the vigor of the musician in his earlier writings in a most delightful fashion. Its stirring martial measures, its strikingly original melodies and brilliant instrumentation, show Wagner's genius quite as plainly as do his later and more studied efforts, and the selection gave a pleasing ending to the programme. The wealth of melody in the Schumann symphony, the best of the composer's works of this class, made it the most enjoyable of the orchestral numbers in the programme, the reading given it by Mr. Henschel presenting all its beauties with clearness and grace. Mr. Listemann's playing of the violin solo in the "Romance" was such an artistic bit of work as is always to be counted upon from this talented musician. Miss Winant's voice has gained materially in richness and beauty since last season, and the vocal numbers assigned her were sung with an exquisite appreciation of their beauties. The delivery of the Mozart aria created such an impression that the singer was twice recalled to acknowledge the plaudits of the audience.

Gazette MUSICAL.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The sixth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall last night. The programme presented a novelty in the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," which was heard for the first time in Boston on this occasion. It was played twice, once at the beginning of the concert, and again at the end. It is, of course, a remarkably fine bit of orchestration, but beyond this it did not impress us as especially interesting. What it aimed at we failed to discover, even upon the second hearing. Judged as music pure and simple, it has the effect of a series of exercises in modulation, strung together without any discoverable intention to produce the impression of continuity in idea. There is a stretch of pianissimo, then a fortissimo blast from the brass, then a bit of weak imitation through which the horn plaintively wails, then another spasm of brass and so on after the familiar Wagner formula. It says nothing and to all appearances means nothing. Doubtless, if a complete description of the composer's intentions were given on the programme, we should find that he had done what he wanted to do; but without such an aid to the understanding the music is vague in design, and gropes through mazes of extreme harmonies and endless suspensions for something that is not achieved. The orchestration is rich and masterly—it always is in Wagner, and is beautiful in color; but it is the old richness and the old color which have become the conventionalities of the composer and his school. The work was finely interpreted by the orchestra in a broad and warm style and with fine precision. It appeared to please for it was warmly applauded; but to us it was both dull and tiresome. The symphony was Schumann's No. 4 in D-minor, which was played with great spirit. The opening allegro was taken somewhat faster than the traditional time,—in fact all of the movements were somewhat hurried; but it was not at the expense of clearness or precision, though as far as the scherzo—particularly the trio—is concerned, the proper effect was marred by the too rapid pace. The concert ended with a brilliant rendering of Wagner's "Huldigungs" march. The soloist was Miss Emily Winant, who sang Stradella's aria "Pieta Signore" and Mozart's "Voi che Sapete." The former she gave in a very large and impressive manner, and with remarkable beauty and fervor of expression. The noble composition could scarcely have had a finer or more musicianly interpretation. The Mozart aria was likewise charmingly sung, and with a feeling of the deepest refinement. Had it been taken in a tempo a shade slower the effect would have been still better. At the next concert the purely orchestral selections will be: Overture, "Academic Festival," Brahms, and Symphony C, Mozart, No. 6, Brahms; Allegro Vivace and Finale, "Prometheus," Beethoven; Overture, "La Lac des Fées" Auber. The soloist is to be Mr. Bernhard Listemann, who will perform Ernst's "Concert Pathétique" and Vieuxtemps's Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The sixth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought the following programme:

Prelude to "Parsifal".....Wagner
Aria di Chiesa.....Stradella
Fourth Symphony, in D minor.....Schumann
Aria, "Voi chi sapete".....Mozart
Prelude to "Parsifal".....Wagner
Huldigungs-Marsch.....Wagner
Miss Emily Winant was the singer.

Of course the chief object of curiosity was the prelude to "Parsifal," given here for the first time. Mr. Henschel's idea of playing it twice at the same concert was a happy one. This excellent plan has been tried before, and always with gratifying results; Mr. Lang once gave a similar double performance of Mendelssohn's "Walpurgisnacht" here, and von Bülow even dared to give the whole of the Ninth Symphony twice on the same evening at Berlin, if we mistake not. Of all the orchestral numbers by Wagner that we have yet heard, with the exception of the prelude to "Das Rheingold," this "Parsifal" prelude seems the most risky to attempt giving at a concert. In listening to it in such circumstances, it is hard for the majority of an audience not to make greater demands upon the music than the composer intended it to fulfil. One naturally looks for some distinct and definite musical structure and coherent development in what one is asked to listen to at a concert, or else, as it may happen in these days, for the picturesque musical presentation, or suggestion, of some poetic train of thought or dramatic sequence of events. That is to say, that one instinctively inclines to accept what one hears, either as music pure and simple (as in the classic masters), as pure "programme music" (as in Liszt), or else as a combination of both (as in Berlioz). But, if a pretty exhaustive study of Wagner's theory of art do not mislead us, we cannot think that Wagner himself would be content to have the orchestral preludes to his later music-dramas (except the one to "Die Meistersinger") classed in any one of these three categories. Much as Wagner deprecates that coherent organic development of themes, which is the sine qua non of music as an absolute and independent art, he is an equally firm opponent of that phase of instrumental composition which is known as programme music. His orchestral preludes are intended to be merely sonorous invitations to the æsthetic mood of an audience to attune itself to the proper key for the due enjoyment and understanding of the drama that is to follow. They pave the way for the ensuing drama, not so much by an attempt at definite dramatic suggestion, as by a mere appeal to this or that general emotional frame of mind. They are moody rather than picturesque. Looking at the prelude to "Parsifal" in this light, one cannot but see how admirably it is fitted to attain its object. Its notable characteristics are religious solemnity, the richest beauty of color, and a total absence of the intenser dramatic qualities. The three leading motives upon which it is built, i. e., "The Communion Hymn of the Knights of the Grail," the solemn "Grail-motive" proper, and "The Hymn of the Acolytes,"

"Der Glaube lebt, Die Taube schwebt," etc.,

are singularly beautiful in themselves, albeit the absence of all thematic development and coherence between the three periods into which the prelude is divided gives the whole composition the air of free improvisation. One wonders, and perhaps regrets, a little that Wagner has not here tried his old plan of a gradual crescendo and diminuendo without disruption of musical continuity, as in the preludes to "Lohengrin" and "Tristan." But as it stands, the "Parsifal" prelude is a wondrously beautiful and impressive bit of "mood-painting" (to coin a word), and as such to be enjoyed greatly by any one who looks for nothing more in it. It was admirably played by the orchestra. Schumann's glorious symphony was played with thoroughly excellent attention to every detail; one of the very cleanest bits of playing that we have heard from the Boston orchestra. Strange to say, the full vigor of its effect (in a physical sense) was somewhat marred by its coming after the Wagner prelude.

The orchestration of the latter, albeit never violent, is so full, so rich, so space-filling, with all the quiet character of the music, that Schumann's vastly less far-carrying scoring of his symphony, the musical character of which is almost constantly of the most intense and passionate, sounded a little puny by comparison. One felt the hall to be much too large for the work to make a dynamic effect corresponding to the frenetic violence of its musical intent. The Huldigungs-Marsch, written for military band for the coronation of the king of Bavaria, and re-scored for orchestra by Raff, was superbly played, and made an immense effect. Only would that the cymbals had sounded less like breaking crockery in the fortissimo passages! Miss Winant's singing of the "Stradella" aria was simply grand—the finest thing we have yet heard from her. Her singing of Cherubino's beautiful song, from "Figaro," was also refined and artistic, albeit the tempo struck us as a little too fast to allow her voice to get all the sweetness out of the melody to the last drop.

The programme for the next concert will be:
Overture, "Academic Festival".....Brahms
Concert Pathétique pour Violon.....Ernst
Symphony in C.....Mozart
(No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Allegro Vivace and Finale. ("Prometheus.")
Beethoven
Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for violin...Vieuxtemps
Overture, "Lac des Fées".....Auber
Mr. Bernhard Listemann will be the violinist.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A little taste of Wagner's new musical drama, "Parsifal," was vouchsafed the patrons of the symphony concert on Saturday evening, the prelude to the work being given at the opening of the concert, and repeated near the close. The fact that this was not only the first performance of the composition here, but very nearly the first in this country, gave the concert a peculiar distinction, and imparted an added keenness to the curiosity which is always excited whenever the first hearing of a work of importance is promised. No one could be more ready than we to commend the enterprise which made possible the gratification of this curiosity, but, novelty aside, we very much doubt if the majority of our concert patrons would crave to hear this prelude often. Still more do we doubt if, considered on its own merits as a distinct musical composition, it would ever be accorded a place among those creations which the world agrees to call great, whatever claims to such distinction the work to which this is but the introduction may possess, taken as a whole. But Wagner's works suffer more seriously than those of any other standard composer when their integrity is destroyed, and every one knows how many elements are with them necessary to this integrity. This "prelude" must be considered strictly in the light of the office it performs, which is evidently not so much exposition as preparation. It is little more than a bit of orchestral coloring, and its service may be much like that of a properly tinted light thrown upon the stage of a theatre to heighten the effect of the scenic picture. Viewed simply as a piece of orchestration it is very brilliant, after Wagner's own fashion, though it is more reserved, and consequently less striking, than much he has written. In fact, its form is so simple as barely to reach the dignity of form at all, if we may use a paradox; it is vague less from complexity than from paucity of ideas. The attempt is made, apparently, to put the listener into a highly religious and heroic frame of mind suitable to the motive and incidents of the drama, but Wagner—highly poetic as much of his writing is—rarely mounts above the realm of the sensuous, and in this reach after spirituality his weakness makes itself peculiarly felt. What impassible gulf there is between this specimen of the "music of the future" and the greatness of much that these latter-day prophets now pronounce obsolete, was illustrated with peculiar force at this concert by the playing of Schumann's D-minor symphony between the two performances of the prelude.

The only other instrumental number was another selection from Wagner—the "Huldigungs" march, written to celebrate the coronation of King Louise of Bavaria. This shows Wagner in his best vein, being written before he had begun to ignore tunelessness as an element of his music, as was shown by the very captivating and strongly-accented melody which forms a connecting link between the majestic opening and finale of the march. The orchestra played superbly throughout the concert, though it particularly distinguished itself in the Wagner selections. If the symphony was somewhat hurried, this was a fault in the right direction, for assuredly an over-slow tempo would almost have ruined the beauties of this work—such a masterpiece of wild, wanton merriment in musical form. It was performed with wonderful clearness considering the many difficulties it presents and the large call it makes on an orchestra's efficiency in playing well together. The soloist of the evening, Miss Emily Winant, sang the "Pieta Signore" aria, by Stradella, and Mozart's "Voi che sapete," with the peculiar graces of voice and style that always makes her singing extremely acceptable.

At the next concert Mr. B. Listemann will be the soloist, and the following will be the programme:

Overture (Academic Festival), Brahms; concert pathétique pour violon, Ernst; symphony in C, Mozart, (No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition); allegro vivace and finale (Prometheus), Beethoven; fantasy on Slavonic melodies for violin, Vieuxtemps; overture (Lac des Fées), Auber.

Musical. ^{Home} ^{Journal}

THE APPLAUSE OF THE BACK BAY.

VORSPIEL MIT WORTE.

The innocents are trusting, and some are asking if the applause of good music at the last symphony concert did not show an appreciation of music such as exists in no other city, neither in New York, Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, New Orleans, nor in any city outside of Boston, where the Bostonians, true and faithful, would feign believe that most o' the heathen live.

Our answer would be as follows:

There can be no commensurate understanding of the professed love that exists in Boston for either the classical, or "the music of the future."

For example, the last Boston symphony concert was even more enjoyed by its host of musicians and those who merely aspire to be connoisseurs, than by many of the refined yet promiscuous quota from the Back Bay. Unanimous, frequent and vociferous, however, were the expressions of admiration, for which kid gloves, simultaneously with Tuttle's best stock, smallest sizes, became the medium.

The flap-eared hypocrites; the anonymous hypercritics who are disowned by the press and whose ears are just to the reverse; and the dyspeptics whose days would be soon remembered were it not for mother Euterpe's cordial;—all pretend very plausibly to love certain beautiful tunes; of which the first of the aforementioned know nothing; in which the second of the same perceive altogether too much; while the third whose digestive organs are out of order are privileged to growl without pay, and no thanks.

It is highly probable, then, that those who applauded Parsifal the loudest, beg pardon, with such exquisite zest, and upon a single hearing of it, were unable to express a recognition of it in the same concert with any perspicuous evidence of sincerity.

This is called an age of musical progress. Such it really is. The great creations that make it such are the innocent cause of much hypocrisy.

Let us have honesty in the expression of musical opinions. The knowledge of how to have it will be vouchsafed.

There is quite as much hypocrisy in musical affairs in Boston as anywhere else. Idiots will deny this.

There might be named a certain class of people here who at the final sound of the music of the future will rise from their graves to tell Apollo of the bliss of a resurrection, to which his lute is sounded. What a sweet transcendence indeed that would be for some—not all, by any means—of the large and fashionable—audiences?—no; the remains of audiences from the beautiful Back Bay of much beloved modern Athens. Were it not for the sacrilege implied, we could fancy the picturesqueness of each corpse crying aloud to Apollo and Euterpe: "God and goddess, have we not in thy naesms cast out devils to a cause most holy? Vouchsafe, then, as a reward to us, and bless us with a special sacrament, to list only to such melodies as to the muse alone are known."

These art-pretenders must have a future resting-place. Possibly from the throne where Apollo and Euterpe reign, with Bach on the right, Beethoven on the left, and Wagner on that "future" place, the topmost pinnacle; all claims for reward for those who have served the cause might be met with a sacrilegious plagiarism of "We know you not; depart, ye," etc. Then shall two who are worthy to no longer permit this earthly fawning to them; two, whose good work it were but fair, respectively to acknowledge;—these two alone might be accepted by that famous quintette in which Euterpe should finger the harp, and Apollo play his lute, and Bach his clavier, Beethoven his spinet and Wagner his flügel. The baton should be raised for the last time, and the good philanthropist to concert-goers should give the signal for a general clapping of hands, as the skeletons gracefully depart in peace to Hades; a place that is not the one 'bout which Dante wrote, and Milton made a highly colored poem, but 'tis the Hades to which our Oscar wild pertains; there to sing a music which they of all people honestly would appreciate; the music of one grand mutual admiration Shandel and Shaden and defunct Starvard Musical Society.

Let us think now of

A DIFFERENT CLASS.

During a career beyond the earth's mud let us look for sincerity in musical appreciation, first to

TRUE MUSICIANS;

and again among the precious few outside who are not contaminated by the tail of the profession; to the

MUSICALLY HONEST FOLK

who love Strauss waltzes or Les Belles Helenes, or who may appreciate the goodly repertoire of tunes in Pounce, Pounce, Pounce & Co., or who, belonging to the Ace of Clubs, are not so easily scared by the sound of a banjo. Few people like music as Byron did when he heard the hand-organ,—present company from the Back Bay at a Boston Symphony concert always suspected. However, if Back Bay society could only be assured that Byron's ears were tickled by the music of the hand-organ, the grinders themselves might aspire to baptism and cleansing in the Back-Bay waters, and thus would their eminent services be secured at $20.00 each, to attend the Back Bay parties. Few now-a-days could respect the Iroquois Sachem; of whom Coleridge writes that he was taken all over Paris and shown the Tuileries as well as Notre Dame; but he found nothing so beautiful as "The Cook's Shop"; and Coleridge admired him for his savage honesty. Let us not forget to add that the unpopular view that may have been taken of large and fashionable audiences is somewhat attributed to the effect of the Vorspiel from Parsifal which began the

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Seriously speaking it was a symphony concert of the highest grade of excellence. Parsifal is Wagner's latest work, and it was the capital idea of Mr. Henschel to have the vorspiel performed twice at the same concert; surely no encore would have been granted it, and those who could not understand it the first time would not have had the brass opportunity of appreciating it the second. It is not Wagner's greatest vorspiel by any means. It has neither the charm of that to Tristan, nor the depth of that to Lohengrin, nor, of course, the formal magnitude of the Tannhauser overture, yet it is a very poetic and beautiful prelude. The orchestration is of a creed that like good wine, such as the Catholics use, improves with age. The unisonal effect of the opening theme, if not the exquisite bit of flap-doodle that it is accredited as being, is at least a very pleasant and poetic conception. The polyphony or net-work of treatment is very thorough; and while not so intricate as to surpass a comprehension of it, it has a sound and apostolic basis. The modulations are abruptly and sometimes rudely made, but one has learned to accept and make the most of this phase in the creative genius of Wagner. Four hearings of the work, welcome though they be, two at the rehearsal and two at the concert, are not enough. Seriously, the effect and beauty of the music must improve with future hearings.

The make-ups of the work technically were enough to cause the violinists to labor and lament to their utmost, though one would barely have discerned it from the performance of this merciless style of writing.

It reminds us, however, that Wagner has a precedent in Beethoven in creating difficult and even impossible technique, for the time being, in order to further the interests of an inspiration.

Therefore several new keys were added to the bassoon in Beethoven's day.

It was a smooth and excellent performance of the vorspiel throughout, excelling, however, in the perfection that the brass instruments contributed.

Regarding the rendering of the Stradella; and the well-known aria that Miss Emily Winant performed at this concert, but little need be said. She sings too well in points of intelligence, purity and expression to render it possible to deteriorate from her performance by the remotest suggestion of the "buts" that belong to a very superficial order of hypercriticism.

Schumann's symphony in D minor, even though it does not quite reach so high a domain as the one in B flat, is all that the true music lover might desire in royalty and loveliness. The reading of it was masterly and the performance first-class—"never mind the why and wherefores."

Wagner's Huldigungs March closed the concert. It was a fitting close in a concert with which only those might find fault as were so susceptible innocent last year as to infer that it was impossible for Mr. Henschel and his methods to improve.

It is with as much common-sense that one can now refer to this improvement and the high grade to which it has arrived, as it was downright honesty for one to express the direful need of it last year; and don't you forget it—forgive the slang—you who wrote anonymous letters to newspapers, the employes of which afterwards revealed your names;—you who were simply given to a man-worship of Mr. Henschel last year that was as humiliating to yourselves as it even reflected a lasting honor to those whom you attacked.

Next time, if you must be mean, it might be just as well to sign your own names to your mean-ness.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

VII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 18TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Academic Festival.) BRAHMS.

CONCERT PATHETIQUE POUR VIOLON. ERNST.
(In one movement.) Allegro moderato.

SYMPHONY in C. MOZART.
(No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition.)

Adagio; Allegro spiritoso.—Poco Adagio.—
Menuetto.—Presto.—

FINALE. (The Creatures of Prometheus, op. 43.) BEETHOVEN.

FANTASY ON SLAVONIC MELODIES FOR VIOLIN. VIEUXTEMPS.

OVERTURE. (Lac des Fées.) AUBER.

SOLOIST:

MR. BERNHARD LISTEMANN.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Globe
An Event Thoroughly Pleasing
and Satisfactory.

A Fine Programme Most Admirably Rendered.

The Great Masters of Music Interpreted by Boston's Talent.

The seventh concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, was a pleasing and thoroughly satisfactory event. The programme opened with one of Brahms's recent works, the "Academic Festival" overture. Although it begins with a simple, though rather odd, and interesting melody, it speedily develops into complications and the unusual harmonic progressions peculiar to the composer, which involves the listener unused to the modern school of "absolute music" in doubt and uncertainty. But the high artistic level of Brahms's work is sure to reveal itself after patient examination, even where at first it is the least obvious. This may not be true of an audience as a whole, though to the cosmopolitan in the musical world it certainly is. It is very plain why a person who has been brought up to regard the classical purity of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven as the standard by which every other composer must be judged should look with an eye of alarm on the bold innovations of a Wagner, a Liszt or a Brahms. Not that it is meant to imply that the Wagner and the Brahms school are in any way identified. But it is very true that we are very apt to venerate that which is old while we look with an eye of suspicion upon that which belongs to our own time. Those people who, by nature or prejudice, are bound down within the petty limits of a school or a style in music, who see only "certain things" to admire in the music of the schools which are not in accordance with the tenets of their own, are very much limited in their enjoyment of the orchestral concerts with which this city is now

So Bountifully Blessed.

The entirely cosmopolitan character of the programmes should be welcomed by all liberal lovers of art, and it is with pleasure that we note the frequent recurrence upon these musical bills of fare of such names as Brahms, Wagner and Berlioz. Brahms's music is less obvious on first hearing to the average audience, it is safe to say, than that of almost any other eminent composer, and in listening to it one needs to bear in mind the caution of Robert Schumann in his famous advice to young musicians not to judge of a work on first hearing. The overture was finely played by the orchestra. Indeed we have come now to look for thoroughly excellent work from this organization. Mr. Henschel's absolute control over them has become more and more apparent. Their unity of action in difficult passages is most praiseworthy, and the conductor himself is making so much more satisfactory a record this year than during his opening season that the time for severe criticism seems to have passed.

The second number of the programme, Ernst's "concert pathétique pour violon" in F sharp minor, brought Mr. Bernhard Listemann from his familiar place at the head of the first violins to a more conspicuous position before the audience. He was greeted with overwhelming enthusiasm, both before and after his playing. And it was, indeed, but the richly-merited recognition of a masterly piece of work. As an orchestral work, the concerto is of no mean order, but it is seldom heard. The fact is that the violin is given passages of such enormous technical difficulty that few masters of the instrument are courageous enough to attempt them, and even Ernst himself was not always successful in giving them a clear interpretation. Mr. Listemann and immediately resumed his seat among the orchestra as nonchalantly as if nothing had happened. He was compelled by the enthusiastic plaudits to rise and bow his acknowledgments, and he was also presented with a handsome bouquet of flowers.

Played It with Apparent Ease.

The symphony of the evening was one of Mozart's. While one might regret that the selection was not made from one of the master's three greater works of this class, we must needs be delighted and pleased with the ever fresh and graceful melodies and the bright and happy thoughts that continually present themselves throughout the work. Both the orchestra's and Mr. Henschel's work were excellent throughout. The symphony concluded the first part of the programme.

After the brief intermission the concert was resumed with the finale to Beethoven's ballet, "Prometheus." This is a very popular work. First produced in 1801, its success immediately warranted its publication in popular form. It had a run of sixteen nights. The finale is chiefly interesting, however, from the fact that it contains an air which afterwards served for the subject of the last movement of the Eroica Symphony. It was given an admirable rendering by the trained body of musicians. The fantasia on Slavonic melodies for the violin, by Vieuxtemps, was given by Mr. Listemann a most finished and artistic reading, and gained for him the heartiest applause of the evening. The concert closed with Auber's overture, "Lac des Fées," in the rendition of which the work of the orchestra was fully up to the high standard maintained by them throughout the evening. The programme for the concert next Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Prelude—(Melusine).....Grammann
Aria—(Alessandro).....Handel
Symphony in E flat—(Eroica) No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Marcia funebre. (Adagio assai)
—Scherzo. (Allegro vivace)—Allegro molto;
Poco Adante; Presto.
Serenade for strings in F. No. 2, op. 63....Volkman
Allegro moderato; Molto vivace; waltz; march.
Cavatina—(Freischuetz).....Weber
Polonaise—(Struensee).....Meyerbeer
Soloist, Mrs. Georg Henschel.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction at Music Hall, Saturday evening, was the seventh of the series and was numerously attended by an appreciative audience. The following programme was performed, Mr. Bernhard Listemann being the soloist:

Overture (Academic Festival).....Brahms
Concert Pathétique pour Violon.....Ernst
Symphony in C.....Mozart
Finale (The Creatures of Prometheus, op. 43).....Beethoven
Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for Violin.....Vieuxtemps
Overture (Lac des Fées).....Auber

There can be no doubt of the excellent form to which Mr. Henschel has brought his orchestra this season. The playing of the above programme was wellnigh faultless throughout all its varied requirements. Mr. Listemann's violin playing was masterly in the extreme, and gave the fullest pleasure to his audience. The programme for next Saturday

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Globe
An Event Thoroughly Pleasing
and Satisfactory.

A Fine Programme Most Admirably Rendered.

The Great Masters of Music Interpreted by Boston's Talent.

The seventh concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, was a pleasing and thoroughly satisfactory event. The programme opened with one of Brahms's recent works, the "Academic Festival" overture. Although it begins with a simple, though rather odd, and interesting melody, it speedily develops into complications and the unusual harmonic progressions peculiar to the composer, which involves the listener unused to the modern school of "absolute music" in doubt and uncertainty. But the high artistic level of Brahms's work is sure to reveal itself after patient examination, even where at first it is the least obvious. This may not be true of an audience as a whole, though to the cosmopolitan in the musical world it certainly is. It is very plain why a person who has been brought up to regard the classical purity of Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven as the standard by which every other composer must be judged should look with an eye of alarm on the bold innovations of a Wagner, a Liszt or a Brahms. Not that it is meant to imply that the Wagner and the Brahms school are in any way identified. But it is very true that we are very apt to venerate that which is old while we look with an eye of suspicion upon that which belongs to our own time. Those people who, by nature or prejudice, are bound down within the petty limits of a school or a style in music, who see only "certain things" to admire in the music of the schools which are not in accordance with the tenets of their own, are very much limited in their enjoyment of the orchestral concerts with which this city is now

So Bountifully Blessed.

The entirely cosmopolitan character of the programmes should be welcomed by all liberal lovers of art, and it is with pleasure that we note the frequent recurrence upon these musical bills of fare of such names as Brahms, Wagner and Berlioz. Brahms's music is less obvious on first hearing to the average audience, it is safe to say, than that of almost any other eminent composer, and in listening to it one needs to bear in mind the caution of Robert Schumann in his famous advice to young musicians not to judge of a work on first hearing. The overture was finely played by the orchestra. Indeed we have come now to look for thoroughly excellent work from this organization. Mr. Henschel's absolute control over them has become more and more apparent. Their unity of action in difficult passages is most praiseworthy, and the conductor himself is making so much more satisfactory a record this year than during his opening season that the time for severe criticism seems to have passed.

The second number of the programme, Ernst's "concert pathétique pour violon" in F sharp minor, brought Mr. Bernhard Listemann from his familiar place at the head of the first violins to a more conspicuous position before the audience. He was greeted with overwhelming enthusiasm, both before and after his playing. And it was, indeed, but the richly-merited recognition of a masterly piece of work. As an orchestral work, the concerto is of no mean order, but it is seldom heard. The fact is that the violin is given passages of such enormous technical difficulty that few masters of the instrument are courageous enough to attempt them, and even Ernst himself was not always successful in giving them a clear interpretation. Mr. Listemann and immediately resumed his seat among the orchestra as nonchalantly as if nothing had happened. He was compelled by the enthusiastic plaudits to rise and bow his acknowledgments, and he was also presented with a handsome bouquet of flowers.

Played It with Apparent Ease.

The symphony of the evening was one of Mozart's. While one might regret that the selection was not made from one of the master's three greater works of this class, we must needs be delighted and pleased with the ever fresh and graceful melodies and the bright and happy thoughts that continually present themselves throughout the work. Both the orchestra's and Mr. Henschel's work were excellent throughout. The symphony concluded the first part of the programme.

After the brief intermission the concert was resumed with the finale to Beethoven's ballet, "Prometheus." This is a very popular work. First produced in 1801, its success immediately warranted its publication in popular form. It had a run of sixteen nights. The finale is chiefly interesting, however, from the fact that it contains an air which afterwards served for the subject of the last movement of the Eroica Symphony. It was given an admirable rendering by the trained body of musicians. The fantasia on Slavonic melodies for the violin, by Vieuxtemps, was given by Mr. Listemann a most finished and artistic reading, and gained for him the heartiest applause of the evening. The concert closed with Auber's overture, "Lac des Fées," in the rendition of which the work of the orchestra was fully up to the high standard maintained by them throughout the evening. The programme for the concert next Saturday afternoon is as follows:

Prelude—(Melusine).....Grammann
Aria—(Alessandro).....Handel
Symphony in E flat—(Eroica) No. 3, op. 55.
Beethoven
Allegro con brio—Marcia funebre. (Adagio assai)
—Scherzo. (Allegro vivace)—Allegro molto:
Poco Adante; Presto.
Serenade for strings in F. No. 2, op. 63....Volkman
Allegro moderato; Molto vivace; waltz; march.
Cavatina—(Freischuetz).....Weber
Polonaise—(Struensee).....Meyerbeer
Soloist, Mrs. Georg Henschel.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Georg Henschel's direction at Music Hall, Saturday evening, was the seventh of the series and was numerously attended by an appreciative audience. The following programme was performed, Mr. Bernhard Listemann being the soloist.

Overture (Academic Festival).....Brahms
Concert Pathétique pour Violon.....Ernst
Symphony in C.....Mozart
Finale (The Creatures of Prometheus, op. 43).....Beethoven
Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for Violin.....Vieuxtemps
Overture (Lac des Fées).....Auber

There can be no doubt of the excellent form to which Mr. Henschel has brought his orchestra this season. The playing of the above programme was well-nigh faultless throughout all its varied requirements. Mr. Listemann's violin playing was masterly in the extreme, and gave the fullest pleasure to his audience. The programme for next Saturday evening it is follows, Mrs. Georg Henschel being the soloist:

Prelude, "Melusine".....	Grammann
Aria, "Alessandro".....	Handel
Symphony in E flat, "Eroica," No. 3, op. 55.....	Beethoven
Serenade for strings in F, No. 2, op. 63.....	Volkmann
Cavatina, "Freischuetz".....	Weber
Polonaise, "Struensee".....	Meyerbeer

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Seventh Programme of the Season's Series.

The seventh programme of the season's series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. Bernhard Listemann, violinist, being the soloist. The selections were:

Overture ("Academic Festival").....	Brahms
Concert pathétique pour violon.....	Ernst
Symphony in C.....	Mozart
(No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Finale ("Prometheus," op. 43).....	Beethoven
Fantasy on Slavonic melodies for violin.....	Vieuxtemps
Overture ("Lac des Fées").....	Auber

The programme proved a perfect mosaic of melody, and its presentation was well worthy of the rare merit of its several numbers. The Brahms overture, with all its bright themes, quaint effects and suggestions of scenes of students' revelries, was presented with even better success than attended its first and second hearings here when given a year ago by the Thomas orchestra, and its melodious measures fitly ushered in the evening's programme. The symphony, with its wealth of melody, was played with charming delicacy, and the reading gave all its beauties their full value. The Beethoven finale was equally pleasing, and the brilliant Auber overture was presented with so much spirit and dash that it left the pleasantest memories of the concert which it ended. Of the efforts of the evening's soloist, it is difficult to speak without appearing extravagant in praise of the modest gentleman who so ably leads this orchestra as its first violinist. Mr. Listemann's mastery abilities were brilliantly shown in the Ernst number, but, in the Vieuxtemps fantasy, it seemed as if nothing could better the presentation of the difficulties of the composition. The taking melodies forming the themes were sung by the instrument under the magic touch of the performer's bow, and in all the dazzling variations the melody was carried without a blur or particle of indistinctness. The greeting given Mr. Listemann was a most hearty one, and the applause following his efforts was a well merited tribute to his genius. Next week the soloist will be Mrs. Georg Henschel, and the selections as follows: Prelude ("Melusine"), Grammann; aria ("Alessandro"), Handel; symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven; serenade for three strings in F, No. 2, op. 63, Volkmann; cavatina ("Freischuetz"), Weber; polonaise ("Struensee"), Meyerbeer.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Saturday night's concert in the series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra was a singularly bright link in the shining chain. It was bright not only in the intrinsic worth of the music performed,—though in this respect it did not dim by comparison some of the programmes that had already been given,—but also, more literally, in the prevailing tunefulness of the music and its abundance of features calculated to entertain the curiosity even when they failed greatly to satisfy the musical sense; but particularly was it bright, even to the degree of brilliancy, in the general excellence of the performance. The Brahms overture, "Academic Festival," with which the concert opened, is, like so much of the composer's writing, chiefly interesting as a study of his peculiar methods, though there is more than the usual proportion of matter that appeals to the taste of the amateur as well as that of the student. It has been heard here before, but it cannot be said to improve materially on closer acquaintance. In the glorious Mozart symphony in C—No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition—and in the lovely finale to Beethoven's "Prometheus" music, we had the gospel of melody and classic harmony preached with sublime eloquence. In the characteristic Auber overture, "Lac des Fées," which formed the dessert of the feast, the brilliancy of the entertainment dashed itself into a sparkling spray of captivating tunes, bewitching rhythms, and diverting surprises of time, accent and instrumental treatment, sending the audience away in the liveliest mood. Let us say in a word that the performance of these orchestral numbers was admirable. Since the Boston Symphony orchestra first came before the public it has not, perhaps, given a performance of such even excellence, and it is a pleasure to notice how steadily this band has grown, even during the continuance of the present series of concerts, in all directions, which go the development of a model orchestra. Mr. Henschel is fast removing all causes for serious complaint on the part of his critics by the judgment and skill his leadership has shown of late, and his orchestra is demonstrating more and more by its efficiency the inestimable advantages such an organization enjoys in constant practice together under one drill-master. Its conductor's most serious short-coming at present is his old tendency to unsteadiness of tempo, and his orchestra fails oftenest in the direction of coarseness in passages requiring the utmost delicacy of treatment, and lack of clearness in swift and complicated scorings, the latter fault of course being largely chargeable to the conductor. But, whereas these weaknesses were once glaring, they now very rarely offend seriously, and on last Saturday night few but practised critics on the alert for flaws could have found any occasion for faultfinding with a performance which was on the whole so fine.

Mr. Bernhard Listemann was the soloist and the hero of the evening. The overwhelming burst of applause with which he was greeted before he had played a note told unmistakably of the general respect and esteem with which his record among us has won for him, as well as the universal admiration of his brilliant powers as an artist. His work at this concert more than justified this admiration. His selections were Ernst's "Concert Pathétique" in one movement and a fantasy on Slavonic melodies by Vieuxtemps. In both, he brilliantly distinguished himself by the mastery ease with which he overcame technical difficulties of all kinds, playing with such smoothness as to make them seem like mere trifles, and not less by the very high artistic character of his interpretation. His performance called out redoubled storms of applause, and he was further complimented by the presentation of a beautiful bouquet of flowers at the close of his first number.

For the concert next week Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloist. Following is the programme:—

Prelude—"Melusine", Grammann; Aria—"Alessandro", Handel; Symphony in E-flat—"Eroica", No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven; Serenade for strings in F, No. 2, op. 63, Volkmann; Cavatina—"Freischuetz", Weber; Polonaise—"Struensee", Meyerbeer.
--

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture (Academic Festival).....	Brahms.
Concert Pathétique pour Violon.....	Ernst.
(In one movement.) Allegro moderato.
Symphony in C.....	Mozart.
(No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition.)
Adagio; Allegro spiritoso.—Poco Adagio.
Menuetto.—Presto.
Finale (The Creatures of Prometheus, op. 43).....	Beethoven.
Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for Violin.....	Vieuxtemps.
Overture (Lac des Fées).....	Auber.

There is not much to say about the concert of last night; when all is well performed the reviewer's remarks are necessarily brief. "Happy are those countries which have no history," runs a French proverb, and the remark can be applied to art occasions with but slight deviation. The programme of last night began with Brahms Academic Festival Overture, not one of the greatest of the master's works, but still majestic, solemn, and imposing. It was interesting to compare this with the Wagner music we have recently heard at these concerts. There was some similarity in the use of woodwind (oboes especially) and in the brass; also in the pompous manner in which the final climax is reached, and orchestrated. In such a vein Brahms can be called a more versatile Wagner without theories. Mr. Bernhard Listemann was the soloist of the concert, and his work was such as to call forth unlimited praise. His first number was the Concert Pathétique in one movement. Its chief theme, from which it probably receives the name, is not unlike, in its form, to the first phrase of several American popular ballads, several of which have a stereotyped first period consisting of a dotted quarter, five eighth notes, and a half-note drawn down to a final quarter note in strong postamento fashion. But this theme is worked up and varied in Ernst's peculiar vein. There was absolute ease displayed in every difficulty, and the trills and fioriture against the melody in the wood wind, and the subsequent arpeggi against the notes of the horns were remarkably delicate yet clear. In the second solo, a Slavonic Fantasy, by Vieuxtemps, every kind of bowing and stopping seemed represented, and every difficulty again disappeared in the artist's wonderful technique. His fingering is marvellous, and his purity of intonation even in the softest passages sull ponticello was free from every trace of scratchiness or break. His manner constantly gains in repose. With a little more breadth of tone Mr. Listemann could rank with the very best of the artists that Boston has heard. Certainly this was the most satisfactory violin solo playing of the season thus far, and we have heard some good artists here during the past two months. The great applause which greeted the violinist must have assured him not only that the excellence of his work was appreciated at this concert, but that the public recognize the quiet influence he is constantly exerting in Boston's music. The Symphony was the Mozart, in C—No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition. It was clearly played throughout, and is a most genial and beautiful work, although the Adagio was of the "heavenly length" which is usually associated with Schubert's symphonic movements. The Finale of the Prometheus music was also clearly and smoothly given. The final overture, Auber's Lac des Fées was interesting in its Auberian prettiness. All well-known devices were there—charming tunes that any one would like to whistle, terminating in abrupt sporzandi with all the power of cymbals, grosse caisse, and brasses; march rhythms, and polka movements with triangles and bells tinkling along; sentimental bits of flute solo, etc., etc. In short, a work that pleased the audience greatly, and would give pleasure to the musician who is not a martinet, for the first two or three times of hearing. It was played with the precision that characterized the whole concert. Next week the programme will be as follows:—

Prelude. (Melusine).....	Grammann
Aria. (Alessandro).....	Handel
Symphony in E flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55.....	Beethoven
Allegro con brio.—Marcha funebre. (Adagio assai.)
Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.
Serenade for Strings in F, No. 2, op. 63.....	Volkmann
Allegro moderato; Molto vivace; Waltz; March.
Cavatina. (Freischuetz).....	Weber
Polonaise (Struensee).....	Meyerbeer

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with Brahms' dry and obtrusively learned "Academic Festival" overture, which does not improve upon acquaintance. The symphony was Mozart's in C, No. 6 of the Breitkopf edition, a noble work, which is too seldom played, and whose equal among the symphonies of its era is only to be found in Beethoven. There is nothing in Haydn as large and as impressive. The slow movement ranks with the most beautiful that Mozart ever wrote. The first allegro is magnificently worked out, and the finale must have been a revelation in its day. Except in the Jupiter symphony the master never produced a finer closing movement. The work was excellently interpreted. The tempi were judiciously taken by Mr. Henschel, except in the case of the minuet, which was played too fast and with over much coarseness. The exquisitely delicate trio was greatly marred from both these causes. The finale to Beethoven's "Prometheus," identical in its principal theme with the finale of the "Eroica" symphony, was carefully and effectively performed. The whole ended with a remarkably spirited rendering of Auber's brilliant and melodious "Lac des Fées" overture. The soloist was Mr. Bernhard Listemann, whose extraordinary technique had the fullest opportunities for its display in Ernst's extremely difficult "Concert Pathétique." This work is a curious mixture of dignity and trivial common-place, but highly interesting on the whole. Full justice was done it by Mr. Listemann. Later in the evening he gave a Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies by Vieuxtemps, another work bristling with technical difficulties. This, also, was played with great precision and refinement of style. At the next concert will be performed, Prelude, "Melusine," Grammann; Symphony, "Eroica," Beethoven; Serenade for strings, Volkmann; Polonaise, "Struensee," Meyerbeer. Mrs. Henschel is to be the soloist.

HENSCHEL.—The Boston critics have entirely changed base in their criticisms of Mr. Geo. Henschel. What they severely condemned in Mr. Henschel last year, they praise to the skies this season. Either Mr. Henschel has converted the critics, or the critics have converted Mr. Henschel. Which is it? Home Journal evening is as follows, Mrs. Georg Henschel being the soloist:

Prelude, "Melusine".....Grammann
 Aria, "Alessandro".....Handel
 Symphony in E flat, "Eroica," No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
 Serenade for strings in F, No. 2, op. 63.....Volkmann
 Cavatina, "Freischuetz".....Weber
 Polonaise, "Struensee".....Meyerbeer

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Seventh Programme of the Season's Series.

The seventh programme of the season's series of concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, Mr. Bernhard Listemann, violinist, being the soloist. The selections were:

Overture ("Academic Festival").....Brahms
 Concert pathétique pour violon.....Ernst
 Symphony in C.....Mozart
 (No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition.)
 Finale ("Prometheus," op. 43).....Beethoven
 Fantasy on Slavonic melodies for violin.....Vieuxtemps
 Overture ("Lac des Fées").....Auber

The programme proved a perfect mosaic of melody, and its presentation was well worthy of the rare merit of its several numbers. The Brahms overture, with all its bright themes, quaint effects and suggestions of scenes of students' revelries, was presented with even better success than attended its first and second hearings here when given a year ago by the Thomas orchestra, and its melodious measures fitly ushered in the evening's programme. The symphony, with its wealth of melody, was played with charming delicacy, and the reading gave all its beauties their full value. The Beethoven finale was equally pleasing, and the brilliant Auber overture was presented with so much spirit and dash that it left the pleasantest memories of the concert which it ended. Of the efforts of the evening's soloist, it is difficult to speak without appearing extravagant in praise of the modest gentleman who so ably leads this orchestra as its first violinist. Mr. Listemann's mastery abilities were brilliantly shown in the Ernst number, but, in the Vieuxtemps fantasy, it seemed as if nothing could better the presentation of the difficulties of the composition. The taking melodies forming the themes were sung by the instrument under the magic touch of the performer's bow, and in all the dazzling variations the melody was carried without a blur or particle of indistinctiveness. The greeting given Mr. Listemann was a most hearty one, and the applause following his efforts was a well merited tribute to his genius. Next week the soloist will be Mrs. Georg Henschel, and the selections as follows: Prelude ("Melusine"), Grammann; aria ("Alessandro"), Handel; symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven; serenade for three strings in F, No. 2, op. 63, Volkmann; cavatina ("Freischuetz"), Weber; polonaise ("Struensee"), Meyerbeer.

THE SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Saturday night's concert in the series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra was a singularly bright link in the shining chain. It was bright not only in the intrinsic worth of the music performed,—though in this respect it did not dim by comparison some of the programmes that had already been given,—but also, more literally, in the prevailing tunefulness of the music and its abundance of features calculated to entertain the curiosity even when they failed greatly to satisfy the musical sense; but particularly was it bright, even to the degree of brilliancy, in the general excellence of the performance. The Brahms overture, "Academic Festival," with which the concert opened, is, like so much of the composer's writing, chiefly interesting as a study of his peculiar methods, though there is more than the usual proportion of matter that appeals to the taste of the amateur as well as that of the student. It has been heard here before, but it cannot be said to improve materially on closer acquaintance. In the glorious Mozart symphony in C—No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition—and in the lovely finale to Beethoven's "Prometheus" music, we had the gospel of melody and classic harmony preached with sublime eloquence. In the characteristic Auber overture, "Lac des Fées," which formed the dessert of the feast, the brilliancy of the entertainment dashed itself into a sparkling spray of captivating tunes, bewitching rhythms, and diverting surprises of time, accent and instrumental treatment, sending the audience away in the liveliest mood. Let us say in a word that the performance of these orchestral numbers was admirable. Since the Boston Symphony orchestra first came before the public it has not, perhaps, given a performance of such even excellence, and it is a pleasure to notice how steadily this band has grown, even during the continuance of the present series of concerts, in all directions, which go the development of a model orchestra. Mr. Henschel is fast removing all causes for serious complaint on the part of his critics by the judgment and skill his leadership has shown of late, and his orchestra is demonstrating more and more by its efficiency the inestimable advantages such an organization enjoys in constant practice together under one drill-master. Its conductor's most serious short-coming at present is his old tendency to unsteadiness of tempo, and his orchestra fails oftenest in the direction of coarseness in passages requiring the utmost delicacy of treatment, and lack of clearness in swift and complicated scorings, the latter fault of course being largely chargeable to the conductor. But, whereas these weaknesses were once glaring, they now very rarely offend seriously, and on last Saturday night few but practised critics on the alert for flaws could have found any occasion for faultfinding with a performance which was on the whole so fine.

Mr. Bernhard Listemann was the soloist and the hero of the evening. The overwhelming burst of applause with which he was greeted before he had played a note told unmistakably of the general respect and esteem with which his record among us has won for him, as well as the universal admiration of his brilliant powers as an artist. His work at this concert more than justified this admiration. His selections were Ernst's "Concert Pathétique" in one movement and a fantasy on Slavonic melodies by Vieuxtemps. In both, he brilliantly distinguished himself by the mastery ease with which he overcame technical difficulties of all kinds, playing with such smoothness as to make them seem like mere trifles, and not less by the very high artistic character of his interpretation. His performance called out redoubled storms of applause, and he was further complimented by the presentation of a beautiful bouquet of flowers at the close of his first number.

For the concert next week Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloist. Following is the programme:—

Prelude—"Melusine"), Grammann; Aria—"Alessandro"), Handel; Symphony in E flat—"Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven; Serenade for strings in F, No. 2, op. 63, Volkmann; Cavatina—"Freischuetz"), Weber; Polonaise—"Struensee"), Meyerbeer.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture (Academic Festival).....Brahms.
 Concert Pathétique pour Violon.....Ernst.
 (In one movement.) Allegro moderato.
 Symphony in C.....Mozart.
 (No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition.)
 Adagio: Allegro spiritoso.—Poco Adagio.
 Menuetto.—Presto.
 Finale (The Creatures of Prometheus, op. 43).....Beethoven.
 Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies for Violin.....Vieuxtemps.
 Overture (Lac des Fées).....Auber.

There is not much to say about the concert of last night; when all is well performed the reviewer's remarks are necessarily brief. "Happy are those countries which have no history," runs a French proverb, and the remark can be applied to art occasions with but slight deviation. The programme of last night began with Brahms Academic Festival Overture, not one of the greatest of the master's works, but still majestic, solemn, and imposing. It was interesting to compare this with the Wagner music we have recently heard at these concerts. There was some similarity in the use of woodwind (oboes especially) and in the brass; also in the pompous manner in which the final climax is reached, and orchestrated. In such a vein Brahms can be called a more versatile Wagner without theories. Mr. Bernhard Listemann was the soloist of the concert, and his work was such as to call forth unlimited praise. His first number was the Concert Pathétique in one movement. Its chief theme, from which it probably receives the name, is not unlike, in its form, to the first phrase of several American popular ballads, several of which have a stereotyped first period consisting of a dotted quarter, five eighth notes, and a half-note drawn down to a final quarter note in strong postamento fashion. But this theme is worked up and varied in Ernst's peculiar vein. There was absolute ease displayed in every difficulty, and the trills and floriture against the melody in the wood wind, and the subsequent arpeggio against the notes of the horns were remarkably delicate yet clear. In the second solo, a Slavonic Fantasy, by Vieuxtemps, every kind of bowing and stopping seemed represented, and every difficulty again disappeared in the artist's wonderful technique. His fingering is marvellous, and his purity of intonation even in the softest passages sull ponticello was free from every trace of scratchiness or break. His manner constantly gains in repose. With a little more breadth of tone Mr. Listemann could rank with the very best of the artists that Boston has heard. Certainly this was the most satisfactory violin solo playing of the season thus far, and we have heard some good artists here during the past two months. The great applause which greeted the violinist must have assured him not only that the excellence of his work was appreciated at this concert, but that the public recognize the quiet influence he is constantly exerting in Boston's music. The Symphony was the Mozart in C—No. 6 of Breitkopf's edition. It was clearly played throughout, and is a most genial and beautiful work, although the Adagio was of the "heavenly length" which is usually associated with Schubert's symphonic movements. The Finale of the Prometheus music was also clearly and smoothly given. The final overture, Auber's Lac des Fées was interesting in its Auberian prettiness. All well-known devices were there—charming tunes that any one would like to whistle, terminating in abrupt sporzandi with all the power of cymbals, grosse caisse, and brasses; march rhythms, and polka movements with triangles and bells tinkling along; sentimental bits of flute solo, etc., etc. In short, a work that pleased the audience greatly, and would give pleasure to the musician who is not a martinet, for the first two or three times of hearing. It was played with the precision that characterized the whole concert. Next week the programme will be as follows:—

Prelude, (Melusine).....Grammann
 Aria, (Alessandro).....Handel
 Symphony in E flat, (Eroica), No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
 Allegro con brio.—Marela funebre. (Adagio assai.)
 Scherzo. (Allegro vivace.)—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.
 Serenade for Strings in F, No. 2, op. 63.....Volkmann
 Allegro moderato; Molto vivace; Waltz; March.
 Cavatina. (Freischuetz).....Weber
 Polonaise (Struensee).....Meyerbeer

Boston Symphony Concert.

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. It opened with Brahms' dry and obtrusively learned "Academic Festival" overture, which does not improve upon acquaintance. The symphony was Mozart's in C, No. 6 of the Breitkopf edition, a noble work, which is too seldom played, and whose equal among the symphonies of its era is only to be found in Beethoven. There is nothing in Haydn as large and as impressive. The slow movement ranks with the most beautiful that Mozart ever wrote. The first allegro is magnificently worked out, and the finale must have been a revelation in its day. Except in the Jupiter symphony the master never produced a finer closing movement. The work was excellently interpreted. The tempi were judiciously taken by Mr. Henschel, except in the case of the minuet, which was played too fast and with over much coarseness. The exquisitely delicate trio was greatly marred from both these causes. The finale to Beethoven's "Prometheus," identical in its principal theme with the finale of the "Eroica" symphony, was carefully and effectively performed. The whole ended with a remarkably spirited rendering of Auber's brilliant and melodious "Lac des Fées" overture. The soloist was Mr. Bernhard Listemann, whose extraordinary technique had the fullest opportunities for its display in Ernst's extremely difficult "Concert Pathétique." This work is a curious mixture of dignity and trivial common-place, but highly interesting on the whole. Full justice was done it by Mr. Listemann. Later in the evening he gave a Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies by Vieuxtemps, another work bristling with technical difficulties. This, also, was played with great precision and refinement of style. At the next concert will be performed, Prelude, "Melusine," Grammann; Symphony, "Eroica," Beethoven; Serenade for strings, Volkmann; Polonaise, "Struensee," Meyerbeer. Mrs. Henschel is to be the soloist.

HENSCHEL.—The Boston critics have entirely changed base in their criticisms of Mr. Geo. Henschel. What they severely condemned in Mr. Henschel last year, they praise to the skies this season. Either Mr. Henschel has converted the critics, or the critics have converted Mr. Henschel. Which is it? Home Journal

Musical. ^{Home} ^{Journal}

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—Mr. Georg Henschel no doubt discovered last year, that, the more dull the Boston Symphony concerts were, the more praise he was likely to receive from people who, upon hearing any classical music, think it quite au fait to profess to like most, that which they really like least. The logic of such conclusions must indeed have inspired the selection of the programme for last Saturday's concert, the popular conductor feeling obliged to cater to the fastidious yet insincere as well as to the better portion of his cultivated public.

Look at this selection and think candidly about it: Overture (Academic festival), Brahms: Concert Pathétique pour violin (in one movement), allegro moderato, Ernst; Symphony in C, Mozart; Finale (the Creatures of Prometheus, op. 43), Beethoven; Fantasy on Slavonic Melodies, for violin, Vieuxtemps; Overture (Lac des Fées), Auber.

A renewed experience with that overture by Brahms serves to strengthen the impression that it is a very dull; and, considering its title an inappropriate composition. It is highly probable that no composer could have written such an overture without tainting his inspirations with a well-defined species of melancholia.

Surely, an overture written for a lot of academy students about to celebrate their festival, should be genial, vigorous and enlivening, instead of something quite to the contrary. The themes upon which the work is based are all that could be desired. The thematic development, too, is profound and scholarly. If profundity and scholarship, however, are to be expressed by the most funereal kind of music when the occasion calls for something just to the reverse, then, as a matter of preference, it were reasonable to favor music of the very unscholarly, shallow and even nonsensical type. Science reduces art to a mere travesty when it roughly intrudes itself upon its domain; or whenever it is not naturally and charmingly wedded to it. The picture is only pleasing to the cultivated eye, when it is a true picture in the development of which the unalterable laws of art have only acted as the means to a perfect end.

Despite the scholarly manner in which Brahms orchestrates his festival overture, and the musicianlike work in its other phases, it is so uninteresting as a concert-piece, that it may well be regarded as insufferable.

The remainder of the programme is similar in character to such as Mr. Zerrahn was wont to present for the orchestral union concerts, even years before those by the Harvard Musical Association were anticipated.

More might be appropriately said regarding Mr. Listemann's technique in performing the concert pathétique by Ernst, than about his interpretation. To be more explicit, it is impossible on the spur of the moment to define with exact justice how a great work should be interpreted differently from the manner in which it really is interpreted by any conscientious and able interpreter who has devoted a life-time to it. The record of an interpretation is a matter of impression, and rarely accords well with the spirit of true criticism, when it is severe upon the methods employed by the artist. Mr. Listemann's playing was a marvel in the technique that pertains to a great performance, and although the tone he produced, either from his fault or from that of his instrument, did not impress us as being sufficiently full and round, it was by no means deficient in a poetic conception. His mastery in the highest school of violin playing, such as his well-phrased, even and marvellously fluent execution into which all adequate abandon was thrown,—also delighted his hearers as he performed the long redundant and not altogether pleasing fantasy on Slavonic dances, by Vieuxtemps.

The orchestral performance of the Mozart symphony had a brilliant and modern reading from Mr. Henschel as its basis. The tempo rubato was freely used, and we hardly wonder that it has been seriously and intelligently questioned at these concerts whether Mr. Henschel conducts the orchestra or whether the orchestra, stimulated by Mr. Listemann's impetuosity, is inclined to lead the conductor. The latter's ability is surely shown in other ways than by steadiness and reliability. He has an undeniable right to take his own tempi, and his natural qualifications in this respect are not unfavorable; but recently we notice that he is falling into his old habit of being too freely controlled by Mr. Listemann and the orchestra. His work at the rehearsals is no doubt thorough and admirable; but a respect must still be shown for what he does at the concerts, which many other qualities than those necessary to conductorship would seem to inspire.

The symphony in C of Mozart is as beautiful and majestic in every part as it possibly could have been, if its inspiration had emanated from a more modern source. The concert closed with a brisk performance of Auber's overture, "Lac des Fées." It is an old overture, yet it is such a thoroughly characteristic one of its composer's peculiar forte, its place on the programme was a very welcome one. At the concert to-night, Mrs. Georg Henschel will be the soloist. Her selections will include an aria (Alessandro) by Handel, and a cavatina from Weber's Freyschütz.

7 98

The Symphony Concert closes my short musical tale for this week.

The program was:

Prelude. "Melusine".....Grammann
Aria. "Alessandro".....Handel
Symphony in E flat. "Eroica." No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio.—Marcia funebre. "Adagio assai."
Scherzo. (Allegro vivace.)—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.

Serenade for Strings in F, No. 2, op. 63.....Volkman
Allegro moderato; Molto vivace; Waltz; March.

Cavatina. "Freischütz".....Weber
Polonaise. "Struensee".....Meyerbeer

Grammann's Melusine prelude was of the Wagnerian school of composition, but more melodious than Wagner generally vouchsafes to be. It expressed ecstasy in high legato passages on the strings, and might in a double sense be called a high-strung work. The serenade for strings was fully as interesting, Volkman giving some very effective contrasts in short and characteristic pieces. The first dealt with a symmetrical theme, treated in a symmetrical manner. The second had a violin figure of bright and humorous vein for its subject, and started off immediately in dashing style, and closed with a suddenness that made it doubly effective, yet it was all pure music, presenting neither tone-picture nor sensationalism. The waltz movement was danceable, but its judicious harmonization removed it far from the realm of mere dance music.

The Finale had an energy and brusquerie that reminded of the power of Greig in his Norwegian music. The whole work, in fact the whole program was well performed. The Symphony especially calls for favorable comment. Last year when Henschel took the Funeral March extremely slow, and varied the time greatly between the Scherzo and its trio, the critics were quite unanimous in finding the conception an exaggerated one. At that time also the friends of Mr. Henschel began to rush into print and say that the critics knew nothing at all about it. Now Mr. Henschel, it is said, never reads a criticism, but by a very strange coincidence he has corrected his reading in just the matters with which the reviewers found fault. The Marcia Funebre was taken in a solemn but not mawkish manner, and the trio, in which the horns did excellent work, again became connected with the Scherzo in a legitimate manner. It was one of the finest readings of the work which I have heard in a very long time.

Mrs. Henschel sang the Handelian number with intelligence, but without the broad, declamatory style and the full phrasing, which is necessary to a Handel aria. Her voice is sweet, pure and sympathetic, but these qualities are less drawn on in such an aria than the more dramatic and noble ones. In the Weber aria, on the contrary, she was exactly in her element, and sang with a delicate, devotional style, that carried all hearts with it. She made a thorough success in the number, and was recalled twice with enthusiasm.

The coming week we are to have Zerrahn and the Philharmonic Society in symphonic concerts. The society will fill the gap left by the decease of the Harvard Symphony Concerts. There will be the same conductor, the same orchestra, and many of the same audience, but the programs will be more varied, and will present the old and the new in more equal proportion than was done in the old conservative days.

L. C. E.

99

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

VIII. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 25TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PRELUDE. (Melusine.).....GRAMMANN.

ARIA. (Alessandro.).....HÄNDEL.

SYMPHONY in E flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55.....BEETHOVEN.

Allegro con brio.—Marcia funebre. (Adagio assai).—
Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.—

SERENADE FOR STRINGS in F. No. 2, op. 63.....VOLKMANN.

Allegro moderato; Molto vivace; Waltz; March.—

CAVATINA. (Freischuetz.).....WEBER.

POLONAISE. (Struensee.).....MEYERBEER.

SOLOIST:

MRS. GEORG HENSCHEL.

ARIA. (Alessandro.)

HÄNDEL.

RECIT.: Ne trofei d'Alessandro
Trionfa ancor quest' alma;
Ma funesta Lisaura
Ogni mia palma.
Pur tenterò, tutte d'amor le vie
Perche allettato il vincitore amante,
Infido altrui, sia solo a me costante.
AIR: Lusinghe più care d'amor veri dardi,
Vezzose volate sul labro nei guardi
E tutta involate l'altrui libertà.
Gelosi sospetti, diletta con pene
Fra gioje e tormenti, momenti d'speme
Voi l'armi sarete di vaga beltà.

CAVATINA. (Freischuetz.)

WEBER.

Altho' a cloud o'erspread the heaven,
The sun in splendor shines on high,
By chance alone we are not driven,
A loving Father e'er is nigh.
He heeds and cares for each and all,
His loving eye on us will fall.

I know He will not let me sorrow,
In whom my heart and faith confide,
And though I ne'er should see the morrow,
In Him alone I will abide.
He heeds and cares for each and all,
His loving eye on us will fall.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Tremendous Audience to Enjoy the Programme.

A Fine Production of the Great "Eroica" Symphony.

Mrs. Henschel as the Soloist Receives a Royal Welcome.

If there ever was any series of entertainments in this city of frequent and numerous occurrence which deserved to be called popular, it is the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The crowd usually follows the novelty; when the novelty becomes an old story it is generally deserted. But in all the many concerts which have occurred since Mr. Henschel first lifted his baton to indicate the tempo of Beethoven's "Dedication of the House," considerably over a year ago, there has been no falling off in interest. Rain or shine, the house has always been crowded. At the public rehearsal on Friday afternoon a large number of people who could not gain admission to the hall were forced to stand in the corridors, and last night the audience was immense. If there was any other public entertainment in this city so certain of a great audience as this is, it would take the happy manager but a very short time to make his fortune. There might have been an unusual attraction last night in the announcement that Mrs. Henschel was to sing. Certainly such an announcement is always welcome, and the many friends and admirers of the charming artiste are sure to give her a royal greeting. She sang with her accustomed sweetness and grace an aria from "Alessandro" and a cavatina from "Der Freischuetz." The right hearty enthusiasm which prevailed after each number was the most pronounced expression of approval during the evening. After the last selection she was recalled twice.

The chief event of the evening was, however, the production of the wonderful "Eroica" symphony. It is said that the subject of his third symphony was suggested to Beethoven by a French ambassador at Vienna many months before he had completed his first effort in this department; but it was not until 1803 that the master went seriously to work upon this great composition. The original title was "Bonaparte," but when the news of Napoleon's assumption of the title of emperor reached the master he tore off the title page in a bitter rage. The title of "Eroica" was subsequently given to the work, which was finished in 1804, and performed in public for the first time at a concert of Clements' Sunday evening, April 7, 1805. Beethoven conducted. It is a curious fact that the subject of the wonderful first movement is almost identical with that of an overture which Mozart wrote at the age of 12. Of the funeral march, it has been said that when Beethoven heard of the death of Napoleon he grimly remarked that that portion of the "Eroica" had been prophetic. The subject of the scherzo is supposed to be an Austrian folks' song. As for the much discussed finale, which impresses so many people as incongruous and out of place, it is a set of variations upon a subject which, if we are to judge by the number of different works in which he repeated it, was very dear to the master's heart. He used it first in the finale of Prometheus, published in 1800; second in a contretanz two years later, third as a theme for pianoforte variations about the same time, and lastly in the symphony, where he finally disposed of it. The music of this great work will ever remain a marvel and a delight to all musicians. It is such a leap from the second symphony to this that we can only wonder that but two years separate the publication of the two works. In the "Eroica" for the first time the colossal fruits of Beethoven's genius appear. Berlioz would detract from the loftiness of the work by saying that it consists of Beethoven's recollections of the Homeric poems translated into music, and not the expression of the master's own individual thoughts. But one thing is certain, if it is "programme music," it is the greatest work of that kind ever written. In the entire originality of treatment and ideas in the first movement the critics of that time must have found much to astonish if not to shock them. In it, for the first time, Beethoven throws the traditional form of the symphony aside, or more properly makes it entirely secondary to the expression of the thoughts which inspired him. The wonderful and never-to-be-forgotten first movement, overflowing with the most original thoughts and stupendous utterances, the grand and solemn funeral march which occupies the place of the usual slow movement, the characteristic and truly astonishing scherzo leading up to the cheerful and incomprehensible finale, interrupted though it is by a beautiful "poco andante," which some critics have been pleased to determine the "apotheosis of the hero," combine to form a whole which is like nothing else in music the world has ever seen or is ever likely to see. The symphony stood last night in that position on the programme which Beethoven expressly desired that it might occupy, foreseeing, as he did, that it must needs be heard before the mind was wearied by long listening to other music. Mr. Henschel made a vast improvement over his effort of last year in the production of this work. The orchestra gave a splendid exhibition of its capacity during the performance of the trying and difficult passages.

But the work was by no means perfectly done. It would indeed have been an achievement had it been so. The chief fault was in the playing of the first movement, where there was constant and overmuch rasping of the strings. In fact this feature was so disagreeably prominent as to detract from much of the enjoyment of the whole. Aside from this there was only one other and that a very trivial and soon forgotten unintentional discord among the instruments. As for the other movements of the symphony they were well done, especially the scherzo, which went off with unusual zest and delicacy. Mr. Henschel performed his usual stupendous feat of conducting with only a casual reference to the score.

The symphony was preceded by C. Grammann's prelude to the romantic opera "Melusine," a charming and fresh bit of tone painting which made a fitting introduction to the evening's enjoyment. Volkmann's serenade for strings in F, a light and pretty piece of writing, brought the mind down to the level of ordinary art after the grand harmonies of the symphony. The concert closed with Meyerbeer's happily-conceived Struensee polonaise, an equally sparkling and inspiring piece of work, which left everybody in a cheerful and satisfied frame of mind. It is hardly necessary to say that these several works were clearly and delicately given. The programme for next week is as follows:

Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100 Schumann
Concerto for piano-forte in E flat.....Henschel
(MS. first time.)
Symphony in B minor (unfinished).Schubert
Piano solo, XXXII variations (G minor)....Beethoven
Slavonian dance, op. 46, No. 3.....Dvorak
Soloist, Professor Carl Baermann.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eighth programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Mr. Georg Henschel, and the selections:

Prelude ("Melusine").....Grammann
Aria ("Alessandro").....Handel
Symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Serenade for strings in F No. 2, op. 63.....Volkman
Cavatina ("Freischütz").....Weber
Polonaise ("Struensee").....Meyerbeer

The event of the evening was the reappearance of Mrs. Georg Henschel, who, save at an afternoon rehearsal, has not been heard here before this season; and the cordial greeting given her upon entering proved that she fully shares with her talented husband the favor of musical Boston. Her singing has all of its former charm, together with an added breadth and fulness, which, with the truthfulness and purity of her tone, go far to make good the lack of volume called for in so large an auditorium. Her rendering of the Handel number was full of beauty, but the singer surpassed all her former efforts in the exquisite grace and artistic phrasing of the Weber cavatina. The quick response in applause which followed each of her numbers was but a just tribute to one of the most capable and painstaking artists now before the public. The work of the orchestra left little cause for adverse criticism, as the two months of continuous drill under Mr. Henschel's baton has made this the best orchestral organization ever localized here. The prelude by Grammann, a fellow-student of Mr. Henschel in Germany, has a decidedly Wagnerian character, the methods of composition and the use of the orchestra shown in it being quite in keeping with the "Master's" work in "Lohengrin." The other novelty in the programme, the Volkman serenade, gave the admirable body of strings an excellent opportunity, and its quaint, old-fashioned melodies were finely presented. The broad and effective reading of the symphony made its performance one of the most satisfactory heard here, and the brilliant Meyerbeer polonaise gave a fitting finale to a most enjoyable programme.

THE EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The critic's task in connection with the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, on last Saturday evening, may conscientiously be made as light as it is certainly agreeable. A programme that includes the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven must indeed be supplemented with very weak or disagreeable companion selections to fall of being interesting as a whole, but when associated with such happily selected pieces as filled out the programme of Saturday night, and the whole so excellently arranged for the purposes of contrast and variety, its glories shed distinction on all the rest, as the sun's rays awaken to the sight the hidden beauties of gems. Happy the composer whose works under such pure and searching light reveal only grace and truth, however modest their expression, rather than uncouthness and artificiality! Given such a programme and a performance in any high degree worthy of it, and the occasion becomes memorable even for one to whom Beethoven may have become as familiar as the Scriptures to a man of piety, for no ardent lover of classical music ever listens to this symphony, in which Beethoven's commanding individuality of genius first unmistakably asserted and justified itself, without carrying away new impressions of admiration and awe. Such, in brief, was the occasion of last Saturday evening at the Music Hall, and aside from reference to special features of the concert, we may well dismiss the subject with brief and pretty comprehensive words of praise for the performance. Of the performance of the symphony, however, in view of the unfavorable verdict of the critics on the interpretation of the work by Mr. Henschel's orchestra last season, it is only an act of justice to make a special record of its merits. Mr. Henschel's reading of the symphony this year was judiciously conceived, and his conceptions consistently expressed throughout, while his leadings were followed with an added effectiveness corresponding to the very material growth of his orchestra in general efficiency since last season. It is rare that so good an opportunity for contrasting the results of a bad and good reading of a great work is afforded as that given the patrons of these concerts during these two seasons. Before, the effect was flat, wearisome, depressing; at this concert the inspiration alike of performers and listeners seemed to grow with each movement and period, reaching its climax hand in hand with the climax of the work itself.

The programme contained three other purely instrumental works. The prelude to "Melusine," by Grammann, with which the concert was opened, is a charming piece of tone-painting, much after Wagner's style when he is in his quiet and most poetic mood. It is in the form of an extended rescendo, succeeded by an equally prolonged diminuendo, its structure seeming to be evolved from silence, and to melt away into silence again as insensibly as it sprang into being. Next after the symphony was placed Volkman's serenade for strings in F (No. 2 op. 63), embracing four movements, including a waltz and a march. It is a moderately strong piece of writing, with much of charm in its quaint themes and captivating devices of their treatment, though not of striking originality. The polonaise from Meyerbeer's "Struensee," chiefly remarkable for its audacity and sensational glitter, formed the usual lively "after-piece" to the entertainment. A very welcome variation to this array of orchestral pieces was the singing of Mrs. Georg Henschel, who was on this occasion heard here for the first time this season. Before the symphony she sang a recitative and aria from Handel's "Alessandro," and just before the closing piece a recitative and aria from "Der Freischütz." Both were marked by the many beauties of her charming voice and style, but as might have been expected, though her voice has gained somewhat in fulness and carrying power, it was found still to be unequal to the most satisfactory utterance of Handel's large and ringing measures. In the cavatina, however, she was at her best, and gave such pure delight as to win two recalls, peculiarly flattering from the evident spontaneity and unaffected warmth of the applause.

For the next concert Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist, and the programme is as follows:—

Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100.....Schumann
Concerto for Piano-forte in E flat.....Henschel
(MS. First time.)
Symphony in B minor, (unfinished).....Schubert
Piano solo,—32 Variations, (C minor).....Beethoven
Slavonian Dance. Op. 46. No. 3.....Dvorak

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Prelude. (Melusine).....Grammann
Aria. (Alessandro).....Handel
Symphony in E flat. (Eroica) No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio.—Marcha funebre. (Adagio assai.)
Scherzo. (Allegro vivace.)—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.
Serenade for Strings in F, No. 2, op. 63.....Volkman
Allegro moderato; Molto vivace; Waltz; March.
Cavatina. (Freischütz).....Weber
Polonaise (Struensee).....Meyerbeer

If the concert of last night proved anything, it proved that Mr. Henschel has been studying his critics. A year ago several reviewers found fault with a very languishing rendering of the Funeral March in the third symphony, and with several remarkable caprices of tempo in the second part of the scherzo of the work. At the time several friends of the conductor took up the cudgels in his behalf and defended his reading. Today he has discarded the offensive innovations, and gives a conservative reading of the same work. The same applause greets his reading now as it did then, and the fact that the criticized critics have been proved right is forgotten. The performance of the Eroica was well-nigh a perfect one. It is always interesting, even historically speaking, to hear the work in which Beethoven first revealed himself to the world. The first symphony is a reflex of Haydn; the second, although the Minuet is discarded, still belongs to the old school; but the Eroica not only is the first of a new school as regards its music, but it is the beginning of a modern vein which has been pushed so far that it has become an evil—the tone-picture, even in its very beginning, in the immediate, impatient plunge into the subject, the new Beethoven stands revealed at once, and in the swing and abandon of the Scherzo we find for the first time in Symphonic history (Haydn had used the Scherzo in string quartets) the true thought of this class of movement. We need scarcely speak of its performance in detail. As above stated the tempi were taken with a more just appreciation of their worth than Mr. Henschel has yet displayed. The Funeral March was taken at a dignified but not snail-like pace, and the horns of the Trio of the Scherzo were not held back in such a manner as to disconnect them from the rest of the movement. The Finale, too, was given with great clearness, every variation being so carefully shaded and accented that each auditor must have been able to follow the themes. The Melusine prelude is a very fine, somewhat ecstatic, piece of writing. The serenade presented a short set of contrasted, characteristic pieces. The first movement was of rather formal theme, very clearly treated, the second had as chief theme a rapid, hilarious violin figure, which sparkled and flashed with superb abandon, and brought up suddenly as it had began; the waltz was swingy and enticing, yet its excellent harmonies saved it from even a trace of commonplace; the final movement had a brusque energy not unlike that sometimes found in the piano or string works of Edward Grieg. The whole work, as well as the exciting and sensational polonaise, with which the concert closed, was given with great spirit and good ensemble. The singing of Mrs. Henschel was excellent in the Freischütz cavatine, which just suited her pure, sweet voice, and thorough manner of shading. In the Handel aria she was less successful, as she does not possess breadth and power sufficient to give the full phrasing of Handel. There was no absolute fault, but there was no absolute merit either, and her singing left the audience cold and unsatisfied. In the Weber aria the spontaneous applause told how absolutely the great artistic merit of her rendering was appreciated. It was one of the triumphs of the symphony season.

Next week presents the following programme:

Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100.....Schumann
Concerto for Piano-forte in E flat.....Henschel
(MS. First time.)
Allegro.—Adagio ma non troppo.—Allegro comodo.—
Professor Baermann.
Symphony in B minor, (unfinished).....Schubert
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—
Piano Solo—XXXII. Variations, (C minor).....Beethoven
Professor Baermann.
Slavonian Dance. Op. 46. No. 3.....Dvorak

Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was in many respects one of the best of the series thus far. The symphony was the "Eroica," of which Mr. Henschel gave a reading greatly superior to that of last season; in fact, a reading that left but little if anything to wish for in its general effect. His tempi were admirably taken, and steadily sustained; and there was a clearness, a straightforwardness, and a marked and appropriate character about his interpretation as a whole, that merits the most cordial acknowledgment and the heartiest commendation. It is the more gratifying to be able to praise Mr. Henschel for his treatment of this symphony last night, as it was the work of which his former reading was the most severely condemned by us. The other instrumental selections were Grammann's flowing, melodious, and gracefully-scored prelude to "Melusine"; Volkman's serenade for strings in F, No. 2, a somewhat monotonous but not unpleasant work, and Meyerbeer's polonaise from "Struensee." The orchestral work was excellent throughout the whole concert. The soloist was Mrs. Henschel, who sang a recitative and aria from Handel's "Alessandro" and a cavatina from "Der Freischütz." Though she sang the former clearly and well, her voice and her style are not large enough to full justice to such a composition. With the cavatina she was more successful, and her rendering of it was abundant in delicacy, expressiveness and refined feeling. At the next concert, Schubert's unfinished symphony, Schumann's overture to "The Bride of Messina," and a Slavonian Dance by Dvorak, are the orchestral works to be performed. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Baermann, who will play a MS. concerto for piano by Mr. Henschel, and Beethoven's 32 variations in C minor. Mr. Henschel's concerto has not yet been played in public.

One of the best, if not the best, performances of the Symphony Orchestra was given last Saturday night at Music Hall in the eighth concert programme of the Henschel series. The programme was as follows: Prelude (Melusine), Grammann; Aria (Alessandro), Handel; Symphony in E flat (Eroica), No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven; Serenade for strings in F, No. 2, op. 63, Volkman; Cavatina (Freischütz), Weber; Polonaise (Struensee), Meyerbeer. The Beethoven Symphony was of course the principal centre of interest; and it was pleasing to note that much improvement had been made since last year in the manner of its presentation. In its other work the orchestra testified to the excellent condition in which they are at present. The singing of Mrs. Henschel, the soloist of the evening, was very satisfactory to the large audience and was warmly praised. The programme for next Saturday will be as follows: Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in E flat (MS. first time), Henschel; symphony in B minor (unfinished), Schubert; piano solo, XXXII, variations (C minor), Beethoven; Slavonian Dance, op. 46, No. 3, Dvorak.

EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eighth programme of the present season's series by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Mr. Georg Henschel, and the selections:

Prelude ("Melusine").....Grammann
Aria ("Alessandro").....Handel
Symphony in E flat ("Eroica"), No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Serenade for strings in F No. 2, op. 63.....Volkman
Cavatina ("Freischütz").....Weber
Polonaise ("Struensee").....Meyerbeer

The event of the evening was the reappearance of Mrs. Georg Henschel, who, save at an afternoon rehearsal, has not been heard here before this season; and the cordial greeting given her upon entering proved that she fully shares with her talented husband the favor of musical Boston. Her singing has all of its former charm, together with an added breadth and fulness, which, with the truthness and purity of her tone, go far to make good the lack of volume called for in so large an auditorium. Her rendering of the Handel number was full of beauty, but the singer surpassed all her former efforts in the exquisite grace and artistic phrasing of the Weber cavatina. The quick response in applause which followed each of her numbers was but a just tribute to one of the most capable and painstaking artists now before the public. The work of the orchestra left little cause for adverse criticism, as the two months of continuous drill under Mr. Henschel's baton has made this the best orchestral organization ever localized here. The prelude by Grammann, a fellow-student of Mr. Henschel in Germany, has a decidedly Wagnerian character, the methods of composition and the use of the orchestra shown in it being quite in keeping with the "Master's" work in "Lohengrin." The other novelty in the programme, the Volkmann serenade, gave the admirable body of strings an excellent opportunity, and its quaint, old-fashioned melodies were finely presented. The broad and effective reading of the symphony made its performance one of the most satisfactory heard here, and the brilliant Meyerbeer polonaise gave a fitting finale to a most enjoyable programme.

THE EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The critic's task in connection with the concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, on last Saturday evening, may conscientiously be made as light as it is certainly agreeable. A programme that includes the "Eroica" symphony of Beethoven must indeed be supplemented with very weak or disagreeable companion selections to fail of being interesting as a whole, but when associated with such happily selected pieces as filled out the programme of Saturday night, and the whole so excellently arranged for the purposes of contrast and variety, its glories shed distinction on all the rest, as the sun's rays awaken to the sight the hidden beauties of gems. Happy the composer whose works under such pure and searching light reveal only grace and truth, however modest their expression; rather than uncouthness and artificiality! Given such a programme and a performance in any high degree worthy of it, and the occasion becomes memorable even for one to whom Beethoven may have become as familiar as the Scriptures to a man of piety, for no ardent lover of classical music ever listens to this symphony, in which Beethoven's commanding individuality of genius first unmistakably asserted and justified itself, without carrying away new impressions of admiration and awe. Such, in brief, was the occasion of last Saturday evening at the Music Hall, and aside from reference to special features of the concert, we may well dismiss the subject with brief and pretty comprehensive words of praise for the performance. Of the performance of the symphony, however, in view of the unfavorable verdict of the critics on the interpretation of the work by Mr. Henschel's orchestra last season, it is only an act of justice to make a special record of its merits. Mr. Henschel's reading of the symphony this year was judiciously conceived, and his conceptions consistently expressed throughout, while his leadings were followed with an added effectiveness corresponding to the very material growth of his orchestra in general efficiency since last season. It is rare that so good an opportunity for contrasting the results of a bad and good reading of a great work is afforded as that given the patrons of these concerts during these two seasons. Before, the effect was flat, wearisome, depressing; at this concert the inspiration alike of performers and listeners seemed to grow with each movement and period, reaching its climax hand in hand with the climax of the work itself.

The programme contained three other purely instrumental works. The prelude to "Melusine," by Grammann, with which the concert was opened, is a charming piece of tone-painting, much after Wagner's style when he is in his quiet and most poetic mood. It is in the form of an extended crescendo, succeeded by an equally prolonged diminuendo, its structure seeming to be evolved from silence, and to melt away into silence again as insensibly as it sprang into being. Next after the symphony was placed Volkmann's serenade for strings in F (No. 2 op. 63), embracing four movements, including a waltz and a march. It is a moderately strong piece of writing, with much of charm in its quaint themes and captivating devices of their treatment, though not of striking originality. The polonaise from Meyerbeer's "Struensee," chiefly remarkable for its audacity and sensational glitter, formed the usual lively "after-piece" to the entertainment. A very welcome variation to this array of orchestral pieces was the singing of Mrs. Georg Henschel, who was on this occasion heard here for the first time this season. Before the symphony she sang a recitative and aria from Handel's "Alessandro," and just before the closing piece a recitative and aria from "Der Freischütz." Both were marked by the many beauties of her charming voice and style, but as might have been expected, though her voice has gained somewhat in fulness and carrying power, it was found still to be unequal to the most satisfactory utterance of Handel's large and ringing measures. In the cavatina, however, she was at her best, and gave such pure delight as to win two recalls, peculiarly flattering from the evident spontaneity and unaffected warmth of the applause.

For the next concert Mr. Carl Baermann will be the soloist, and the programme is as follows:—

Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100.....Schumann
Concerto for Piano-forte in E flat.....Henschel
(MS. First time.)
Symphony in B minor, (unfinished).....Schubert
Piano solo,—32 Variations, (C minor).....Beethoven
Slavonian Dance. Op. 46. No. 3.....Dvorak

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Prelude. (Melusine).....Grammann
Aria. (Alessandro).....Handel
Symphony in E flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Allegro con brio.—Marcha funebre. (Adagio assai.)
Scherzo. (Allegro vivace).—Allegro molto; Poco Andante; Presto.
Serenade for Strings in F, No. 2, op. 63.....Volkman
Allegro moderato; Molto vivace; Waltz; March.
Cavatina. (Freischütz).....Weber
Polonaise (Struensee).....Meyerbeer

If the concert of last night proved anything, it proved that Mr. Henschel has been studying his critics. A year ago several reviewers found fault with a very languishing rendering of the Funeral March in the third symphony, and with several remarkable caprices of tempo in the second part of the scherzo of the work. At the time several friends of the conductor took up the cudgels in his behalf and defended his reading. Today he has discarded the offensive innovations, and gives a conservative reading of the same work. The same applause greets his reading now as it did then, and the fact that the criticized critics have been proved right is forgotten. The performance of the Eroica was well-nigh a perfect one. It is always interesting, even historically speaking, to hear the work in which Beethoven first revealed himself to the world. The first symphony is a reflex of Haydn; the second, although the Minuet is discarded, still belongs to the old school; but the Eroica not only is the first of a new school as regards its music, but it is the beginning of a modern vein which has been pushed so far that it has become an evil—the tone-picture, even in its very beginning, in the immediate, impatient plunge into the subject, the new Beethoven stands revealed at once, and in the swing and abandon of the Scherzo we find for the first time in Symphonic history (Haydn had used the Scherzo in string quartets) the true thought of this class of movement. We need scarcely speak of its performance in detail. As above stated the tempi were taken with a more just appreciation of their worth than Mr. Henschel has yet displayed. The Funeral March was taken at a dignified but not snail-like pace, and the horns of the Trio of the Scherzo were not held back in such a manner as to disconnect them from the rest of the movement. The Finale, too, was given with great clearness, every variation being so carefully shaded and accented that each auditor must have been able to follow the themes. The Melusine prelude is a very fine, somewhat ecstatic, piece of writing. The serenade presented a short set of contrasted, characteristic pieces. The first movement was of rather formal theme, very clearly treated, the second had as chief theme a rapid, hilarious violin figure, which sparkled and flashed with superb abandon, and brought up suddenly as it had began; the waltz was swingy and enticing, yet its excellent harmonies saved it from even a trace of commonplace; the final movement had a brusque energy not unlike that sometimes found in the piano or string works of Edward Grieg. The whole work, as well as the exciting and sensational polonaise, with which the concert closed, was given with great spirit and good ensemble. The singing of Mrs. Henschel was excellent in the Freischütz cavatina, which just suited her pure, sweet voice, and thorough manner of shading. In the Handelian aria she was less successful, as she does not possess breadth and power sufficient to give the full phrasing of Handel. There was no absolute fault, but there was no absolute merit either, and her singing left the audience cold and unsatisfied. In the Weber aria the spontaneous applause told how absolutely the great artistic merit of her rendering was appreciated. It was one of the triumphs of the symphony season.

ing was appreciated. It was one of the triumphs of the symphony season.

Next week presents the following programme:

Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100.....Schumann
Concerto for Piano-forte in E flat.....Henschel
(MS. First time.)
Allegro.—Adagio ma non troppo.—Allegro comodo.—
Professor Baermann.
Symphony in B minor, (unfinished).....Schubert
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—
Piano Solo—XXXII. Variations, (C minor).....Beethoven
Professor Baermann.
Slavonian Dance. Op. 46. No. 3.....Dvorak

Boston Symphony Concert.

Last night's concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra was in many respects one of the best of the series thus far. The symphony was the "Eroica," of which Mr. Henschel gave a reading greatly superior to that of last season; in fact, a reading that left but little if anything to wish for in its general effect. His tempi were admirably taken, and steadily sustained; and there was a clearness, a straightforwardness, and a marked and appropriate character about his interpretation as a whole, that merits the most cordial acknowledgement and the heartiest commendation. It is the more gratifying to be able to praise Mr. Henschel for his treatment of this symphony last night, as it was the work of which his former reading was the most severely condemned by us. The other instrumental selections were Grammann's flowing, melodious, and gracefully-scored prelude to "Melusine"; Volkmann's serenade for strings in F, No. 2, a somewhat monotonous but not unpleasant work, and Meyerbeer's polonaise from "Struensee." The orchestral work was excellent throughout the whole concert. The soloist was Mrs. Henschel, who sang a recitative and aria from Handel's "Alessandro" and a cavatina from "Der Freyehütz." Though she sang the former clearly and well, her voice and her style are not large enough to full justice to such a composition. With the cavatina she was more successful, and her rendering of it was abundant in delicacy, expressiveness and refined feeling. At the next concert, Schubert's unfinished symphony, Schumann's overture to "The Bride of Messina," and a Slavonian Dance by Dvorak, are the orchestral works to be performed. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Baermann, who will play a MS. concerto for piano by Mr. Henschel, and Beethoven's 32 variations in C minor. Mr. Henschel's concerto has not yet been played in public.

One of the best, if not the best, performances of the Symphony Orchestra was given last Saturday night at Music Hall in the eighth concert programme of the Henschel series. The programme was as follows: Prelude (Melusine), Grammann; Aria (Alessandro), Handel; Symphony in E flat (Eroica), No. 3, op. 55, Beethoven; Serenade for strings in F, No. 2, op. 63, Volkmann; Cavatina (Freischütz), Weber; Polonaise (Struensee), Meyerbeer. The Beethoven Symphony was of course the principal centre of interest; and it was pleasing to note that much improvement had been made since last year in the manner of its presentation. In its other work the orchestra testified to the excellent condition in which they are at present. The singing of Mrs. Henschel, the soloist of the evening, was very satisfactory to the large audience and was warmly praised. The programme for next Saturday will be as follows: Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100, Schumann; concerto for pianoforte in E flat (MS. first time), Henschel; symphony in B minor (unfinished), Schubert; piano solo, XXXII, variations (C minor), Beethoven; Slavonian Dance, op. 46, No. 3, Dvorak.

THEATRES AND CONCERTS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The audience in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was the largest that has yet attended these concerts this season; those mysteriously vacant seats on the floor were at last occupied. The programme, one of the most interesting so far, was,

Prelude to "Melusine".....Grammann
Aria from "Alessandro".....Händel
Symphony in E-flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55. Beethoven
Serenade for strings in F. No. 2, op. 62.....Volkmann
Cavatina, from "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Polonaise, from "Struensee".....Meyerbeer
Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer.

We unfortunately got to the hall about three seconds too late to be admitted until after the Grammann prelude; Mr. Henschel's admirable rule of closing the doors while music is going on leaving us out in the lobby, for once. But, let justice be done, though the heavens fall! The great "Eroica" symphony showed more plainly than ever what progress the orchestra has made since last year. The first movement was played with superb vigor of accent, with contagious fire, yet with all due delicacy in the softer passage. Especially praiseworthy was the nice regard for all expression marks, crescendos and diminuendos, never being anticipated, but beginning just at the right moment. Mr. Henschel's tempo, too, struck us as excellent. The Scherzo also went delightfully, in spite of one or two phrases being played a little roughly. The Finale sounded less smooth, yet the spirit of the movement was made wholly patent, and one could not but enjoy it hugely. As for the great "Marcia funebre," Mr. Henschel still adheres to a very slow tempo. The mere fact that the metronome marking in the score gives eighty eighth-notes to a minute, while Mr. Henschel beats only sixty-four, does not of itself mean much. Even if Beethoven himself wrote the metronome marks (which, by the way, we believe he did not), they would not necessarily be irrefragable authority. Even admitting (for sake of argument) their authenticity, one must know several things before acknowledging their correctness as indisputable—such as whether the metronome Beethoven used was exact or not—and nine metronomes out of ten go either too fast or too slow; whether he metronomized his work sitting at his desk and reading the score to himself, or was timed by some one else while playing on the pianoforte or conducting the orchestra. Only in the last case, that is if his beat was timed by the second-hand of a watch, while he was conducting an orchestra, would the metronome marking be absolutely authoritative and past dispute. It will thus be seen that the printed metronome marks in orchestral scores are by no means always correct, and that, in almost every case, much is left to the discretion of the conductor. In the present instance we should lay very little stress upon the printed marks. In finding fault with Mr. Henschel's very slow tempo in the movement in question we make no sort of claim to being guided by higher authority than he; we even doubt whether any documentary authority on this matter exists. As a mere matter of taste, we quite agree with Mr. Henschel that the movement is immensely effective and impressive, when played at his tempo, especially when so well played, and with what may be called the spirit of the tempo so surely caught and rendered by the orchestra, as it was on Saturday evening. But this matter of effectiveness is not a final and decisive criterion. As the subject is quite open to argument, of course we can do no more than argue about it. To our ears, Mr. Henschel's slow tempo sounds un-Beethovenish, over-sentimental, and tends to "modernize" the whole spirit of the music. No doubt Beethoven made very decided incursions into the so-called "modern" musical domain; there is very much in his music that is far more in sympathy with the musical spirit of today than with that of his own time. Yet it seems to us that people nowadays are in great danger of exaggerating this tendency in Beethoven, of ascribing to it an undue prominence among the other attributes of his genius, and, in a word, of taking an ell of "modern romanticism" where he really gives only an inch. The whole question is whether the romantic or the classic spirit—in other words, whether aiming at plastic beauty of form for its own sake, or striving after the most poignant emotional expression, was the more prominent in Beethoven. In this matter it seems to us inconceivable that any one should study the great master's works carefully without detecting the purest classicism as an ever-present controlling influence over his undoubtedly striking romanticism; that, however noticeable the romantic essence may be in his music, the classic spirit still predominates. To our mind Mr. Henschel overdoes the "Adagio assai" in the "Eroica;" we could easily imagine a Berlioz, a Liszt, or even a Brahms, painting a picture in which Stygian gloom and terror are so all absorbing; but we cannot imagine Beethoven doing so. And note this—by thus exaggerating the slow tempo, and consequently the "pathological" side of this march, Mr. Henschel virtually puts Beethoven on ground where Liszt, Berlioz, Wagner and others among the modern sons of thunder, with their comparative recklessness of formal beauty and classic modesty, can easily beat him; while, on his own native soil, the great master can stand unapproached. We have been impelled to speak at such length of this matter, all the more because Mr. Henschel presented his conception of the movement with perfect decision and clearness; his tempo was firm as a rock throughout, and was maintained without the least variation or wavering. The Volkmann serenade is indubitably pretty, but seemed rather a flimsy bit of writing. It was nicely played, albeit that the strings of the orchestra have not yet attained to that pitch of virtuosity without which such pieces as this do not make their full effect. The sparkling Meyerbeer Polonaise was very brilliantly given. Mrs. Henschel's singing of the aria from Händel's "Alessandro" was truly admirable. The beautiful perfection of her method, the graceful freedom of her phrasing and the nicety with which she caught and rendered the spirit of the song, made one forget for the moment to wish for that more heroic breadth of style which is incompatible with her physique. Especially noteworthy was the joyous cheerfulness and life with which she sang, in strong contrast to that air of Trappist gloom which so many of our singers think they must assume whenever they approach Händel, as if the only words he ever set to music were "Brother, we must all die!"

The wondrously poetic "Und ob die Wolke," from "Der Freischütz" was given delightfully, Mr. Müller playing the cello obbligato to perfection.

The programme for the next concert is—

Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina." Schumann
Op. 100.....
Concerto for pianoforte in E-flat. (MS.) Henschel
First time.....
Symphony in B minor. (Unfinished).....Schubert
Piano solo—XXXII variations. (C-minor).....Beethoven
Slavonian dance. Op. 46. No. 3.....Dvorák
Mr. Carl Baerman will be the pianist.

Musical.

AN ATTACK IN PROSPECT.

THE EIGHTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eighth symphony concert should have surprised the many who when that memorable performance of the Heroic symphony took place last November were ready to claim that an ideal in orchestral playing had been attained by it. The Transcript, Gazette and Advertiser, be it said to their honor, did not voice the furore that then prevailed, and which found an appropriate expression in certain other papers. The critics that were then unfavorable to the methods employed in the performance of the Heroic symphony were Mr. Apthorp for the Transcript, Mr. Woolf for the Gazette, and Mr. Ticknor for the Advertiser. It now appears that the conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Henschel, in spite of those who were either his flatterers or else were stupidly ignorant in their sincere praise of his methods,—it appears that he so far agreed with the Transcript, Gazette and Advertiser last December that on Saturday evening last he was enabled to express a manly acquiescence to their opinions by a reformed performance, so to speak, of the Heroic Symphony. The performance was highly acceptable to the Transcript, Gazette and Advertiser. It was a performance in fact as notable for its intrinsic merit as the other one had been for its manifest shortcomings.

In the meantime, however, such has probably been the influence of a well-known banker that the Advertiser critic of last year seems to have lost his situation. Conciliatory criticisms were what the present management of the Advertiser demanded, and no honest man intelligently fortified on the subject was expected to apply for the vacancy. The successful applicant, however, is as scrupulous as the most exacting could desire, and he is also sagacious enough to be reliable, and sufficiently ambitious to insure his success. But he fortunately finds himself in a position where to extol the Boston Symphony orchestra under far superior conducting than was shown last year is not only a very light and pleasant, but the only correct and sensible thing to do.

However, the funniest episode bearing upon Mr. Henschel's progress in the matter of orchestral conducting, is yet to be told. Last Saturday night we were approached by a very excited individual with the implied threat that several columns of the Transcript were at his disposal for an attack upon the critics, in which he would boldly berate them for what he termed inconsistency in their treatment of Mr. Henschel. The attack has not yet appeared; the several columns of the Transcript have not yet been at the disposal of any correspondent with pugilistic intentions; and finally he may be expected to turn up at the office, the critic of which paper, however, he soundly abuses. Let us add, that the basis of the abuse, if published, will reflect very creditably upon the critic's integrity, and not upon the reputation of any would-be correspondent. Notoriety is evidently the aim of the pugilist in question. After his proposed attack is made he will have all he wants of it. His own record for inconsistency has been placed at our disposal by a gentleman in whom he too freely confided, and who did not keep his confidence. Let the attack appear. It is not a very wise general who informs the enemy in advance that he proposes to make an attack, and wishes that they be adequately forewarned. If such a general were afterwards to adopt a system of guerilla warfare any punishment that he might receive as a result would hardly elicit a widespread sympathy in his behalf. As for Mr. Henschel and his critics, they probably understand each other by intuition. Mr. Henschel has nothing to lose and considerable to gain as the result of honest criticism. Of late he has been expressing an indebtedness to the critics in a very manly fashion; a fashion that could not have more superbly illustrated itself than by the improvement noticeable in the performance of the Heroic symphony at the concert last Saturday evening, which was a delightful one. Every one who attended was probably made happy by it. The programme was a decided advance upon the one presented at the seventh concert. It contained the following repertoire:

Prelude to "Melusine".....Grammann
Aria from "Alessandro".....Händel
Symphony in E-flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55.....Beethoven
Serenade for strings in F. No. 2, op. 62....Volkmann
Cavatina from "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Polonaise from "Struensee".....Meyerbeer

The serenade by Volkmann proved a grotesque yet pleasing piece of music, replete in every movement with a quaintness and vitality of rhythm the effect of which, though in a Boston Symphony concert, was to a high degree mirth-provoking.

In the performance of the symphony the intervals were few and far between when there was any of that syncopation noticeable between the conductor's baton and the orchestra with the latter taking the accent,—as has sometimes been the case. The somnolent effect of the rendering of the marcia funebre prevented us from listening to it. Otherwise the performance was all that could be desired in points of light and shade, tempi, precision in attack, and general excellence of interpretation. Mrs. Georg Henschel was the soloist. The Handel selection—see programme—was rendered with all that beauty of finesse, pleasing voice, and sincere expression for which she is always credited. It is impossible to speak too highly of her performance of the Weber cavatina. She is by no means lacking the dramatic intuition requisite for such a task, but her voice is of insufficient volume to respond to it. The concert concluded with a fine performance of a polonaise by Meyerbeer,—Struensee.

The audience in the Music Hall last Saturday evening was the largest that has yet attended these concerts this season; those mysteriously vacant seats on the floor were at last occupied. The programme, one of the most interesting so far, was,

Prelude to "Melusine".....Grammann
Aria from "Alessandro".....Händel
Symphony in E-flat. (Eroica.) No. 3, op. 55.

Serenade for strings in F. No. 2, op. 62.....Volkmann
Cavatina, from "Der Freischütz".....Weber
Polonaise, from "Struensee".....Meyerbeer
Mrs. Georg Henschel was the singer.

We unfortunately got to the hall about three seconds too late to be admitted until after the Grammann prelude; Mr. Henschel's admirable rule of closing the doors while music is going on leaving us out in the lobby, for once. But, let justice be done, though the heavens fall! The great "Eroica" symphony showed more plainly than ever what progress the orchestra has made since last year. The first movement was played with superb vigor of accent, with contagious fire, yet with all due delicacy in the softer passages. Especially praiseworthy was the nice regard for all expression marks, crescendos and diminuendos, never being anticipated, but beginning just at the right moment. Mr. Henschel's tempo, too, struck us as excellent. The Scherzo also went delightfully, in spite of one or two phrases being played a little roughly. The Finale sounded less smooth, yet the spirit of the movement was made wholly patent, and one could not but enjoy it hugely. As for the great "Marcia funebre," Mr. Henschel still adheres to a very slow tempo. The mere fact that the metronome marking in the score gives eighty eighth-notes to a minute, while Mr. Henschel beats only sixty-four, does not of itself mean much. Even if Beethoven himself wrote the metronome marks (which, by the way, we believe he did not), they would not necessarily be irrefragable authority. Even admitting (for sake of argument) their authenticity, one must know several things before acknowledging their correctness as indisputable—such as whether the metronome Beethoven used was exact or not—and nine metronomes out of ten go either too fast or too slow; whether he metronomized his work sitting at his desk and reading the score to himself, or was timed by some one else while playing on the pianoforte or conducting the orchestra. Only in the last case, that is if his beat was timed by the second-hand of a watch, while he was conducting an orchestra, would the metronome marking be absolutely authoritative and past dispute. It will thus be seen that the printed metronome marks in orchestral scores are by no means always correct, and that, in almost every case, much is left to the discretion of the conductor. In the present instance we should lay very little stress upon the printed marks. In finding fault with Mr. Henschel's very slow tempo in the movement in question we make no sort of claim to being guided by higher authority than he; we even doubt whether any documentary authority on this matter exists. As a mere matter of taste, we quite agree with Mr. Henschel that the movement is immensely effective and impressive, when played at his tempo, especially when so well played, and with what may be called the spirit of the tempo so surely caught and rendered by the orchestra, as it was on Saturday evening. But this matter of effectiveness is not a final and decisive criterion. As the subject is quite open to argument, of course we can do no more than argue about it. To our ears, Mr. Henschel's slow tempo sounds un-Beethovenish, over-sentimental, and tends to "modernize" the whole spirit of the music. No doubt Beethoven made very decided incursions into the so-called "modern" musical domain; there is very much in his music that is far more in sympathy with the musical spirit of today than with that of his own time. Yet it seems to us that people nowadays are in great danger of exaggerating this tendency in Beethoven, of ascribing to it an undue prominence among the other attributes of his genius, and, in a word, of taking an ill of "modern romanticism" where he really gives only an inch. The whole question is whether the romantic or the classic spirit—in other words, whether aiming at plastic beauty of form for its own sake, or striving after the most poignant emotional expression, was the more prominent in Beethoven. In this matter it seems to us inconceivable that any one should study the great master's works carefully without detecting the purest classicism as an ever-present controlling influence over his undoubtedly striking romanticism; that, however noticeable the romantic essence may be in his music, the classic spirit still predominates. To our mind Mr. Henschel overdoes the "Adagio assai" in the "Eroica;" we could easily imagine a Berlioz, a Liszt, or even a Brahms, painting a picture in which Stygian gloom and terror are so all absorbing; but we cannot imagine Beethoven doing so. And note this—by thus exaggerating the slow tempo, and consequently the "pathological" side of this march, Mr. Henschel virtually puts Beethoven on ground where Liszt, Berlioz, Wagner and others among the modern sons of thunder, with their comparative recklessness of formal beauty and classic modesty, can easily beat him, while, on his own native soil, the great master can stand unapproached. We have been impelled to speak at such length of this matter, all the more because Mr. Henschel presented his conception of the movement with perfect decision and clearness; his tempo was firm as a rock throughout, and was maintained without the least variation or wavering. The Volkmann serenade is indubitably pretty, but seemed rather a flimsy bit of writing. It was nicely played, albeit that the strings of the orchestra have not yet attained to that pitch of virtuosity without which such pieces as this do not make their full effect. The sparkling Meyerbeer Polonaise was very brilliantly given. Mrs. Henschel's singing of the aria from Händel's "Alessandro" was truly admirable. The beautiful perfection of her method, the graceful freedom of her phrasing and the nicety with which she caught and rendered the spirit of the song, made one forget for the moment to wish for that more heroic breadth of style which is incompatible with her physique. Especially noteworthy was the joyous cheerfulness and life with which she sang, in strong contrast to that air of Trappist gloom which so many of our singers think they must assume whenever they approach Händel, as if the only words he ever set to music were "Brother, we must all die!" The wondrously poetic "Und ob die Wolke," from "Der Freischütz" was given delightfully. Mr. Müller playing the 'cello obbligato to perfection.

Transcript

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882-83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

IX. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 2D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE to Schiller's "BRIDE OF MESSINA." op. 100. SCHUMANN.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in E flat. HENSCHEL.
(MS. First time.)

Allegro.—Adagio ma non troppo.—Allegro commodo.—

SYMPHONY in B minor. (unfinished.) SCHUBERT.
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—

PIANO SOLO.

XXXII VARIATIONS. (C minor.) BEETHOVEN.

SLAVONIAN DANCE. Op. 46. No 3, DVORÁK.

SOLOIST:

PROFESSOR CARL BAERMANN.

Mr. Baermann will use a Chickering Piano.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100...Schumann
Concerto for Piano-forte in E flat.....Henschel
(MS. First time.)
Allegro.—Adagio ma non troppo.—Allegro comodo.—
Symphony in B minor, (unfinished).....Schubert
Allegro moderato.—Andante con moto.—
Piano Solo—XXXII. Variations, (C minor).....Beethoven
Slavonian Dance. Op. 46. No. 3.....Dvorak

Although every part of the above programme was interesting to the musician, we doubt whether it was as entirely so to the average auditor. The overture, gloomy and intense, has little to relieve its sombre tints, and the concerto which followed was rather learned than spontaneous. Its first movement treats a motif of six notes, a bold and characteristic theme, with Wagnerian persistency, but with much symmetry and variety. The motif is announced at the very beginning of the introductory tutti, and is contrasted with a second theme of more melodious shape. The climax is well worked up, both themes being intertwined and finally the first entering again with all the force of the orchestra and piano. The constant reiteration of the first theme is managed in a masterly manner, but is, however, pushed too far. The second movement, adagio ma non troppo, is full of melodic beauty, but of that deep, Brahms-like order, which does not give all it has to say, at one hearing. Both these movements are far more orchestral than true piano music. But in the finale the pianist has an opportunity afforded him to assume the leading part, furnishing brilliant variations and floriture to the themes given in the orchestra. The development is brilliant in the extreme and the contrasts are sharp and effective. The horns are used in the first theme, and a mysterious march rhythm appears later in the strings which is one of the strongest parts of the movement. Professor Baermann played the work in a manner that left nothing to be desired. Power and delicacy, sweetness and strength were combined in his performance. But he rose to his greatest in the performance of Beethoven. In the works of this master Professor Baermann has won his greatest triumphs here. We vividly recollect his first performance of the fourth concerto in Boston, and can say that in last night's performance he attained the same high level. He gave the various variations in a manner free from all sensationalism, yet thoroughly effective even to the non-musician. His clear touch even in the most rapid runs, his delicate scale playing, his surety in heavy octave passages, all proved the thorough technician, yet back of these dynamic effects there was warmth, color, life and beauty. We were glad to see, too, that the audience appreciated these qualities with something like last season's enthusiasm. May we not hope for different types of variations, also, at his forthcoming chamber concerts? Mendelssohn's Variations Serieuses have not been heard here for some time.

The symphony was finely performed. The contrasts were well marked, and especially strong in the first movement. The tender little theme which is interrupted in the midst of its artless course by the dissonant crash of the full orchestra was given to perfection. In this effect, and in that of the wonderful sledge-hammer blows in the last part of his 9th Symphony, Schubert equals (for the time) Beethoven himself. But he weakens his effects by endless, unaltered repetitions, while Beethoven's constant elaboration of themes leads to continually new devices at the return of principal subjects. In the Andante, there was much power, and if anything, the contrasts were overdone, for at times the con moto was lost sight of altogether. The swinging and melodious Slavonian Dance was spiritedly given. The next concert offers some novelties, as the following programme will show:

Overture. (Euryanthe).....Weber
Concerto for Piano-forte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22...Saint-Saens
Andante sostenuto.—Allegro scherzando.—Presto.—
Mr. Otto Bendix.
Symphony in E flat, No. 2, op. 46.....Gernsheim
(New, first time.)
Allegro tranquillo.—Tarantella.—Notturmo.—Finale.—
Aria. (Idomeneo).....Mozart
Mrs. H. F. Knowles.
Ballet-Music. (Feramors).....Rubinstein
(a.) Dance of Bayaderes.
(b.) Candle-Dance of the Brides of Kashmir.
(c.) Wedding March.

Boston Symphony Concert.

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The principal feature of the programme was a MS concerto for the piano by Mr. Georg Henschel, the solo part of which was performed by Mr. Carl Baermann. The work proved a genuine surprise, not because of the dissipation of any doubt regarding the admirable qualities of Mr. Henschel's musicianship, but because of the solidity, the dignity, the large and fluent style and the brilliancy and impressiveness of the work as a whole. Compared with the piano concertos of living composers it may take an enviable rank among the best of them with which we are acquainted. It is clear in form, excellent in thematic development, prolific in idea, is melodious, scholarly in development, and is a clean-cut and straightforward piece of work from beginning to end. Much of it is in the Hummel style; in fact, the finale is almost wholly so; and very delightfully has Mr. Henschel worked in that vein. The first allegro is perhaps a trifle too long. The adagio is beautiful in idea and treatment, and the closing movement, in its grace, its fire, and its inspiring treatment generally is overflowing with interest. The only blemish in this portion of the work is the heaviness of the brass which overpowers the solo part. The orchestration is uncommonly rich, effective, and refined. We trust we shall soon listen to the concerto again; for we do not feel that we can do it more than a passing justice at a single hearing. The next time it is played we would advise a diminution in the strings. Eight double basses, as many celli, and the full force of violins belonging to this orchestra, form almost too strong a body for the soloist to struggle against. The applause at the end of the work was appreciatively enthusiastic, and was as deserved as it was hearty. Of its performance by Mr. Baermann it is hardly necessary to speak. The profound conscientiousness, the brilliancy, and the refined beauty and artistic loftiness of his playing in all that he essays, are so well known by this time as to render describing it in detail wholly superfluous. Suffice it to say that he was heard at his very best. Mr. Henschel was fortunate in having his masterly concerto interpreted by so masterly an artist. At the conclusion of the concerto Mr. Baermann was recalled three times. On the first occasion he seemed to pay more attention to the orchestra than to the public; but his motive was soon made manifest, for he went to Mr. Henschel, who had modestly kept in the background, and, taking him by the hand, led him forward to share the plaudits. We were somewhat surprised that the audience did not make any demonstration by way of acknowledgment or compliment to the composer, before Mr. Baermann, perhaps unconsciously, reminded them of the omission. Later in the evening Mr. Baermann played Beethoven's 32 Variations in C minor, not only with the utmost perfection of technique, but with a variety of expression that was little short of wonderful. We have heard these Variations many times, but never knew how much there was in them until we heard Mr. Baermann's rendering of them last night. At their conclusion he was recalled three times. The orchestral selections were Schumann's dry and rather uninteresting overture to "The Bride of Messina," Schubert's lovely and immortal "Unfinished Symphony," and a Slavonian Dance by Dvorak, all which received excellent treatment at the hands of both conductor and orchestra. At the next concert Mrs. H. F. Knowles and Mr. Otto Bendix will be the soloists. A symphony by Gernsheim will be given for the first time here, and Rubinstein's ballet music from "Feramorz."

110

MR. HENSCHEL will produce amongst other novelties, Gernsheim's new symphony (a deeply interesting work) during the ensuing season of concerts, given under his direction by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Concert, of Saturday last, gave the following:
Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100.....Schumann
Concerto for piano-forte in E flat.....Henschel
(MS First time.)

Allegro-Adagio ma non troppo-Allegro comodo.—
Symphony in B minor (unfinished).....Schubert
Allegro moderato-Andante con moto.
Piano Solo, XXXII Variations (C minor).....Beethoven
Slavonian Dance, op. 46, No. 3.....Dvorak

The performance was as thorough as ever, yet, I think the effect on the public was rather heavy. Henschel's own concerto was grandly played by Prof. Baermann. It is a work which may not be lightly or trivially judged upon a single hearing. It is musically, symmetrical and earnest, but its first movement develops a short motif of six notes (immediately announced in a long tutti which begins the work) at somewhat too great a length, and both its first and second movements betray a greater affection for the orchestra than for the pianist.

In the last movement, however, the composer makes ample amends, giving most brilliant work to the piano part. Mr. Henschel could not have had a better interpreter than Prof. Baermann, and both received an ovation at the close of the concerto. Prof. Baermann made his greatest success in the Beethoven variations, which were given with perfect phrasing, excellent shading, and clearness and surety, both in the most difficult octave and wrist action work, and in the most delicate scales and runs. Prof. Baermann is one of the best players of Beethoven's music that we have had in Boston. He does not individualize; he gives the thought of the composer, just as he feels that the composer meant it. It is only after the piece is ended that one thinks of the interpreter. His performance of the Beethoven fourth concerto last season was one of the most artistic events of a great musical year.

The Schubert Symphony was given with all possible regard for its contrasts and sudden surprises. The smooth theme which is rudely interrupted by the sforzando crash of the whole orchestra, was done excellently. How like to Beethoven Schubert became in some of the effects of his last two symphonies! Only, while Beethoven seldom repeated the same effects in precisely the same manner, Schubert constantly does. I felt that in the second movement Mr. Henschel somewhat overforced the contrasts, and too frequently lost sight of the con moto element. The hall was crowded to excess on the occasion of both rehearsal and concert. Mr. Perales gave two matinees of excellent music, the past week, but as they were real matinees, taking place in the morning, I was unable to attend. That closes the musical books for this week.

L. C. E.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The distinguishing feature of the ninth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was the original production of a MS. concerto in E flat, the composition of Mr. Georg Henschel. Probably, if the truth could be known, it would be found that the impression which the work produced on those who heard it, stripped of all personal interest in the composer and admiration of the performance, was very diverse and contradictory. No work from the pen of a composer of such acknowledged learning and musicianly instinct and skill as Mr. Henschel could fail of possessing great interest to the student, and of appealing agreeably at many points to the taste of the average educated layman in things musical. We have the impression that the class who would derive most pleasure from this work on a first hearing would comprise those who, by a long-continued hardening process of concert-going, conjoined with technical study, have become accustomed to look on all music with more of scientific than emotional interest. Next, perhaps, would come those who, with fine ears for details of musical effect, lack the capacity to estimate correctly the merits of an ambitious work in its entirety, to judge of relative values,—in a word, to grasp the underlying conception of the whole and to measure the accomplishment by this conception. Certainly the construction of Mr. Henschel's present work offers an interesting study in the development of its themes and the ingenuity of their instrumental treatment, and as certainly does it offer much to delight the sensitive ear; but, while fully sensible of the hazard of passing judgment on such a work after a single hearing, we believe it to possess no very marked value when judged by the best standard. In it the smell of the candle is more apparent than the fragrance of inspiration; it is labored and deliberate rather than spontaneous and free, and its technical elaboration is often much out of proportion to the worth of the material worked upon. As a whole its chief beauty is its orchestral part, the piano score, with the exception of the last movement, being as dry as it is often ingenious. This finale, however (allegro comodo), is thoroughly bright and enjoyable, its themes fresh and captivating, and their beauties greatly enhanced by the brilliant variations which are given them by the piano part, while the orchestral part is well in keeping. Of the performance of the concert nothing more need be said than that Mr. Carl Baermann played the piano part, and was supported by the efficient orchestra, under the composer's own direction. Mr. Baermann was heard later on in Beethoven's thirty-two variations on a theme in C minor, and was heard at his best. This is, of course, equivalent to saying that as a feat of virtuosity his playing was a supreme and unalloyed delight. But it seems to us that such a selection as this is not most happily adapted to a public concert in a large hall. Undeniable as are the exalted beauties of all Beethoven's variations, they cannot be made adequately apparent except on closer and more leisurely study than such an occasion allows. As music, a long succession of variations like these, on a very brief and simple theme, must necessarily become somewhat monotonous when performed under such circumstances, and the interest must centre more and more in the skill of the player, to the disadvantage of the composition itself.

Of the other selections on the programme, Schumann's overture to "The Bride of Messina,"—so intense and almost fierce in its feeling, but pervaded throughout with that indefinable Schumannesque charm that grows with every measure and elicits a sigh when the music dies away,—was chosen for the opening number. The symphony was Schubert's unfinished work in B minor, ever welcome for its own sake and for its eternal justification of classic purity and artlessness against the impeachments of modern realism and learned obscurity. The more one hears this work, the more wonderful does it appear. What at first strikes the listener as simply exquisite grace of form and sweetness of melody becomes endowed on further acquaintance with a loveliness more than that of earthly things. It takes on something of the "light that never was on land or sea," and touches the soul as only a glimpse of the invisible can touch it. The concert closed with one of the brightest and most witching of Dvorak's Slavonian dances—op. 46, No. 3. The orchestral work throughout the evening was up to the high standard to which Mr. Henschel's orchestra has of late accustomed us.

The soloists engaged for the next concert are Mrs. H. F. Knowles, soprano, and Mr. Otto Bendix, pianist; and the programme is as follows:—

Overture ("Euryanthe"), Weber; concerto for piano-forte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22, Saint-Saens; symphony in E flat, No. 2, op. 46 (new, first time), Gernsheim; aria ("Idomeneo"), Mrs. H. F. Knowles, Mozart; ballet music ("Famors"), (a) Dance of Bayaderes, (b) Candle-Dance of the Brides of Kashmir, (c) Wedding March, Rubinstein.

NINTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance of Mr. Henschel's Piano Concerto—A Notable Occasion.

The programme presented at the ninth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening equalled in both interest and pleasantness any that this fine organization has yet given. The chief interest of the evening, of course, centred in the first performance of Georg Henschel's pianoforte concerto, an ambitious and lengthy work, which is still in manuscript. If it had been played by almost anybody except Mr. Carl Baermann, we should have been able to state just how it was received by the audience; but the fact is that this eminent pianist cannot show himself upon the platform without receiving a perfect thunder storm of applause, and his rising from the piano is always a signal for redoubled exertions on the part of the demonstrative public. But one thing is certain. Mr. Henschel has produced a scholarly and artistic work, which appeals more to the trained musician than to the general public. It would be presumptuous to attempt to judge a work of so pretentious a nature after a single hearing, but it impressed us as a most praiseworthy effort. It is in three movements—the first an allegro, which contains a vast deal of fine writing, the second an adagio of almost equal merit, and the last an allegro comodo, which proved to be

A Most Brilliant Finale

to a work which would be a credit to anybody.

Mr. Henschel deserves not only the praise which we bestow upon the composer of a work of merit, but the encouragement to which every man who works for the best and the highest in art is entitled. The work recalls the style of Schumann more than that of any other great man, but it is none the less an original and individual creation. The prolonged applause which followed the production recalled Mr. Baermann twice, and he modestly endeavored to put Mr. Henschel forward. The work is full of difficulties for the pianist, and the clear manner in which its beauties were brought out must have been as gratifying to the composer as it was to the audience. Mr. Baermann played without reference to his score, while Mr. Henschel's attention, contrary to custom, seemed closely confined to the book.

Another prominent feature of the concert was Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor. Probably no work of this kind that could have been given would have been more pleasing to the audience than this ever fresh and most delightful of all the composer's ambitious compositions. As Mr. H. F. Frost says in his life of Schubert, to eulogize this work at this day is little short of an impertinence. Musicians agreed upon its merits long ago. It is the happiest work of Schubert's life, and critics have not been able to resist the temptation to see in it a deeper meaning than appears to the hearer unfamiliar with its author's history. The bright and happy thoughts interrupted by sudden storms and tempests in the first movement, the lingering pathos of its andante, the sudden ending, breaking off abruptly when the work is but half complete, surely all this may be interpreted by reverent who gave it to the world as the musical transcript of his own life. Whether they be right or no there is no means of judging. Schubert has left no word to guide us to the unravelling of his meaning, if indeed he intended anything more than to put upon paper the pleasing harmonies that he heard within him. There are several things about the work, however, we do know, which only serve to increase our perplexity. The symphony was composed, as it now stands, in 1822, several years before the composer's sudden and untimely death. He wrote not only the two movements which were played last night, but nine bars of a third movement, the scherzo. There he ceased abruptly—not another note, not even a sketch of what he intended to do; and, to make the matter more strange, he made a present of the score, just as it stood, to a musical society at Gratz. The score was not used by them. It was passed about from hand to hand, until finally, in 1865, at Vienna, its immortal measures were heard by the public. It was published two years later, and has since been listened to by delighted audiences many times. It needs no study to get at the beauties of Schubert's music. His simplicity appeals directly to the listener, and the conquest is complete and immediate. The symphony was played last night in a masterly manner, and was followed by an unusual burst of applause.

Worshippers of the Unfortunate Genius

After the symphony, Mr. Baermann played thirty-two variations in C minor by Beethoven with great force and admirable skill, and created the usual excitement, being recalled three times. The concert began with Schumann's characteristic overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," and ended with one of Dvorak's Slavonian dances. The programme for the next concert is as follows:

Overture—(Euryanthe).....Weber
Concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2.
op. 22.....Saint-Saens
Symphony in E flat, No. 2, op. 46.....Gernshelm
(New. First time.)
Aria—(Idomeneo).....Mozart
Ballet music—(Feramors).....Rubinstein
(a.) Dance of Bayaderes.
(b.) Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmir.
(c.) Wedding March.
Soloists—Mrs. H. F. Knowles, soprano; Mr. Otto Bendix, pianoforte.

Georg Henschel's concerto for piano-forte in E flat, and Carl Baermann's performance of it attracted an audience at the Music Hall yesterday afternoon that crowded it to its utmost capacity. A first hearing of the work produces a very favorable impression, but a more extended reference to it can be made after its performance at the concert to-night.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Ninth Programme of the Series of the Season.

The ninth programme of the series of concerts for the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloist being Mr. Carl Baermann, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100.....Schumann
Concerto for pianoforte in E flat.....Henschel
Symphony in B minor (unfinished).....Schubert
Piano solo, 32 variations (C minor).....Beethoven
"Slavonian Dance" op. 46, No. 3.....Dvorak

The interest of the evening centred in the concerto by Mr. Henschel, and the interpretation given by Mr. Baermann, it being heard for the first time, save at the public rehearsal, on this occasion. It is the most important work yet made public by Mr. Henschel, and bears the stamp of his strong individuality in all of its three movements—allegro, adagio ma non troppo and allegro comodo. The concerto is the effort of a thoroughly trained musician, who combines with his knowledge of the art of composition the genius without which the most complete mastery of such art is of little avail; and the melodious character of the work makes it rank with the writings of composers who lived before the so-called "music of the future" found such general favor in the musical world. The ideas in this effort of Mr. Henschel are clearly and gracefully expressed, and the themes of the several movements are worked out with a skill which will give it a permanent position as a standard composition. The piano is made less an independent instrument in the first two movements than in the last, but there is a great beauty in the solo score throughout the work, and the final movement gives the pianist a brilliant opportunity for the display of the best technical skill and phrasing. The theme of the adagio has a plaintive beauty which was sung by the orchestra and piano with rare effect, and the brilliant character of the final allegro fairly justified the enthusiasm which followed close upon its conclusion. Mr. Henschel is to be congratulated, not only upon the meritorious work he has done in this concerto, but in having its first presentation given by such an artist as Mr. Baermann and so excellent a band, as a common motive appeared to actuate all to make the work as great a success as its merits deserved. Both the composer and the pianist were honored with the applause of one of the largest audiences of the season. Lack of space prevents any extended comment upon the balance of the programme. Suffice it to say that it was a thoroughly enjoyable one in all its numbers. Next week the soloists will be Mrs. H. F. Knowles, soprano, and Mr. Otto Bendix, pianoforte; and the selections, overture (Euryanthe), Weber; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22, Saint-Saens; symphony in E flat, No. 2, op. 46, Gernshelm; Aria (Idomeneo), Mozart; ballet music (Feramors), Rubinstein.

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.—The usual large audience was in attendance at Music Hall, Saturday night, upon the ninth concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The following programme was performed: Overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," op. 100, Schumann; concerto for the pianoforte in E flat (MS., first time), Henschel; symphony in B minor (unfinished), Schubert; piano solo—XXXII. variations (C minor), Beethoven; Slavonian Dance, op. 46, No. 3, Dvorak. The concert proved one of the most interesting thus far, mainly from the reason that a new composition of value was presented for the first time. This was the concerto for the piano by Mr. Henschel, which was found to be of the utmost importance, so far as one could judge by a first hearing. It is true that the work was more distinguished for rendition and skill in the art of composition than for inspiration or spontaneity, but as played by Mr. Baermann and the orchestra, the effect produced was most favorable to the general ability as well as profound scholarship of the author. It is earnestly hoped that the work will be presented again during the season, when a better opportunity will be offered to judge of its merits. The remainder of the programme was finely presented, as usual, by the noble orchestra under Mr. Henschel's direction, the playing of the Schubert unfinished symphony being especially good. The programme for next Saturday night which will also be rehearsed on Friday afternoon next, will be as follows: Overture (Euryanthe) Weber; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22, Saint-Saens; symphony E flat, No. 2, op. 46, new, first time, Gernshelm; aria (Idomeneo); Mozart; ballet music (Feramors), (a.) Dance of Bayaderes, (b.) Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmir, (c.) Wedding March, Rubinstein. Mr. Otto Bendix and Mrs. H. F. Knowles will be the soloists of this occasion.

THE NINTH BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

—Two elements in this concert united to render it as brilliant in point of attraction (Professor Carl Baermann being the soloist) as it was notable in the topic for discussion afforded by the production of a new piano-forte concerto, Mr. Georg Henschel being the composer. The concerto has been heard; and its characteristics have been discussed; yet the only unanimity of opinion noticeable is that it affords abundant evidence of a careful and scholarly preparation, and that the orchestration is of rare beauty. To our mind, however, such an opinion is altogether too meagre in the praise that it bestows, while such condemnations as have been generally made seem to us as wholly incompetent for the substantial basis of just criticism; in that a most inadequate experience with the work has been afforded. Allowing for an honest and intelligent difference of opinion, it should rather be our pleasure to err in too enthusiastically commending a composition that is ripe from the best thought and musical experiences of a talented and cultivated composer, than to form hasty and irrelevant conclusions as to the shortcomings of such a work. That it should rank among the worthiest and most beautiful in the entire repertoire of great piano concertos, we cannot for a moment doubt. It is charged that it is lacking in originality of ideas, but the charge would seem to come from those who are never so thoroughly satisfied that a musical composition is original as when radicalism and eccentricity are the characteristics of it that excite their awe. The conservatism of treatment that pervades Mr. Henschel's concerto is evident. Such a treatment must be inevitably associated with ideas which are not wholly unfamiliar, but which, in the present instance, are by no means tainted with plagiarism. In Moschello's E major piano concerto there are a number of phrases that are strongly reminiscent of certain portions of the A minor concerto of Schumann, yet a fair examination of the work will absolve it from the charge of plagiarism. And so it is with Mr. Henschel's concerto. He has shown a certain reverence in his adherence to old forms and encounters a risk thereby which he might easily have avoided had he been more erratic and less conservative in the expression of his musical inspiration. It is argued that there is a straining after effect in the work, that it is lacking in inspiration, and that it is creative of no genuine feeling in its favor. Now as a first hearing of it led us to the suspicion that such arguments might be justly founded,—and as a second experience with it not only removed this suspicion but revealed to us a beauty and power of musical inspiration of which we were not at first made fully aware,—we have good reason to infer that the criticism that the concerto lacks spontaneity of thought and development, is an ill-founded one. The pianism in the work is exceedingly difficult, yet it is not of a most advanced or modern order, and despite that it is at times obscured by the brilliancy of the orchestration, we must regard it as a whole.

work to indicate a sincere appreciation of it; though we cannot venture to give that analysis of it which we would like to see made, to lay bare the shallowness of the ill-timed and impulsive criticisms that have been made. In performing the concerto, which is replete with roulades, arpeggio, and, in short, a network of such piano passages as only the most eminent virtuosi would attempt to encounter, Professor Carl Baermann achieved his latest artistic triumph with all the ease, abandon and mastery which are his proverbial characteristics. Later in the concert he performed the thirty-two variations in C minor of Beethoven, and thus did his entire piano playing, from the first note of the concerto to finale of the variations, suggest a scope, breadth and variety of artistic conception, the calibre and standard of which are only attainable by the greatest masters. The least musical of the audience must have been as profoundly impressed by his perfect technique as were also the best judges; though the latter no doubt found their highest enjoyment from the clean-cut accuracy of phrasing, and manly, soulful and versatile sentiment expressed by his interpretation of the most elevated and royal of all music—that of Beethoven. To more than briefly refer to anything but the all-absorbing characteristic of the concert is unnecessary. Otherwise, the orchestra performed Schumann's overture to Schiller's "Bride of Messina," Schubert's unfinished symphony in B minor, and a Slavonic Dance, opus 46, No. 3, by Dvorak. At the concert this evening, Mrs. H. F. Knowles and Mr. Otto Bendix are to be the soloists.

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

X. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 9TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE. (Euryanthe.) WEBER.

CONCERTO FOR PIANO-FORTE in G minor, No. 2, op. 22. SAINT-SAËNS.
Andante sostenuto.—Allegro scherzando.—Presto.—SYMPHONY in E flat, No. 2, op. 46. GERNSEHEIM.
(NEW. FIRST TIME.)
Allegro tranquillo.—Tarantella.—Notturmo. Finale.—

ARIA. (Idomeneo.) MOZART.

BALLET-MUSIC. (Feramors.) RUBINSTEIN.
a. Dance of Bayaderes.
b. Candle-Dance of the Brides of Kashmire.
c. Wedding March.

SOLOISTS:

MRS. H. F. KNOWLES, Soprano.

MR. OTTO BENDIX, Pianoforte.

Mr. Bendix will use a Knabe Piano.

ARIA (Idomeneo.)

MOZART.

RECIT.: Solitudini amiche, aure amoroze,
Piante florite, e fiori vaghi! udite
D'una infelice amante i lamenti,
Che à voi lassa confido,
Quanto il tacer presso al mio vincitore,
Quanto il fingerti costa afflitto core!

AIR: Zeffiretti lusinghieri,
Deh, volate al mio tesoro,
Egli dite, ch'io l'adoro,
Che mi serbi il cor fedel;
E voi piante, e fior sinceri
Che ora in affia il pianto amaro
Dite a lui, che amor più raro
Mai vedeste sotto al ciel,
Zeffiretti lusinghieri, etc.

PASTE OVER

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Space forbids an extended review of last night's concert. The programme was a most interesting one, and in the main, well carried out. Mr. Otto Bendix was soloist in the Saint Saëns piano concerto in G minor. Mr. Bendix has always possessed grace and poetic delicacy, but in last night's performance he proved himself of power and ability to produce grand effects as well. The second movement was the most evenly played and won the pianist enthusiastic applause. At the close of the last movement only was there a falling off in power, and some of the strong chords of the Finale were not above mezzo-forte. Mrs. H. F. Knowles was the vocal soloist. Her voice was even, sweet and powerful, but seemed flavorless in the Idomeneo aria, and was besides marred by an overuse of partamento. The recitative was insipid, but the first part was well done.

The symphony of the evening was one by Gernsheim, a composer who is practically unknown here, although possessing a solid reputation in Germany and England. At a first hearing the development of the first movement seemed hazy, but every other portion of the work was full of melody and grace, reminding at times of Goetz's romantic beauty. The Tarantella (2nd movement) was taken at a frightful pace, but was clear and intelligible. The Nocturne (3d movement) was of sweet, almost pastoral character, and the finale was broad and triumphant, almost like (save that the tempo was too rapid) a hymn of thanksgiving, or a paean of victory. The Rubinstein Ballad Music (three numbers) from Feramos, closed the concert. This music excels in originality and beauty that in the same composer's Demon. The intertwining of melodious themes and anthems in the second number was delightful. The tempo of this number is marked as quicker than the first, but it was taken by the conductor at a slower pace. The brilliant wedding march, with all its wealth of bass drum, closed the very enjoyable programme. Courier

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The following programme was performed at the tenth symphony concert by the Boston Orchestra, on Saturday evening, at Music Hall: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for piano-forte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22, Saint-Saëns; symphony in E flat, No. 2, op. 46, Gernsheim; aria, "Idomeneo," Mozart; ballet music, "Feramos," Rubinstein. Of this programme the principal number was, of course, the symphony by Friedrich Gernsheim, the well known German composer, whose works have had a wide acceptance on the continent of Europe. His symphony is quite new, having been completed only within the year, and secured by Mr. Henschel for its initial performance Saturday night. The movements are four in number, allegro tranquillo, tarantella, nocturno and finale, and proved a most interesting composition in point of musical ideas and technical skill. It was finely rendered by the orchestra, which with the other work of this skilled band of musicians, the playing of Mr. Otto Bendix's piano forte selections, and the singing of Mrs. Knowles, made up an evening of much enjoyment. Miss Anna Drasdil will be the soloist for the next concert, and the following programme will be performed: Prelude ("Loreley"), Bruch; aria, Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music ("Rosamunde"), Schubert; aria, Gluck; overture ("Tannhauser"), Wagner. Transliterated

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Gernsheim's New Symphony Produced—Otto Bendix and Mrs. Knowles Soloists.

The tenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra embraced a variety of features, any one of which might be considered as a special attraction. As a new symphony by Gernsheim was the work heard here last night for the first time, it may be well to begin with that. This is the second work of the composer in this department. It is not often that a work by this composer is heard here, and he is not very well known to our public. A few facts about him may not be out of place. Friedrich Gernsheim was born of Jewish parents at Worms in 1839. He was early instructed in pianoforte playing by Liebe, Paner and Rozenheim. At the Conservatory of Leipzig, under Moscheles, Hauptmann, Rietz and Richter, he obtained a finished musical education. He has held a prominent place in Parisian and other municipal musical circles for his fine playing and successful teaching. Perhaps more could be said in favor of his work in these departments than concerning his achievements as a composer. He has not been a very prolific writer, but his works have always been meritorious, and a few of them have attained more than European reputation. As for the work performed last night, it did not strike us as a great composition. Its pleasure-giving qualities seemed to lie mostly on the surface. Compared with the other new works which we have heard here this season, this would receive a subordinate place. With such a work as Rubinstein's Russian Symphony, which improves on acquaintance, Gernsheim's effort would not be rated, and it did not appear to equal in music qualities Mr. Henschel's piano concerto, heard last week. It has, however, the merits of considerable originality and agreeableness, and evidently pleased the audience. Another feature of the concert was Otto Bendix' playing of Saint Saëns' second pianoforte concerto, a charming work which was delicately and clearly given by both pianist and orchestra. Mrs. Knowles sang an aria from Mozart's "Idomeneo" fairly, and won for herself a warm recognition. The Rubinstein ballet music, which closed the programme, proved pretty, though by no means trivial, while the familiar measures of the "Euryanthe" overture, with which the concert began, pleased everybody. The programme for next week is as follows:

Prelude ("Loreley").....Bruch
Aria.....Mozart
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....Beethoven
Adagio: allegro vivace; adagio.
Allegro vivace; allegro ma non troppo.
Ballet music ("Rosamunde").....Schubert
Aria.....Gluck
Overture ("Tannhauser").....Wagner
Soloist, Miss Anna Drasdil Stef

GLUCK.

WAGNER.

SIST:

DRASDIL.

ARIA (Idomeneo.)

MOZART.

RECIT.: Solitudini amiche, aure amorse,
Piante florite, e fiori vaghi! udite
D'una infelice amante i lamenti,
Che à voi lassa confido,
Quanto il tacer presso al mio vincitore,
Quanto il fingerti costa afflitto core!

AIR: Zeffiretti lusinghieri,
Deh, volate al mio tesoro,
Egli dite, ch'io l'adoro,
Che mi serbi il cor fedel;
E voi piante, e fior sinceri
Che ora in affia il pianto amaro
Dite a lui, che amor più raro
Mai vedeste sotto al ciel.
Zeffiretti lusinghieri, etc.

PASTE OVER

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Space forbids an extended review of last night's concert. The programme was a most interesting one, and in the main, well carried out. Mr. Otto Bendix was soloist in the Saint Saëns piano concerto in G minor. Mr. Bendix has always possessed grace and poetic delicacy, but in last night's performance he proved himself of power and ability to produce grand effects as well. The second movement was the most evenly played and won the pianist enthusiastic applause. At the close of the last movement only was there a falling off in power, and some of the strong chords of the Finale were not above mezzoforte. Mrs. H. F. Knowles was the vocal soloist. Her voice was even, sweet and powerful, but seemed flavorless in the Idomeneo aria, and was besides marred by an overuse of partamento. The recitative was insipid, but the first part was well done.

The symphony of the evening was one by Gernsheim, a composer who is practically unknown here, although possessing a solid reputation in Germany and England. At a first hearing the development of the first movement seemed hazy, but every other portion of the work was full of melody and grace, reminding at times of Goetz's romantic beauty. The Tarantella (2nd movement) was taken at a frightful pace, but was clear and intelligible. The Nocturne (3d movement) was of sweet, almost pastoral character, and the finale was broad and triumphant, almost like (save that the tempo was too rapid) a hymn of thanksgiving, or a psalm of victory. The Rubinstein Ballad Music (three numbers) from Feramors, closed the concert. This music excels in originality and beauty that in the same composer's Demon. The intertwining of melodious themes and anthems in the second number was delightful. The tempo of this number is marked as quicker than the first, but it was taken by the conductor at a slower pace. The brilliant wedding march, with all its wealth of bass drum, closed the very enjoyable programme. Concur

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.—The following programme was performed at the tenth symphony concert by the Boston Orchestra, on Saturday evening, at Music Hall: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for piano-forte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22, Saint-Saëns; symphony in E flat, No. 2, op. 46, Gernsheim; aria, "Idomeneo," Mozart; ballet music, "Feramors," Rubinstein. Of this programme the principal number was, of course, the symphony by Friedrich Gernsheim, the well known German composer, whose works have had a wide acceptance on the continent of Europe. His symphony is quite new, having been completed only within the year, and secured by Mr. Henschel for its initial performance Saturday night. The movements are four in number, allegro tranquillo, tarantella, nocturno and finale, and proved a most interesting composition in point of musical ideas and technical skill. It was finely rendered by the orchestra, which with the other work of this skilled band of musicians, the playing of Mr. Otto Bendix's piano forte selections, and the singing of Mrs. Knowles, made up an evening of much enjoyment. Miss Anna Drasdil will be the soloist for the next concert, and the following programme will be performed: Prelude ("Loreley"), Bruch; aria, Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music ("Rosamunde"), Schubert; aria, Gluck; overture ("Tannhauser"), Wagner. Traveler

TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Gernsheim's New Symphony Produced—Otto Bendix and Mrs. Knowles Soloists.

The tenth concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra embraced a variety of features, any one of which might be considered as a special attraction. As a new symphony by Gernsheim was the work heard here last night for the first time, it may be well to begin with that. This is the second work of the composer in this department. It is not often that a work by this composer is heard here, and he is not very well known to our public. A few facts about him may not be out of place. Friedrich Gernsheim was born of Jewish parents at Worms in 1839. He was early instructed in pianoforte playing by Liebe, Paner and Rozenheim. At the Conservatory of Leipzig, under Moscheles, Hauptmann, Rietz and Richter, he obtained a finished musical education. He has held a prominent place in Parisian and other municipal musical circles for his fine playing and successful teaching. Perhaps more could be said in favor of his work in these departments than concerning his achievements as a composer. He has not been a very prolific writer, but his works have always been meritorious, and a few of them have attained more than European reputation. As for the work performed last night, it did not strike us as a great composition. Its pleasure-giving qualities seemed to lie mostly on the surface. Compared with the other new works which we have heard here this season, this would receive a subordinate place. With such a work as Rubinstein's Russian Symphony, which improves on acquaintance, Gernsheim's effort would not be rated, and it did not appear to equal in music qualities Mr. Henschel's piano concerto, heard last week. It has, however, the merits of considerable originality and agreeableness, and evidently pleased the audience. Another feature of the concert was Otto Bendix' playing of Saint Saëns' second pianoforte concerto, a charming work which was delicately and clearly given by both pianist and orchestra. Mrs. Knowles sang an aria from Mozart's "Idomeneo" fairly, and won for herself a warm recognition. The Rubinstein ballet music, which closed the programme, proved pretty, though by no means trivial, while the familiar measures of the "Euryanthe" overture, with which the concert began, pleased everybody. The programme for next week is as follows:

Prelude ("Loreley").....Bruch
Aria.....Mozart
Symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60.....Beethoven
Adagio: allegro vivace; adagio.
Allegro vivace; allegro ma non troppo.
Ballet music ("Rosamunde").....Schubert
Aria.....Gluck
Overture ("Tannhauser").....Wagner
Soloist, Miss Anna Drasdil. Stoke

GLUCK.

WAGNER.

IST:

DRASDIL.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Whether by chance or as the result of plan we will not attempt to guess, but the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra thus far have ranged themselves pretty distinctly into two general classes, and they have been so far pretty evenly divided between the two. On the one side we have had concerts whose distinctive feature was the solid musical enjoyment they were calculated to afford, the element of novelty occupying a subordinate place; and on the other side novelty has seemed to be the prime consideration, and enjoyment, save such as comes from the gratification of curiosity, has in its turn been made subordinate. The tenth concert, given on Saturday evening last, falls in the latter class, though it must be said that the line was not as clearly drawn as on some former occasions. The most prominent feature of the concert, the symphony, was an entire novelty, this being, we believe, the first public performance the work has received anywhere, and its composer, withal,—Friedrich Gernsheim,—being almost unknown in this country. He has considerable reputation, however, in Germany and Paris as a pianist and teacher, and though he has written but little, some of his works have been very favorably received abroad. He is a native of Worms, and was born in 1839. His new work is in E flat, and is classed as No. 2, op. 46. It displays a real genius for melody, a scholarly understanding of counterpoint, and a mastery of orchestral combination that at times rivals Wagner, as the music itself and its treatment at times strikingly recall the style of that great tone-master. This is especially true of the first movement—allegro tranquillo—which works itself up within a space of fifteen or twenty measures to such a dizzy height of rapid-soaring and richly-harmonized melody that naught save the most masterly handling could prevent the development from becoming a disastrous anticlimax. And it is in the development of an ambitious thought that the composer seems to be weakest, as judged by this work. This first movement contains many a passage of extreme beauty, but the sense of continuity is vague and the outcome strikingly incomplete. The finale is less ambitious in conception and generally more symmetrical in construction, but here, too, the influence of Wagner seems to have led to an overcoloring—notably in the peculiar great prominence given to the brasses. The second movement, however, tarantella, is as symmetrical and clear as any one could wish, and is very bright and beautiful; while the third movement, a nocturne, is one of those soft, dreamy things whose possible subtlety of meaning, if such it has, may be guessed at, but not fully determined on a first hearing. As a whole it seems to us that in this work the composer errs in the direction very common to many modern writers—the tendency to “crowd the picture,” as painters say, by a too profuse use of colors, figures and devices of treatment. However much ingenuity and skill in elaboration a composer may display in his work, it is yet too early to discard simplicity of style, ceteris paribus, as one of the prime elements of a great composition. The test of genius, it may almost be said, is the ability to make itself felt at first sight, to persons of average culture, even though it may not be fully comprehended except by study.

Though we have ventured to set down the symphony as chiefly interesting for its novelty,—and it was evident that the audience at large so viewed it,—we must duly acknowledge the more musically pleasurable features of the programme. Chief of these was the performance of St. Saens's beautiful piano-forte concerto in G minor (No. 2, op. 22) by Mr. Otto Bendix, with orchestra. Mr. Bendix, by his former appearances in concert since he made Boston his home, had shown the good stuff that was in him,—his fine musical sense and devotion and his capacity for growth in his art,—but never before were these qualities so strikingly shown as on this occasion. Occupying, as we did, a seat at almost the extreme of a diagonal line from the piano to the opposite corner of the hall, we may have failed to detect some possible inadequacies of execution in the more delicate passages; but in the general clearness of his work, as well as the intelligence, grace and poetry of his style, his accomplishment must take a very honorable rank among others of the kind in the annals of these concerts. What he still seems most to lack is mainly physical, as shown in his failure to impart all due power to fortissimo passages, and in deficient manual dexterity in dealing with rapid skips on chords, but in this direction he appears to have made such marked advance of late that his performance is now but slightly marred thereby; and in many a strong passage on Saturday evening he showed that his instinct is not devoid of genuine fire, without which the natural equipment of an artist is hopelessly incomplete. Mr. Bendix won an unmistakable popular triumph and was warmly recalled, besides receiving a special tribute of applause for his playing of the allegro scherzando movement of the concerto.

The other soloist of the evening, Mrs. H. F. Knowles, was heard only in a recitative and aria from Mozart's opera “Idomeneo.” For some reason or other the lady did not sing with her accustomed power. The recitative, in particular, though not demanding such distinctively declamatory utterance as is called for by most recitatives, yet requires the expression of deep feeling, which was strangely absent in the singer's performance of it. Into the aria, however, she entered with more spirit, and seemed to warm to it more and more as she progressed. But in the singing of this, also, there was an unwelcome lack of fervor that was only relieved by the singer's purity and sweetness of voice, her conscientious style and good method. The closing passages of the aria, it must be said, were given with a good deal of genuine power. The two remaining numbers of the programme, both orchestral, were Weber's “Euryanthe” overture, at the opening of the concert, and three selections from Rubinstein's “Feramors,” ballet music, at its close,—all very effectively performed. The ballet music is among the most beautiful of its kind. In the second selection especially, the “Candle-Dance of the Brides of Kashmir,” a strange spell is wrought, mainly from the happy use of chromatic progressions in simple rhythm, with plainly marked beats, 3-3 time, for wood-wind, interwoven in a most bewitching manner with figures for the strings.

For the next concert, Miss Anna Drasdil, singer, will be the soloist, and the programme will be as follows:—

Prelude (“Loreley”), Bruch; aria, Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music (“Rosamunde”), Schubert; aria, Gluck; overture (“Tannhauser”), Wagner.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The tenth concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, the following being the programme: Overture, “Euryanthe,” Weber; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22, Saint-Saens; symphony in E flat, No. 2, op. 46, Gernsheim; aria, “Idomeneo,” Mozart; ballet music, “Feramors,” Rubinstein. The chief event of the evening was the performance of the symphony by Friedrich Gernsheim, a composer well known in France and Germany and not unfamiliar to English audiences, although not much heard of thus far in this country. The symphony in question is one of his latest works, and the performance of Saturday night is the first it has received in America. The composition is very melodious and technically clear, except, perhaps, in the first of the four movements, which is not particularly intelligible. It was well played on the whole, except that the time of the second and fourth movements seemed somewhat too rapid. The ballet music of Rubinstein was brilliantly performed. Mr. Bendix was the piano soloist of the evening, and gave Saint-Saens's concerto a powerful and refined performance. The great technical difficulties of the work were surmounted with an easy skill, and the whole performance fully merited the warm applause it received. Mrs. H. F. Knowles was the vocal soloist, and gave a sweet, although rather tame, rendering of Mozart's aria.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—A welcome selection from new music—at least new to Boston—was the notable characteristic of the tenth symphony concert. The chief novelty, and we do not use the word in any insignificant sense, was a symphony in E flat by Gernsheim. The introduction of a tarantella as one of the movements of the work impressed us as most unique and a very welcome inroad upon the creed that most composers adopt in symphonic writing. The effect of tarantella was to partially obliterate the dullness which any unmusical listener must experience in hearing a good symphony performed. There is a grotesque charm in a well-written tarantella that renders it more widely acceptable to music lovers than even the waltz or the polacca forms, at their very best. The entire symphony, not excepting its weakest movement, a nocturne—appears to be a work of masterly and enduring merit, though a single hearing will not justify us in indulging in any detailed reference to its construction. The next novelty on the programme, the Rubinstein ballet music, is to be more commended for its musical brightness and wit, so to speak, than for anything more serious. The sensuality of the music is its chief trait. The work is divided into three parts: (a) Danse of Bayaderes; (b) Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmir; (c) Wedding March. The scoring is brilliant and the march especially cannot fail to attain popularity among those to whom much noise and a sounding of all the trumpets of the orchestra at full blast generally signifies the music of the future. Mrs. H. F. Knowles and Mr. Otto Bendix were the soloists of the concert. The latter performed with orchestra the second piano-forte concerto by Saint Saens. The pianist's interpretation of the work was to a very delightful degree musical and artistic, the tone he produced in sustained passages indicated a poetic perception such as few possess, and in rapid playing his ability to cope with the

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Tenth Programme of the Second Season's Series.

The tenth programme of the second season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloists being Mrs. H. F. Knowles, soprano, and Mr. Otto Bendix, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, “Euryanthe,” Weber
Concert for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22, Saint-Saens
Symphony in E flat, No. 2, op. 46, Gernsheim
Aria, “Idomeneo,” Mozart
Ballet music, “Feramors,” Rubinstein

The novelty of this altogether pleasing programme was the symphony by Friedrich Gernsheim, a composer favorably known in Paris, Cologne, Rotterdam, and somewhat in England, but whose name is unfamiliar to local programmes. The symphony is one of his latest efforts, having been completed but about a year, and this was its first production. The movements are four in number, allegro tranquillo, tarantella, nocturne and finale, and the characteristics of the work are its technical difficulties, its wealth of musical ideas, and the ill success which the composer has met with, in working out these ideas in certain portions of the symphony, notably in the first movement. The clearest work is shown in the tarantella and in the finale, the leading theme of both these movements being pleasing in their melodious character and admirably developed throughout. There is a Brahms-like indefinite purpose in the allegro, and the working out of the nocturne theme is similarly confusing in its effect. None but a thorough musician could have written such a work, and further hearings of it will undoubtedly give a clearer idea of its character. The pianoforte concerto displayed the abilities of Mr. Bendix at their best, and, though his touch lacks something in clearness and his method is somewhat mechanical, his playing had so much merit in it that it fully justified the generous applause with which it was rewarded. The immense technical difficulties of the work were admirably executed, and the pianist gave a very intelligent interpretation of the work throughout. Mrs. Knowles' voice was evidently affected by the badness of the air in the hall, the sudden change in temperature evidently producing this result, but the manner in which Mozart's melodious aria was rendered was worthy of the most generous praise, the phrasing and delivery being characterized by an artistic elegance rarely surpassed. The work of the orchestra was thoroughly good throughout the evening, and the programme gave the usual satisfaction to the large audience of patrons.

most extreme difficulties of pianism was manifest. The shortcomings of the performance were such as might have emanated from any artist who had made over-anxious preparation for his task; and where there was so much in Mr. Bendix's playing that was really excellent and effective it were unfair to pick flaws. Judging from the applause, the audience justly recognized in him an executant of the highest type. Mrs. Knowles' singing of that beautiful Mozart aria, Zeffiretti lusinghieri, from “Idomeneo,” was a very refined and praiseworthy performance, that could not have failed to heighten her already excellent reputation as a vocalist. The overture was Weber's Euryanthe, and as was the case with the symphony, it received a good performance.

MUSIC AND THE DRAMA.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Whether by chance or as the result of plan we will not attempt to guess, but the concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra thus far have ranged themselves pretty distinctly into two general classes, and they have been so far pretty evenly divided between the two. On the one side we have had concerts whose distinctive feature was the solid musical enjoyment they were calculated to afford, the element of novelty occupying a subordinate place; and on the other side novelty has seemed to be the prime consideration, and enjoyment, save such as comes from the gratification of curiosity, has in its turn been made subordinate. The tenth concert, given on Saturday evening last, falls in the latter class, though it must be said that the line was not as clearly drawn as on some former occasions. The most prominent feature of the concert, the symphony, was an entire novelty, this being, we believe, the first public performance the work has received anywhere, and its composer, withal,—Friedrich Gernsheim,—being almost unknown in this country. He has considerable reputation, however, in Germany and Paris as a pianist and teacher, and though he has written but little, some of his works have been very favorably received abroad. He is a native of Worms, and was born in 1839. His new work is in E flat, and is classed as No. 2, op. 46. It displays a real genius for melody, a scholarly understanding of counterpoint, and a mastery of orchestral combination that at times rivals Wagner, as the music itself and its treatment at times strikingly recall the style of that great tone-master. This is especially true of the first movement—allegro tranquillo—which works itself up within a space of fifteen or twenty measures to such a dizzy height of rapid-soaring and richly-harmonized melody that naught save the most masterly handling could prevent the development from becoming a disastrous anticlimax. And it is in the development of an ambitious thought that the composer seems to be weakest, as judged by this work. This first movement contains many a passage of extreme beauty, but the sense of continuity is vague and the outcome strikingly incomplete. The finale is less ambitious in conception and generally more symmetrical in construction, but here, too, the influence of Wagner seems to have led to an overcoloring—notably in the peculiar great prominence given to the brasses. The second movement, however, tarantella, is as symmetrical and clear as any one could wish, and is very bright and beautiful; while the third movement, a nocturne, is one of those soft, dreamy things whose possible subtlety of meaning, if such it has, may be guessed at, but not fully determined on a first hearing. As a whole it seems to us that in this work the composer errs in the direction very common to many modern writers—the tendency to "crowd the picture," as painters say, by a too profuse use of colors, figures and devices of treatment. However much ingenuity and skill in elaboration a composer may display in his work, it is yet too early to discard simplicity of style, ceteris paribus, as one of the prime elements of a great composition. The test of genius, it may almost be said, is the ability to make itself felt at first sight, to persons of average culture, even though it may not be fully comprehended except by study.

Though we have ventured to set down the symphony as chiefly interesting for its novelty,—and it was evident that the audience at large so viewed it,—we must duly acknowledge the more musically pleasurable features of the programme. Chief of these was the performance of St. Saens's beautiful piano-forte concerto in G minor (No. 2, op. 22) by Mr. Otto Bendix, with orchestra. Mr. Bendix, by his former appearances in concert since he made Boston his home, had shown the good stuff that was in him,—his fine musical sense and devotion and his capacity for growth in his art,—but never before were these qualities so strikingly shown as on this occasion. Occupying, as we did, a seat at almost the extreme of a diagonal line from the piano to the opposite corner of the hall, we may have failed to detect some possible inadequacies of execution in the more delicate passages; but in the general clearness of his work, as well as the intelligence, grace and poetry of his style, his accomplishment must take a very honorable rank among others of the kind in the annals of these concerts. What he still seems most to lack is mainly physical, as shown in his failure to impart all due power to fortissimo passages, and in deficient manual dexterity in dealing with rapid skips on chords, but in this direction he appears to have made such marked advance of late that his performance is now but slightly marred thereby; and in many a strong passage on Saturday evening he showed that his instinct is not devoid of genuine fire, without which the natural equipment of an artist is hopelessly incomplete. Mr. Bendix won an unmistakable popular triumph and was warmly recalled, besides receiving a special tribute of applause for his playing of the allegro scherzando movement of the concerto.

The other soloist of the evening, Mrs. H. F. Knowles, was heard only in a recitative and aria from Mozart's opera "Idomeneo." For some reason or other the lady did not sing with her accustomed power. The recitative, in particular, though not demanding such distinctively declamatory utterance as is called for by most recitatives, yet requires the expression of deep feeling, which was strangely absent in the singer's performance of it. Into the aria, however, she entered with more spirit, and seemed to warm to it more and more as she progressed. But in the singing of this, also, there was an unwelcome lack of fervor that was only relieved by the singer's purity and sweetness of voice, her conscientious style and good method. The closing passages of the aria, it must be said, were given with a good deal of genuine power. The two remaining numbers of the programme, both orchestral, were Weber's "Euryanthe" overture, at the opening of the concert, and three selections from Rubinstein's "Feramors," ballet music, at its close,—all very effectively performed. The ballet music is among the most beautiful of its kind. In the second selection especially, the "Candle-Dance of the Brides of Kashmir," a strange spell is wrought, mainly from the happy use of dramatic progressions in simple rhythm, with plainly marked beats, 3-3 time, for wood-wind, interwoven in a most bewitching manner with figures for the strings.

For the next concert, Miss Anna Drasdil, singer, will be the soloist, and the programme will be as follows:—

Prelude ("Loreley"). Bruch; aria, Mozart; symphony in E flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music ("Idomeneo"), Schubert; aria, Gluck; overture ("Tannhauser"), Wagner.

Tenth Symphony Concert.

The tenth concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, the following being the programme: Overture, "Euryanthe," Weber; concerto for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22, Saint-Saens; symphony in E flat, No. 2, op. 46, Gernsheim; aria, "Idomeneo," Mozart; ballet music, "Feramors," Rubinstein. The chief event of the evening was the performance of the symphony by Friedrich Gernsheim, a composer well known in France and Germany and not unfamiliar to English audiences, although not much heard of thus far in this country. The symphony in question is one of his latest works, and the performance of Saturday night is the first it has received in America. The composition is very melodious and technically clear, except, perhaps, in the first of the four movements, which is not particularly intelligible. It was well played on the whole, except that the time of the second and fourth movements seemed somewhat too rapid. The ballet music of Rubinstein was brilliantly performed. Mr. Bendix was the piano soloist of the evening, and gave Saint-Saens's concerto a powerful and refined performance. The great technical difficulties of the work were surmounted with an easy skill, and the whole performance fully merited the warm applause it received. Mrs. H. F. Knowles was the vocal soloist, and gave a sweet, although rather tame, rendering of Mozart's aria.

THE TENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.—A welcome selection from new music—at least new to Boston—was the notable characteristic of the tenth symphony concert. The chief novelty, and we do not use the word in any insignificant sense, was a symphony in E flat by Gernsheim. The introduction of a tarantella as one of the movements of the work impressed us as most unique and a very welcome inroad upon the creed that most composers adopt in symphonic writing. The effect of tarantella was to partially obliterate the dullness which any unmusical listener must experience in hearing a good symphony performed. There is a grotesque charm in a well-written tarantella that renders it more widely acceptable to music lovers than even the waltz or the polacca forms, at their very best. The entire symphony, not excepting its weakest movement, a nocturne—appears to be a work of masterly and enduring merit, though a single hearing will not justify us in indulging in any detailed reference to its construction. The next novelty on the programme, the Rubinstein ballet music, is to be more commended for its musical brightness and wit, so to speak, than for anything more serious. The sensuality of the music is its chief trait. The work is divided into three parts: (a) Danse of Bayaderes; (b) Candle Dance of the Brides of Kashmir; (c) Wedding March. The scoring is brilliant and the march especially cannot fail to attain popularity among those to whom much noise and a sounding of all the trumpets of the orchestra at full blast generally signifies the music of the future. Mrs. H. F. Knowles and Mr. Otto Bendix were the soloists of the concert. The latter performed with orchestra the second piano-forte concerto by Saint Saens. The pianist's interpretation of the work was to a very delightful degree musical and artistic, the tone he produced in sustained passages indicated a poetic perception such as few possess, and in rapid playing his ability to cope with the

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Tenth Programme of the Second Season's Series.

The tenth programme of the second season's series of concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Georg Henschel, conductor, was given at Music Hall last evening, the soloists being Mrs. H. F. Knowles, soprano, and Mr. Otto Bendix, pianist, and the selections as follows:

Overture, "Euryanthe"..... Weber
Concert for pianoforte in G minor, No. 2, op. 22..... Saint-Saens
Symphony in E flat, No. 2, op. 46..... Gernsheim
Aria, "Idomeneo"..... Mozart
Ballet music, "Feramors"..... Rubinstein

The novelty of this altogether pleasing programme was the symphony by Friedrich Gernsheim, a composer favorably known in Paris, Cologne, Rotterdam, and somewhat in England, but whose name is unfamiliar to local programmes. The symphony is one of his latest efforts, having been completed but about a year, and this was its first production. The movements are four in number, allegro tranquillo, tarantella, nocturne and finale, and the characteristics of the work are its technical difficulties, its wealth of musical ideas, and the ill success which the composer has met with, in working out these ideas in certain portions of the symphony, notably in the first movement. The clearest work is shown in the tarantella and in the finale, the leading theme of both these movements being pleasing in their melodious character and admirably developed throughout. There is a Brahms-like indefinite purpose in the allegro, and the working out of the nocturnal theme is similarly confusing in its effect. None but a thorough musician could have written such a work, and further hearings of it will undoubtedly give a clearer idea of its character. The pianoforte concerto displayed the abilities of Mr. Bendix at their best, and, though his touch lacks something in clearness and his method is somewhat mechanical, his playing had so much merit in it that it fully justified the generous applause with which it was rewarded. The immense technical difficulties of the work were admirably executed, and the pianist gave a very intelligent interpretation of the work throughout. Mrs. Knowles' voice was evidently affected by the badness of the air in the hall, the sudden change in temperature evidently producing this result, but the manner in which Mozart's melodious aria was rendered was worthy of the most generous praise, the phrasing and delivery being characterized by an artistic elegance rarely surpassed. The work of the orchestra was thoroughly good throughout the evening, and the programme gave the usual satisfaction to the large audience of patrons.

most extreme difficulties of pianism was manifest. The shortcomings of the performance were such as might have emanated from any artist who had made over-anxious preparation for his task; and where there was so much in Mr. Bendix's playing that was really excellent and effective it were unfair to pick flaws. Judging from the applause, the audience justly recognized in him an executant of the highest type. Mrs. Knowles' singing of that beautiful Mozart aria, Zeffiretti lusinghieri, from "Idomeneo," was a very refined and praiseworthy performance, that could not have failed to heighten her already excellent reputation as a vocalist. The overture was Weber's Euryanthe, and as was the case with the symphony, it received a good performance.

The tenth programme of the symphony concert embraced the following pieces:—

Overture. Euryanthe.....Weber.
 Concerto for pianoforte in G minor. No. 2, op. 22. Saint-Saens.
 Andante sostenuto—Allegro scherzando—Presto.
 Symphony in E Flat, op. 46.....Gernsheim.
 (New. First time.)
 Allegro tranquillo—Tarantella—Nocturno. Finale.
 Aria. Idomeneo.....Mozart.
 Ballet Music. Feramors.....Rubinstein.
 a. Dance of Bayaderes.
 b. Cradle-dance of the Brides of Kashmir.
 c. Wedding March.

The overture, one of the most beautiful in the whole line of overtures, was well played, and gave much pleasure to the large audience present. Perhaps my seat had something to do with it, but either the piano was a poor one, or the pianist, Mr. Benedix, is entirely unsuited to play with an orchestra. He possesses a hard, wiry touch, produces a small, thin tone, and notably in the first movement, struck a variety of false notes. The second movement, "Allegro scherzando," was better played, because it comes within the scope of the pianist's style of technical ability. It is a very pleasing bit of musical writing.

Mr. Benedix tussled nobly with the difficult Presto, but it showed rather too much for him, and while he got through it passably well, with the splendid assistance rendered him by the orchestra, think his style of playing is more adapted to chamber music, in a smaller hall, where he has been heard to far better advantage. The new symphony possesses considerable merit, inasmuch as it is finely orchestrated, and is pleasing throughout, which is more than can be said of some of the other novelties given this season. The ballet music proved very entertaining to those who remained. Mrs. Knowles's number might just as well have been left out, for it was of no particular addition to the otherwise attractive programme.

JAMES M. TRACY.

Otto Benedix Jan 1883

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1882 - 83.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, CONDUCTOR.

XI. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16TH, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

PRELUDE. (Loreley.) BRUCH.

ARIA. MOZART.

SYMPHONY in B flat. No. 4, op. 60. BEETHOVEN.

Adagio; Allegro vivace.—Adagio.—
Allegro vivace.—Allegro ma non troppo.—

BALLET-MUSIC. (Rosamunde.) SCHUBERT.

ARIA. GLUCK.

OVERTURE. (Tannhäuser.) WAGNER.

SOLOIST:

MISS ANNA DRASDIL.

ARIA. (Il curioso indiscreto.)

MOZART.

Per pietà, non ricercate
La cagion del mio tormento.
Si crudele in me lo sento,
Che neppur lo so spiegar.

Vo pensando ma poi come?
Per uscir; ma che mi giova
Di far questa, o quella prova,
Se non trovo, in che sperar.

Ah! tra l'ire e tra g'li sdegni,
Della mia funesta sorte,
Chiamo, solo, oh Dio! la morte,
Che mi venga a consolar.

ARIA. (Elena e Paride.)

GLUCK.

O del mio dolce ardor bramato aggetto.
C'aure che tu respiri, alfin respiro,
O dunque il guardo io giro
Le tue vaghe sembianze amore in me dipinge.
E il mio pensier si pinga le più lieta speranze.
E nell'ardor, che si maccende il core
Cerco te, chiamo te, gemo e sospiro!

ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Very Fine Programme Carried Out in a Very Artistic Manner.

The eleventh concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening proved certainly not the least attractive of the season. It began with Max Bruch's melodious prelude to "Loreley," the only opera by that composer which was at all successful. It belongs to the lighter class of music. There was but one other instrumental number on the programme and that was Schubert's "Rosamunde" ballet music.

It would be difficult to pick flaws in the way these two numbers were played or conducted last night. Miss Anna Drisdill was the soloist. She sang first an aria by Mozart, and later in the evening one by Gluck. The intenser dramatic character of the last selection was much better suited to her capacity than the first, and she sang it more effectively. She has an excellent contralto voice, though some of her lower notes are harsh and unpleasant; in the upper register her tones are more pleasing.

Beethoven's great work in B flat was the symphony. It would be hard to imagine a finer performance of that splendid composition than it received last night. It is decidedly one of the best of the many good things which Mr. Henschel has done this season. There was some roughness among the strings in the last movement, but aside from that the work of the orchestra was almost perfect.

This symphony was first performed in 1807 in Vienna. It stood last on a programme which contained the three previous symphonies. Such a programme would scarcely be thought admissible now. The success of the work on this occasion is not recorded, but it was brought out soon after amid immense enthusiasm. Although it has been ranked below his C minor symphony, its greatness must be apparent to everybody. The melodious beauty of its themes can hardly have stood out with greater clearness before than under Mr. Henschel's baton last evening.

The overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," which, though at one time it seemed in danger of becoming too familiar to our concert-goers, has not been heard before in this city for two years, closed the entertainment. Without an understanding of the subject it is meant to illustrate, one gets but little satisfaction from this work. But when the struggle between the good and evil principle is recognized, the first represented by the pilgrims' chorus, with which it opens, and the latter by the wild revel of the mountain of Venus, which interrupts that chorus, the work becomes full of interest. It was capitally played last evening, though a captious critic might be disposed to find fault with Mr. Henschel's tempi, and with his increase of time in crescendo passages. But the orchestra acquitted themselves of this trying work most creditably after the previous labor of the evening. The programme for the next concert is:

Overture (Il Seraglio).....Mozart
Concerto for pianoforte in E minor, op. 11.....Chopin
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Piano solo, Rhapsody No. 9.....Liszt
Minnuet of Will o' the Wisp, } (Faust).....Berlioz
Dance of Sylphs, }
Hungarian March, }
Soloist, Mme. Madeline Schiller. Slate

Mme. Schiller will

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The symphony concert of last evening, although excellent in some of its details, must have short shrift. This week, Miss Drasdill, the soloist, sang with good taste, but the voice lacked something of clearness and was often throaty or nasal. The Tannhauser overture was grandly done, the great violin passage, for once, being clear and strong enough.

The symphony—Beethoven's fourth—was rather drily given in its first movement, and was somewhat hurried in its last.

The next programme offers:

Overture, (Il Seraglio).....Mozart
Concerto for Pianoforte, in E minor, op. 11,.....Chopin.
Allegro maestoso—Romance. (Larghetto).—
Rondo. (Vivace).—
Mme. Schiller
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68,.....Brahms.
Un poco sostenuto; Allegro.—Andante sostenuto—
Un poco Allegretto e grazioso—
Adagio Più Andante; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio,
Più Allegro.—

Piano solo, Rhapsody No. 9,.....Liszt.
Mme. Schiller.
Menuet of will o' the wisps, } (Faust.) Berlioz,
Dance of sylphes, }
Hungarian March, } Conried

MUSICAL GAZETTE

The eleventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at Music Hall last night. The programme was not a particularly interesting one, and the performances were not up to the standard of the preceding concerts of the series. The symphony was Beethoven's No. 4, which was rather heavily interpreted, and was made painful at times by the untunefulness of the wood wind. Miss Anna Drasdill was the soloist. She sang an aria by Mozart and one by Gluck, both which were given in that broad style that is so pleasing a characteristic of her singing. At the next concert Mme. Madeline Schiller will be the soloist, and will play Chopin's concerto in E minor and Liszt's Rhapsodie No. 9. The symphony will be Brahms's No. 1, in C minor.

Eleventh Symphony Concert.

The eleventh concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given at Music Hall on Saturday evening, when the following programme was performed: Prelude (Loreley), Bruch; aria ("Il curioso indiscreto"), Mozart; symphony in B flat, No. 4, op. 60, Beethoven; ballet music (Rosamunde), Schubert; aria ("Elena e Paride"), Gluck; overture (Tannhauser), Wagner. The performance was, in general, excellent, although the first and second movements were given in a rather dry style, and the last was played much too fast. There was, however, some excellent work done, especially by the strings, which did finely during the entire evening. The Tannhauser overture was better given than ever before in this city, the violins, especially, fully improving the opportunity and fulfilling the demands that were presented to them. Miss Anna Drasdill was the soloist, and gave the two uninteresting selections that are mentioned above. Both were sung, however, with much taste and intelligence, and in the latter she appeared to excellent advantage in all respects. Next Saturday evening the following programme will be presented, Madame Madeline Schiller being the soloist: Overture (Il Seraglio), Mozart; Concerto for Pianoforte in E minor, op. 11, Chopin; symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68, Brahms; Piano Solo, Rhapsody No. 9, Liszt; Minuet of Will o' the Wisp, Dance of Sylphs and Hungarian March, from "Damnation of Faust," Berlioz. Conried

ARIA. (Il curioso indiscreto.)

MOZART.

Per pietà, non ricercate
La cagion del mio tormento.
Si crudele in me lo sento.
Che neppur lo so spiegar.

Vo pensando ma poi come?
Per uscir; ma che mi giova
Di far questa, o quella prova,
Se non trovo, in che sperar.

Ah! tra l'ire e tra g'li sdegni,
Della mia funesta sorte,
Chiamo, solo, oh Dio! la morte,
Che mi venga a consolar.

ARIA. (Elena e Paride.)

GLUCK.

O del mio dolce ardor bramato aggetto.
C'aure che tu respiri, alfin respiro.
O dunque il guardo io giro
Le tue vaghe sembianze amore in me dipingo.
E il mio pensier si pinga le più lieta speranze.
E nell'ardor, che si maccende il core
Cercio te, chiamo te, gemo e sospiro!

ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Very Fine Programme Carried Out in a Very Artistic Manner.

The eleventh concert in the present series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening proved certainly not the least attractive of the season. It began with Max Bruch's melodious prelude to "Loreley," the only opera by that composer which was at all successful. It belongs to the lighter class of music. There was but one other instrumental number on the programme and that was Schubert's "Rosamunde" ballet music.

It would be difficult to pick flaws in the way these two numbers were played or conducted last night. Miss Anna Drisdill was the soloist. She sang first an aria by Mozart, and later in the evening one by Gluck. The intense dramatic character of the last selection was much better suited to her capacity than the first, and she sang it more effectively. She has an excellent contralto voice, though some of her lower notes are harsh and unpleasant; in the upper register her tones are more pleasing.

Beethoven's great work in B flat was the symphony. It would be hard to imagine a finer performance of that splendid composition than it received last night. It is decidedly one of the best of the many good things which Mr. Henschel has done this season. There was some roughness among the strings in the last movement, but aside from that the work of the orchestra was almost perfect.

This symphony was first performed in 1807 in Vienna. It stood last on a programme which contained the three previous symphonies. Such a programme would scarcely be thought admissible now. The success of the work on this occasion is not recorded, but it was brought out soon after amid immense enthusiasm. Although it has been ranked below his C minor symphony, its greatness must be apparent to everybody. The melodious beauty of its themes can hardly have stood out with greater clearness before than under Mr. Henschel's baton last evening.

The overture to Wagner's "Tannhauser," which, though at one time it seemed in danger of becoming too familiar to our concert-goers, has not been heard before in this city for two years, closed the entertainment. Without an understanding of the subject it is meant to illustrate, one gets but little satisfaction from this work. But when the struggle between the good and evil principle is recognized, the first represented by the pilgrims' chorus, with which it opens, and the latter by the wild revel of the mountain of Venus, which interrupts that chorus, the work becomes full of interest. It was capitally played last evening, though a captious critic might be disposed to find fault with Mr. Henschel's tempi, and with his increase of time in crescendo passages. But the orchestra acquitted themselves of this trying work most creditably after the previous labor of the evening. The programme for the next concert is:

Overture (Il Seraglio).....Mozart
Concerto for piano in E minor, op. 11.....Chopin
Symphony in C minor, No. 1, op. 68.....Brahms
Piano solo, Rhapsody No. 9.....Liszt
Menuet of Will o' the Wisp, } (Faust).....Berlioz
Dance of Sylphs, }
Hungarian March, }
Soloist, Mme. Madeline Schiller.

Mme. Schiller will

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

